The most valuable people are not those who covet and ceaselessly struggle to achieve the first place. Not those, finally reaching the highest peak of the pyramid. No diplomas, no awards, no talent, no intelligence, no financial means, no genius and no culture will ever be sufficiently caught with screws. These are just some "snapshots" maximum muscle strains that increase the pressure on an area of interest.

The real winners are the builders, les plus grands artistes du monde, those, who create with their own efforts the unique pyramid, from the first until the last brick. Those well-oiled machines that do not grab after the start of the whistle. Those, who pass unnoticed into the most part of their life, but whom, through the spirit of sacrifice and faith, succeed to build a road, on which all others are unable to walk. Those, who succeed to bring the "living" into the extremely complex structure of the Human within them, well-delimiting those molecular links between "to be" and "not to be".

The champion strives to climb to the top of the pyramid. However, the builder knows also to build it and demolish it. Moreover, to strengthen it, and raise it up to the level he wants. In other words, the champion can rise only to the level determined by the builder.

A constructor is always above a champion.

Leadership: Do you concentrate the essence of your own determination on a work called "Super Ego" or do you intensify your effort to transform an imperfection?

The beginning of a legend is triggered by the idea that you have to dive into an ocean where no one sees you until you manage to uncover the inestimable pearl found within you.

As for Anton, it had seemed destined to become a big winner. An ocean in defense and attack. The biggest merits. The most precious qualities. The perfect model for Gattaca. Along with the other champions, other talents, other models.

However, he is, in fact, a metaphor which suggests the idea that the right to be the best and the most powerful, the talent, honors, the numerous conferred awards, absolutely all the acknowledgments, and the obtained diplomas – WILL NOT MAKE YOU A WINNER, will not make you a truly valuable person, will not make you a builder. But, maybe just another champion among the thousands of champions.

Those like Anton are blessed with a lot of qualities. They are fierce, tenacious, and stubborn, with the spirit of a winner, enthusiastic, talented. An arsenal of virtues. True oceans of society. They are represented by the Super Ego, an easily constructed authority, which often generates disaster from too much self-confidence.

However, we should never forget that the oceans are on view. Sometimes, they amaze us through their power. While the real gifts of nature, the most precious pearls, of a high quality, are not on view, but must be sought, identified, brought to light and then polished.

Leadership: Do you have a quality that can defeat an ocean?

A pearl will never rise to the level of an ocean. However, it will hurt its pride and will give it certain vulnerability.

At the end of the movie "Gattaca (1997)" Anton, envious and full of evil, makes a last attempt to prove his supremacy in front of his brother. Simply, he could not accept that a "nobody", a stranger, came to Gattaca, proving himself far superior to him and everyone else.

For, yes, Vincent was above all the "champions" only through the fact that he managed to move the sun instead of the moon. He was the only one who achieved the impossible.

The two ones are challenging each other once again. As they did when they were little. And, again, the essence of the man with a stronger character emerges; once again the most steeled feature separates the shore of two human types. Vincent wins the challenge by accepting and assuming the "pain". While Anton - the perfect man, the unsurpassed athlete – gets tired, letting himself being dragged down by the strong currents. And again Vincent, cutting the wild waves, turns back and saves him from drowning.

Are you giving yourself up to chance and the will of others? Are you the one, who controls his fate, or the power of your "brother" manipulates you without realizing it? Will you save your "brother" who controls in secret the courage to be different?

Do you have a quality that can propel you before all "champions"? What would it be? What are the prohibitions that prevent you to rise above the "ocean"? Are you a man resistant to "pain" or are you a force of nature with weaknesses? Are you "Vincent" or "Anton"?

The privilege of being Vincent is a standard of "perfection" considered to be a determining factor of man's attitude from the opposition of the two entities: the situation of being limited and the power of believing in the miraculous.

One second dedicated to the resurrection is enlightening for revealing the moment when we discover that unique transforming quality that can propel us up to unknown heights. However, we must seek this pearl, to know what to do with it. To transform it into a creative energy.

Therefore, look for the pearl from the deep ocean of the man whom you are, it is something that you already have in your blood, something that belongs to you and nobody can limit it. Look into you what others do not see and never find.

Only A Saint Can Borrow The Image Of A Mortal

On August 16, 2020

It is enough to go through a story with life, about life, to find infinite pleasure in the act of living another life.

I am in the vicinity of the rose, as long as there is mutual admiration, going deeper and deeper into the story of a painting described by an anonymous painter with a lively, dreamy brush in which the color of the blood dominates. In episodes delimited by "to be continued", I believe that the true existence of my rose is part of the first design of the approach to the analysis of the work of art and the finalization of the idea of space of an almost ideal beauty.

So sincere, beautifully written, the story of my life is inscribed with much soul, delicately, in the perspective of an unceasing resemblance to Him, a rose with blood-colored petals that is structured in the perspective of an artistic theme of great interest: Anacredarekr, meaning the stability of the feeling of belonging to the essence of nature imposed by the duration of a state of mind with rich meanings from many points of view.

Me and my rose. Only the two of us are the protagonists of a show of colors, the expression of an act of aesthetic valorization in noticing and tasting a work of art explained by an approach to the grace of God transposed in a space of Creation. We unite heavenly and natural through a prayer that contains the word "distance", as if drawn from the memory of a time suspended in a desert region:

Behold, I speak by the mouth of Allah from 1001 nights. May Allah bless his blessings upon me ! What is an island that has not known the consequences of its generosity? As for me, ya sidi, then if I had a hundred mouths on my face, and a hundred tongues in each mouth, and a treasure trove of tongues on each tongue, I still couldn't I tell you properly the wonderful generosity of his reign Abulcassem !

Leadership: Is your artistic vision the ambitious promise you make to the world about what you will reveal about yourself in a language specific to the universe and nature to which nothing in real life corresponds?

Calm, patient, emotional, I keep my eyes on the form of symbolism called "comparison". I continue to look at myself with love of art, sometimes realistic, sometimes dreamy, through the visual landmark of an eye that observes the spectacular path of an expressionist artistic vision previously prepared by the idea of a free nature that is universally imposed on man, which the spirit must poetically imitate by playing with the artist in the middle of a wonderful and restful Orient.

Will my gaze be able to guarantee the total transparency of the watercolor in another Alpha and Omega version of nature?

So sensitive, the artist's eyes can be attributed, as a starting point for identifying a captivating vision, worthy of painting, the power of transfiguration of reality and the ability to assimilate light in each of the receptive souls who experience "the story of a lost and found world". The thread of my story is heard in the language of Allah, and the desert paradise, stretched out under a scorching sun, announces the common ground of the discovery of a niche art, so beautifully called: Sympathia.

The rose reads my thoughts, gathers them through a mystical enlightenment in a prayer that contains the word "Fantastic", making them the culminating jolt of the primary condition of my being undisturbed by a consciousness of aesthetic vulnerability. Like a rose petal taken by the wind that knows no violence, only the pale light of dusk, I feel transposed into a new dimension, into a language that acquires even more incomprehensible meanings as it moves in the opposite direction to reality in which I relate to empirically and rationally, so that everything becomes fascinating !

Leadership: Does your self respond to the urge to fervently experience the high feeling of manifestation of divine grace available as a reference model for understanding the symbolism of art?

This is what delights my mind and soul: with the inscription of the existence of a rose in the dreamy and artistic world of my world, in the purely mystical sense of the word Eryosthevia, meaning the opening of man to the work of divine grace. The artistic, worthy of the beauty of the rose, is found in the power of this word that seems to urge to dream, beautifying man with the grace of the Holy Spirit, in a personal and unique way. And if I am a rose, more sublime than any proof by which God could be known, it is because I live within a space of enlightenment, between the pure creations of nature and the imaginary creations of man.

With such naturalness and love, the rose spoke to me with the conviction that I am part of another world, more distant: "Try to fall asleep with your eyes open so that you can dream me more real. Let me be the reality of your dream."

And I replied like an ancient teacher who had moved to another world: "I will try to focus my gaze on the dream from which I can hardly return, only to be able to embrace the reality of a brush that expresses its desire to color with empathy an image in a state of contour."

True. I am a saint, because the spirit of my word (full of mystery) crosses the space that stretches from the earth to the sky, and returns in the form of an image full of emotion in the field of an art of sensitivity, Aterspesys, at a time when the world marvels at how far she has come. For only a saint can borrow the image of an ordinary mortal to stand out in the world of men, and this world does not differ much from the wonderful and immortal world of the spirits of nature.

Through the symbolism of art you will receive in your mastery the spirit of a Saint with the help of which you will be able to communicate with all the spirits of nature. This denotes the inclination and ease of experiencing a different plane of existence than that of the earthly world.

Only A Saint Can Borrow The Image Of A Mortal as long as this saint is an artist who approaches with his soul the area of watercolor and painting, authenticating himself not only as a landmark of universality, but as a wonder of nature, finding himself in a work of art as a unifying element between heaven and earth, between dream and reality, between culture and aesthetics.

Before I could shape the reality I wanted to bring to life in the pages of my books, through the language of a spiritual essentiality, the rose transferred the following words to my soul and mind:

Only About Me

On January 12, 2016

Try to define yourself and reach yourself by reflecting yourself in another being.

He never looks at me, but always listens to me. He doesn't need a vail to hide his worries. I still know nothing about him, after so many nights and days paraded through the changing circle of inserting the known and lost. Does he wink to the entire history of the universe? Only he recognizes me as I am, I care about his opinion when he takes my main writings into consideration, evidence of my exemplary behavior towards limitless knowledge over which is spread the memorable embrace of the never-before-seen.

The mark of a strange apparition in the world of my own thoughts is an uncertain direction of research. To discover his particular version of manifestation I have to let myself be carried away by a new order, abandoning myself like a stray from another world, sewn from an undiscovered law of time, in a risky game of sincerity. At the same time, he seems to be dominated by that note of elegance with which the painter puts on his easel his own pastel shades, feeling attracted to the aesthetics of a world that can at any point transform into a metaphor, a comparison or another figure of speech, because everything in his life seems to have a meaning of the fabulous and the miraculous.

If I were to make a trip to his world, I should refer to a passage from Golem, by Gustav Meyrink:

"Now I know who the stranger is: I need only want to and I can feel him again within me, anytime. But to see his face in front of me, eye to eye, is not possible, nor will it ever be. And I realize this: it is a sort of negative, an unseen matrix that I cannot comprehend and in which I have to sneak into, if I want to become conscious of the form and expression it has within me."

Leadership: How do you approach the reality of your own existence through an image that reflects the context of the memory of a concealer of confidence able to take possession of the most thoughtful thinking of your mind?

I still do not have a rigorous definition of it. If I were to describe this entity of surveillance, as a pulse charged with an energy of high vibration, of an electromagnetic nature, I should first try to characterize the living systems through those essential traits that allow for their opening in a thermodynamic of matter. What are the defining physical characteristics of microscopic living systems?

He accepts my weakness as a gift of nature, which he is not allowed to treat lightly, knowing that my totality works easier when grateful than when in debt. It is the convention with myself, the intermolecular force that invades my neural space, my entire body, my soul, with electrifying vibrations. It is the reviewing with all that means spirit, it is my retrieval, my cry for help, the natural intelligence aligned with the requirements of an existing determination outside of immediate understanding, my alter-ego in the past, present, and future.

Twisting my mind through the words of Yugoslav writer Mesa Selimovic, I try to understand my variations under the influence of a central power: "There is time for everything. I gave it to myself, and on the thread of judgement there will be hearings and testimonies. I shall not go around them, and I will eventually be able to utter my own damnation, because everything is about me in this case, and no one else. Only me."

The most thoughtful thinking of a man's mind depends on how he manages his identity, so that no one replaces him with a duplicate of his. The fact of being identical to one's self, the original, without relying on anyone else, is a form of manifestation of faith in an ideal for unity that you have transformed into reality.

Leadership: Do you seek in your relationship with the world a certain development that will not become absurd in extremis, as a consequence of the astonishment of seeing yourself alien to yourself?

He who dares speak of himself following experiences enriched by hidden things and embodiments, fundamental for resetting consciousness, is capable of defining himself in terms of belonging to an entity higher than himself, according to a higher intellectual standard.

Leadership can be modeled through a phenomenon of the type "Return to someone else of your own". Launching a calling to a return towards a new, possibly more realistic orientation and, at the same time, reliable, removing the waves of a sweet drift. Seeing yourself as a stranger to yourself, someone else to whom you thought you are, reflects a certain tendency to exteriorize feelings, thoughts, motivations, the understanding of a world you know very little about, a world that forgets its past, and gives you the fundamental virtue of being able to transfigure yourself into another beginning of mentality.

The man who found his reflection in a different being, standing face to face with himself, so that he can become an integral part of a higher way of thinking, can, at any given time, smash the walls of the prison symbolically called "The Old". He becomes, through an acceptance of ideas and self-induced beliefs, more or less viable, the owner of certain virtues that could constitute the way of recognizing himself as an individual separated from the world, as a better companion of his individual life on the path of development.

Leadership based on the recognition of a guiding identity is an assumed and balanced way of concentrating on what you didn't know you knew about yourself in a context like "Looking at yourself from outside yourself with your own eyes."

The best leaders know they have to measure up to themselves, to the shadow and light within them. Within them, everything is more active. They are not the prisoners of a conditioning of reality projected inside of them, but always – especially in the most reflective of moments – it seems they are following the advice of Romanian literary historian George Călinescu: "Do not allow others to discover what you represent ! Define yourself if you have this ambition and you will be believed ! "

"Strive to understand yourself" is the cry for freedom of people that seek within their relationship with the world a certain development, one that will not become absurd in extremis. Harder than anything else is self-acceptance in the sense of inflexibility, the inability to surpass a model worthy of being admired. Difficulty to accept is the feeling of not finding your peace, your meaning, your sense of life.

Ultimately, what is life, other than an eternal attempt to understand your purpose, to build and shape yourself, to evolve and define yourself based on fluctuating experiences, imagination and reality, the conclusions of the intellect, which result from the conversations with yourself. With an alter-ego.

An alter-ego that seeks itself, trying to break free from the crowd, is a habit of the mind to see itself as a winner in a struggle with a present that awaits to redefine itself.

Only About Me I could talk for hours on end, days, weeks, years, without stopping. Because I have a good listener, my reflection in a more discreet presence, but a greater one. While striving to understand it I will maybe discover my relationship with the world, finding my purpose in the book of life.

Only Death Finally Unravels The Mystery Of A Man's Life

Model your character, knowing that the importance of an event is revealed only after the passage of time and after seeing the whole "image" drawn by the force of destiny.

The glory of a captain as great as Magellan will not be extinguished in our day. Among many other virtues that adorned him, one was particularly noteworthy: that he always remained the most steadfast, the most steadfast of all, even in the greatest misfortune. He endured hunger more patiently than anyone. There was no man in the whole world who could better understand the science of maps and navigation than he did. And that this was true is clear from the fact that he revealed things that no one dared to see or discover before him.

Only death finally unravels the mystery of a man's life. Only at the last moment, when Magellan's idea was fully overcome, is the inner tragedy of this lonely man, who was allowed to carry only the burden of a mission, but never enjoyed its ultimate success. Out of millions of people, destiny chose for hard work, only for the hardworking being, this gloomy, taciturn man, closed in on himself – and who, with unwavering will, was ready to sacrifice for his idea all that he possessed in this earthly world, and more than that: to give his life. Only for bitter work did destiny call upon him, not for joy. And fired him like a bastard, without a gift, without a word of thanks. Others reap the glory of his work, others reap the gain, others celebrate victory — for harsh, as he himself had been in everything and with all, did this destiny want to be with this stern and unyielding soldier.

*Only one thing was he allowed, something he yearned for with all the powers of his being: to find the way around the world. But he was not also destined for the triumph of return — the latter, happier part of his deed. He was only allowed to contemplate, to hold the crown of victory in his hand, but when he wanted to put it on his head, destiny uttered a word: "Enough ! " and the hand raised with so much zeal fell inert, devoid of life. **

Leadership: Can the image of your triumphant deed take on the symbolic form of a vision rationalized by "seeing at a distance" and formalized by the control of a pre-drawn destiny?

The concept of "original phenomenon" of the expression of uniqueness attributed to Magellan, can be defined as a concentration of primary energies, functions of sustaining the devotion to the pursued goal that are defining for summarizing another concept (symbolic-archetypal form) proposed by the scale destiny. The question will long be asked: was Magellan an injustice of fate or just a hostage of fate imposed by a harsh time?

If we consider the life code of the destiny of this fearless hero and the formula of his success, we could say that his great deed depended not only on a simple game of destiny, during the almost two years of his expedition, but on an attitude and decisional factor called "the right way". In fact, Magellan's failure was due to the high level of self-sufficiency fueled by the avalanche of emotions that overwhelmed his entire being, even at the moment of success. It is a case of triumphant mental effervescence, because at the last moment, instead of returning full of laurels to Spain, he ventured into a seemingly insignificant action, but which turned out to be the Achilles' heel.

Was it a plan made in advance? Or maybe it was a twist of fate determined by ordinary events, but ended with an unexpected result?

Magellan wanted to show his power and authority in front of a ruined tribe of natives. Behold, the last-minute fatal mistake. Why did he risk his life at the last minute, despite all the warnings he received from his commanders? Why did he not isolate himself in a tower of the saving self-sufficiency of the "chosen ones"? At least that would have saved him from danger. But Magellan did not know how to see through the "smoke", meaning he entered a trend of vision depreciation, it continued unabated on the same trend of linear conquest, but totally ineffective in the end.

Leadership: Are you tempted to make decisions too early in situations that do not require immediate reaction, that is, without taking into account the tendency to see your experience today in the light of the things you once experienced?

Magellan was partly the result of a tendency to see what was expected to be seen, but without highlighting the unexpected. Or, as archaeologist Albert Goodyear put it: *"People tend to see what they expect to see, and when they see something they don't expect, it's hard enough to change their mind."*We have seen that the essential way of acting, specific to leaders, is not only to accept a material of impressions given by a "distant" view, but to count the traces of the activity of the spirit in the timeless field of consciousness, which is equally everywhere.

What was apparently given by a generous destiny, was penetrated by certain acts of apperception. The data is only what is created by that act of conscience that tells you if something is not in full accordance with the will of destiny. Or, as writer Daniel Castro rightly points out: "We tend to see today's experience in the light of what we once experienced. Therefore, we are tempted to make decisions too early in situations that do not require immediate reaction."

On the contrary, in Magellan's last-minute decision, a more vivid, lively narrative tone is observed, in keeping with the "wave-fighting" scenes, as if trying to write his own success story by stubbornly enjoying a "last wave". We see here a robust realism, where the eloquence of the narrator is sometimes confused and loses its breath. And this time, the moment that best clarifies this strange fact, of not being on the same wave as the original plan of destiny, is precisely the border point of the "impossible".

Leadership: Does what you expect to happen influence what you focus on, and does what you see influence the choices you have to make to change what you become?

To speak of Magellan, his concomitant triumph and failure, seems impossible in any other way than stepping on paths beaten for the better part of five centuries. And yet, we always remember him in our minds and in the present, through his immortal deed, by not leaving him to oblivion, but to respond positively to the need to meet once again and each time with the highest symbol of spirituality: "The Dove", meaning freedom and free will.

Due to the fact that the pigeon returns home as soon as possible, his destiny works flawlessly. In other words, once you have completed your mission, do not risk undertaking other missions that would endanger your life and destiny. Get back to who you really are !

"That's all that's been given to Magellan, that's all: the deed itself, but not its halo, not its temporary glory. That is why nothing is more emotional than reciting Magellan's will now that the will of his life has come true and became a reality. Ursita refused him everything he had so humbly requested at that hour of departure. Nothing he had gained in battle, for himself and his family, was recognized in the Capitulacion. Indeed, not a single one of all those dispositions which he had so carefully foreshadowed in his will is given to his descendants after his heroic death; without mercy, he is forbidden to fulfill any of his desires, even the purest and most pious."

And out of the duty to share the destiny of this hero who has gone down in history forever, strengthening the powers of the being from what his genius left us in his short and sparkling existence among us, let us try to take an important life lesson: "What you expect to happen influences what you focus on, and what you see influences the choices you have to make to change what you will become."

Leadership is the reality that you have to see from afar before it fatally surprises you because of an unexpected event.

Only Death Finally Unravels The Mystery Of A Man's Life if we consider that what Magellan bequeathed to the whole world, the purpose of his entire journey, was an idea. As Stefan Zweig rightly wrote:

"More than anyone else. Magellan has always proved that an idea, if carried by the wings of genius, if it is always carried and determined before a passion, is ultimately stronger than all elements of nature. Magellan has shown that one man, with his short and fleeting life, can turn into a reality and an immortal truth what had been only a desire, only a dream for hundreds of generations."

Beyond what has been written and will be written about Magellan's work, the exemplary deed, the mission and the confrontations with the unforeseen that he initiated, continuing to be hosted in the memory of time, they are a proof of the living interest kept for the work that God prepared for him and him alone, certainly one worthy of the great stage beyond the horizon. We will never forget him !

Only The Brilliant Fantasy Triumphs In The Most Difficult Tour Of The World

The man who proves his closeness to an "exemplary deed" also proves his closeness to God.

There is nothing better to prove that Magellan was a master of the art of navigation than the fact that he, who was the first to cross this sea route, remains for a long time the last one who managed to cross this route without losing a single ship. If we think about how basic the means of investigation of his ships were, they had to search each of the hundreds of arteries and side canals, always advancing and returning, to meet every time in certain places. If we think that they could only float with the help of the wind that blew their sails, that they had only a wooden rudder to maneuver them, and that all this happened in an unfavorable season, with an exhausted crew, only then we understand why Magellan's lucky passage through that strait was seen as a miracle that so many generations of sailors have glorified.

But, as in all fields of human activity, Magellan's true genius was – as well as in his nautical art – patience. He showed unwavering patience, prudence, and foresight. For a whole month he persevered in his search, with new confidence and a sense of responsibility. He does not hurry, he does not chase forward under the whip of an uncontrollable impatience – although, in his depth, his soul trembles, of course, at the desire to finally reach the other end, to finally see the radiant immensity of the South Sea. At every crossroads, at every fork, he divides his fleet; each time two ships explore a fjord heading north, the other two set out south at the same time to explore another channel.

This lonely man, born in a bad sign, seems to know that he should never trust in luck. Of the many paths that open before him, he never chooses one at random, as so many others do, leaving it up to a coin toss: heads or tails. He searches and searches all paths, only to find one in the end: the right path. And so, with his brilliant fantasy triumphs and the most prosaic and modest, the most personal of his virtues: heroic perseverance. *

Leadership: Can you complete the physiognomy of approaching an "exemplary deed" that only the brilliant fantasy makes triumph in the most difficult tour of the world, looking at things not only from very high and very far, but also from very deep?

Proof of closeness to the "exemplary deed" is also proof of your closeness to God. This is the power that makes man transgress, by belonging to the most living faith, all the obstacles of space and time. It is Magellan's exemplary deed that has been the hallmark of the power that makes man immortal and eternal, it is the authority of the power to be unique in a space whose pillar of resistance is the dream that makes you move forward, even if there is a crisis in the whole world.

So to complete the physiognomy of this insurmountable phenomenon of approaching the "exemplary deed" that only the brilliant fantasy makes triumph in the most difficult tour of the world, we can say that Magellan looked at things not only from very high and far, but also from very deep. He was like God who, before performing the "Great Work", carefully unravels his words: "My will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

First is the belief in the accomplishment of a miracle, then this miracle can unite the earth of heaven. As Jean Paul said: "What is a miracle on earth is a rule in heaven." Only in this way do we understand why an exemplary deed like that of Magellan, the first man to ever go around the world, is like the accomplishment of God's work on earth. Because faith is not born of a miracle, but of a miracle is born the glorious deed that certifies the faith in a superhuman power that controls everything.

Leadership is based on the spiritual plan of the unseen world, which can be expressed by the following recurrence: "God is shown only to those who fulfill a great destiny by an exemplary deed."

I believe that this is God's will, to be close only to the one who manifests his colossal will to perform miracles. Operating with these concepts, the faith and deed contained in the "Great Work", we must examine man from within, from the deep, to give the revelation of his "inner genesis", the original phenomenon of the expression identified in the language of the dream: "I am the dream that God had upon mankind before creation, surpassing every possible desire and imagination of the common man."

Only The Brilliant Fantasy Triumphs In The Most Difficult Tour Of The World if we consider Magellan's deed. And, with help from the words of Stefan Zweig, the writer most faithful to important facts, I will allow for his words to say it all:

"A man always achieves the maximum possible only when his deed becomes exemplary. And in this respect, Magellan's example – his almost forgotten deed – has always proved that an idea, if carried by the wings of genius, if always carried determined before a passion, proves to be ultimately stronger than all the elements of nature. His great deed has shown that a single man, with his short and fleeting life, can turn into a reality and an immortal truth what had been only a wish, just a dream for hundreds of generations."

Only The Ego Remains

On April 02, 2016

Turn leadership into a masterpiece, integrating yourself in the configuration of facts and events constituting the action of a novel.

There was always a rewritten page in my life that made me vibrate and understand, beyond the cold words of a language full of meanings, the secret of a return to that same turning point, to that same something that went beyond myself, with many signs of explanation difficulty to gather, without forgetting for even one moment that I was conditioned by them. Imagination helps me relive the lives of those who lose it by condemning a tragic introspection, to master the pulse of a human heart, to keep the fixed point of an entire universe sought in vain by hunters of the absolute.

A fragment full of emotion always gave me great joy in showing it as it was, in its original form, in the configuration of the subjectivity of facts entered into a sort of cone of inspiration, discreetly withdrawn in the plummet of redundancies of guidance, in the surplus of free expression. In the midst of trying to form a new art of writing, a form of spiritualization of matter, revelations subjected to esoteric correlations and multiple deterministic pressures due to the combination of practical knowledge, that sense of belonging to unparalleled power through refinement and uniqueness.

Writing seemed like a way out of the Matrix, an escape from the world of the deaf and blind, a surrogate for the failures of a false life. By outlining the dominant ideas and values of my consciousness, feeling my thoughts hitting the corners of a gaze outside of something I was in and I was not, I tried to justify the concentric restricting of that same gigantic pulse that answered favorably to that callings of the longing to know the purpose of life. To penetrate the mysteries of the world through writing and to own as many privileges as possible: "Sometimes I feel it's all too much to take in, I can't hold on."

Leadership: How do you estimate the content of the notion of REALITY from the point of view of some creative experiences that you have at one time ticked as "Extra-Options" for the portrayal of an immeasurable Ego?

Same as in the case of the artists, I was facing the distorted parts of quantities marked by elements of content, bale to be understood as axes organized around a mixture of perturbating factors, hardly receiving from them impulses of the movement of ideas continuously crossed by the abstract model of the concrete phenomenon. The content of the notion of reality that I am trying to define through creative experiences, expressed in the form of text or images, similar or totally different to the field of management, contained more subjectivism, not just the free interpretation of the makings of the world.

Repetitively, I also casted into art all those substantiations of the passing from an area shaded by the direct effect of a "should've been but is no longer there", to an area illuminated by the last inspirational spring of my existence: the neverending story.

Let me try and make a parallel here. The first condition of writing of great American poet Walt Whitman and, at the same time the irreducibility of his thinking, was the conducting of that Ego escaped from the space constructed after his love, along the entire existence, his concentric and successive realization in the whole universe. Perhaps love itself was the result of the creative experience once ticked as "Extra-Options" for the portrayal of an immeasurable Ego.

In this way of gaining experience, through something he cared for dearly, the present had kidnapped his anxiety. In his incandescent mind, at times fogged by variants that could've helped him go back to the track of "there is something unique here ! ", the events themselves not mattering too much, had very little room left. Only the ego remains. But an immeasurable Ego, because it multiplied its prospects of reflecting on it as the universal Ego, as a reception of the idea of expansion of the living matter in the state of aggregation.

Leadership: Do you control the context of your passing from an area shaded by the direct effect of "should've been but is no longer there", to an area illuminated by the last inspirational spring of your existence?

Mobility in the face of the reality of the phenomena of which you are an active part of, the mystic vibration in the face of a transcendent entity, as when you write about something out of the ordinary, characterizes the man who attacks life indirectly, but with an influence towards the immediate fact. He subjects his perceptions vis-à-vis the world to a selection dictated by the inspirational spring of his existence.

These waves of mobility, originating in the existence of a certain stage of contemplation, claiming the joy of existing through a limitless inner vision, crosses with a system of unitary construction of the content of assessing everything that happens to you and surrounds you. The fantastical and adventure originating in the rational.

What you write always goes back to reality, towards yourself, especially towards what the heart calls you to, towards what will fulfill you. In this way, you gain a needful experience through something you care so much about, generating the feeling that you are on your path.

The last inspirational source of your existence is the love for a moment that doesn't go away, seen as a kind of contouring of an overwhelming image of yourself that is constantly transforming.

Love is the variant of an Ego left with nothing else other than the tedious work of integrating itself in the configuration of facts and events from which the action of a novel is made out of.

"What a novel my life has been ! " Napoleon better understood what it means to be a cognizant of life, while he wrote his memories on the island of Saint Helena. Writing was the last inspirational spring of his existence.

The area called "should've been but is no longer there" lies in the presence of a reasoning that no longer considers itself to be almighty, exposing itself to the modality of truly reforming itself. Even if sometimes it is far too late...

Leadership integrates in its basic form that unrivaled quality that leads and dominates man according to his tendency to always soar towards what generates a high inner consumption, the love that rises from the self towards the meaning of life. You must be a writer in order to have access to that always rewritten page that makes you vibrate and understand, beyond the cold words of a language full of meanings, the flux of life force.

To turn leadership into a masterpiece is to combine the knowledge possessed by a spirit of action, in the sense determined by the values of life-filled experiences of learning, with that incontrovertible truth given by an Ego caught in the contemplation of the self.

Only The Ego Remains is the consequence of a deep knowledge conditioned by the tendency to point a destiny at the crossroads of "You could've done but you didn't."

Leadership is a kingdom of the irreducibility of thinking, having as reference the conduct of that Ego escaped from the prison of usual existence and attached to the space constructed after a vision, depending on the state that gives you powers to be unsuspectedly good along a context of appealing to mobility.

Only The Last Stroke Of The Brush Matters

Look for the presence of what bothered you inside first, and in doing so your mind will be filled with confidence.

Honoré de Balzac wrote a short story entitled "Le Chef - d'œuvre inconnu". I will summarize this story according to the wikipedia website:

The yet not-so-famous young painter Nicolas Poussin visits the Flemish painter Frans Pourbus in his studio. He is accompanied by the old master Frenhofer, who comments carefully on the painting that Porbus has just finished. The painting is of Mary of Egypt, and while Frenhofer praises it, he suggests that the work seems unfinished. With a few light brushstrokes, Frenhofer transforms Porbus' painting so that the Egyptian Mary seems to come to life before their eyes.

Although Frenhofer mastered a special technique, he admits that he failed to find a suitable model for his own masterpiece, which depicts a beautiful courtesan named Catherine Lescault, better known as La Belle Noiseuse. He worked for ten years on this future masterpiece that no one had yet seen. Poussin offers his own girlfriend, Gillette, as a model of inspiration. In turn, Gillette is so beautiful that Frenhofer is encouraged to finish his project quickly. Poussin and Porbus come to admire the painting, but all they can see is part of a leg that has been lost in a whirlwind of colors. Their disappointment drives Frenhofer insane, and he destroys the painting and dies that night.

Frenhofer had been more and more torn by his inability to reach his goal because of the discovery he had made, namely that there was no outline, only oscillating shades.

Leadership: Can the importance you give to your own impressions of how you might feel special decide that intensity of emotion that you consider inaccessible to the public and that you feel at the level of consciousness?

It is not easy to stay true to the beneficial values, one hundred percent of the time you give to your own needs and desires, especially when you know that you have to give up old beliefs, old patterns of thinking. Artists who approach everything through the prism of discoveries obtained from the fruits of their own work, with reference to what they leave behind, are driven by values such as the power to be heard, recognition (the claim to be admired) and emotion (that emotion of artistic grace). Nothing can change these values for them except failure, regret for not having lived up to their expectations and, above all, for living up to other people's expectations.

I found a quote this way of the French writer Honore de Balzac:"Only the last stroke of the brush matters."

By this, he also gives the tone in terms of management of that final needful feature of the man aspiring to achieve excellence in leadership. At the head of our "reinvention" movement, adjusting and positioning of oneself (with one's needs and aspirations, but also with one's natural limitations) in the spotlight, stands one precious quality: acceptance.

It means to accept your contribution to the critical situations that alter your fundamental nature, being able to reach even self-sabotage. This quality, "acceptance", is the leading place among the most enduring cornerstones of leadership. Basically, acceptance means acknowledging your imperfection when you are about to glorify your glory. It also means finding yourself in a work that is not necessarily a masterpiece, but a modest composition that leaves much to be desired.

The consciousness you rely on to form a strong personality is directly proportional to the disappointment you experience at the level of a finding that reflects an indisputable reality.

What if we train more "talents", more "geniuses" in the production of leadership without the need for harrowing efforts to maximize our own resources?

The temptation to assimilate an "industrial" leadership and everything that happens in the industry with leadership, we can easily notice, sometimes harder, but always defining, in the way we relate to the discovery we make in a certain field and in the way discovery can affect good mood, self-esteem, the image of the individual in the middle of the world.

Leadership is closely related to the discovery you make of yourself in a context where the importance of your work increases significantly. But the importance of your work does not always determine what needs to happen for your role to diminish or amplify. Consciousness must also accept its subordination to another consciousness, and this seems shameful and unforgivable to me.

In art, the reality you surround yourself with must be congruent with the level of interiority you experience as a kind of spiritual inspiration meant to enrich the dialogue between being superior and feeling the work of your own personality.

Only the last stroke of the brush matters when you want to impose a certain mood that, in many respects, can make you feel superior in terms of professionalism and quality of your work. When you set yourself a goal, such as achieving a lasting masterpiece, you need to maintain a good state of well-being for a winner, a joyful state that, in any way you look at, allows you to build a new personality around the Self.

A special artist is a spiritual personality who remains true to their values at all times of life.

Only The One Who Acquired It With The Sweat Of His Brow Maintains His Fortune

On April 22, 2012

Look beyond the "borders of the earth" to discover your inner greatness, taking as a landmark the experience of transforming matter through the renewal of the mind.

"I am not one for too great inheritances", Alfred Nobel once said in a circle of his brothers and nephews. Life shows us that those who inherited great riches never knew how to make good use of them. They lived a lazy life, fell into disarray, and ended up in degeneration, ruin, and death. Large fortunes, earned by inheritance rather than labor, are disastrous for those who inherit them. They lose all energy, all life power, any drive for endeavor and creation.

We humans have gained our power by fighting hard against hostile nature. Poverty is not good either, it weakens man, humiliates him and leaves him prey to all diseases and sins. The offspring should be left with only a small part of their parental wealth, as much as is needed to begin to strive themselves, to make their own way in life. Only the one who acquired it with the sweat of his brow maintains his fortune.

He was only 63 years old. At the opening of the will it was seen that the scientist had surpassed his first thought: to leave a prize to be given, every five years, as a reward for the most humanitarian work. He had left his huge fortune of over 30 million gold crowns for the good of all mankind. He had thought not only of eradicating wars between peoples, but also of their technical, scientific progress. Throughout his life he had often confessed his belief that the cause of all wars must be sought in the sufferings and misery of too many millions. Removing poverty removes the most important cause of misunderstandings between people. And poverty can only be eradicated through the advancement of technology and the spread of science."

Leadership: Can you reach a maximum spiritual dimension by capitalizing on the scientific potential of "transforming matter into spirit" to produce a revelation of something previously unknown?

What I would like to say in the following could be called philosophical comments on the realistic observation of the great scientist Alfred Nobel. I will add a few personal remarks to push the idea that whoever has a fortune, without having had any success in terms of discovery and creation, will never be able to call himself a scientist, so he will not be able to make the transition from the naive stage of knowledge to the scientific-revealing dimension in which understanding arises as a result of a process of revealing something previously unknown.

Money will not help you learn a culture or imagine the transformation of matter into spirit and spirit into creative energy.

The scientist shows his strength in the circumstances of a difficult, often tumultuous life, where the depth and size of the scientific potential appear as a kind of compromise between comfort and off-road, a compromise between different interests and principles. They give priority to some over others. The time has come to think that, for the time being, there are few technical issues that can make the difference between being good and being brilliant, especially considering the many failures one has to go through before becoming a scholar.

Looking around, most people are looking for financial stability, trying to secure their pension money. Others, seemingly higher in rights, proudly display their emphasis on pure opulence and magical exuberance, and with such good taste I might add: expensive cars, expensive exotic vacations, expensive momentary pleasures. But are any of those incredible discoveries, brilliant inventions, that will change the world hidden in their souls?

To produce a revelation of something once unknown can mean giving shape to an almost paradoxical idea: a successful combination of the rigor of an approach that captures a common transcendental and the fruit of mystical thinking.

In fact, science is an experience of transforming matter by renewing the mind. It is a living experience of effective spiritual fulfillment, translated into the Bible: "Do not lay up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust devour them, and where thieves break in and steal; gather your riches in heavens, where they are not devoured by moth and rust, and where thieves cannot get them: for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

The only "treasures in heaven" are not the gold or precious stones that the earth shelters. These are from the earth, they are only used on earth and they also end up in the earth, in one form or another.

But the true treasures of heaven are the result of the action of the mind: creation, discovery, and invention. It is not for nothing that the biblical cross is the result of the interaction of our mind, soul, environment, and biological being, in different individual proportions.

So, in conclusion, I will let James Allen's words say it all: "Only bold thinking, when combined with determination, becomes a creative force. Even the weakest soul who knows his weakness, if he believes in the truth that power can be developed only by effort and exercise, and if he begins his efforts immediately, and if he adds effort upon effort, patience upon patience, then he will continually develop and eventually gain divine power."

To produce a living experience of effective spiritual fulfillment means to bring the act of creation to the level of discovery, not an imposed act, but an act constituted in the presence of that strong impetus given only by passion.

Only The One Who Acquired It With The Sweat Of His Brow Maintains His Fortune, especially if we take into account the saying that the man who does not know God is a failure in spite of all his successes.

So let us consider that only those who embrace science (the act of creation, the process of discovery, and the passion for invention) will be able to gain that living experience of effective spiritual fulfillment, even at the cost of God's countless failures given to test his faith.

Only The One Who Sees All The Darkness, Knows This

Take a fair fight in order to achieve excellence, without plunging into the deep darkness of emptiness.

Laura Quinn from the movie "Flawless (2007)" is a capable woman, able, competent, with an impeccable morality. But a priceless jewel, or a simple puppet of the system? From the outside we can see her as a man capable of overcoming the world through a discipline and productivity of work, as a leader who knows how to juggle with the law, but from the inside she manifests itself entirely differently, like a feeble branch in the breeze, like a person for whom the soul feels tired by the experience of loneliness and lack of affection.

A sum of thoughts turned into fictitious dreams, a sum of reproaches, and torturous troubles always presses on this soul, guided by the holy law of fair play, in all its forms. Everything that was permitted within the rigid limits of this honest game – of the men, to which the women were never given the chance to dominate, was sinking more and more.

For this strong woman, with high aspirations, yet gentle in her soul, who subordinated all her personal life in favor of the professional improvement, is not promoted to a higher position in the management of the company where she was working.

This thing discourages her. However, as a brief reconciliation with reality, like a star that lights up, to disappear a moment later, she permanently says to herself, self-convincing her Ego, increasingly forcing her ambition, persistently unjustified "I will work harder and better and I'll get where I dream ! I'll get there at any cost, with any compromise ! "

Leadership: Can you evaluate the events in your area of life (most hit by changes) with lucidity and choose the one you would gladly take part in, without welcoming the boomerang effect of an unexpected decision?

However, time passes, and not into her favor. Making her balance, all those years of hard work and privations in life, Laura finds out, splitting into two the bridge between past and present, that she has not reached the desired social and material status, despite her morality, despite her titanic efforts.

Quoting the French writer, Victor Hugo, we could say the same thing about Laura, whom he told about her hero, Fantine, one of the victims of society in the novel "Les Miserables":

"Life and the social order have told their last word. It happened to her all that could happen. She felt, endured, suffered, lost and cried all. She is resigned and her resignation looks like indifference, just as death looks like the sleep. She is no longer aware of anything, not afraid of anything. Even it might come upon her all the clouds and could pass over her the entire ocean ! What's more to care ! She's like a soaked sponge ! "

Laura abandons the right and honest path, when she realizes that the age and the status of a woman will never be an ally for her. No matter how much she would work and no matter how competent she would become, ultimately, she will be forced to leave the company without any special benefit. Oh ! What does that mean? Where is heading this afflicted soul? Why it's like this?

Leadership: How do you evaluate yourself in an impasse: is it a relative cost of prediction error or as a perspective element to be removed from its permanent location?

Allying with Mr. Hobbs, an old man driven by the same ambition and by the same afflicting feeling of fate, Laura partakes in the theft of some diamonds. The world, built by her, with so much hard work, collapses. She bears the consequences of her foolishness.

Just as Fantine from the novel of Hugo, has sacrificed and lost everything, except the immense love for her daughter Cosette, in the same way, Laura Quinn has risked and lost everything - job, relationships with all friends, and all her colleagues in the company, and she was left only with - this incredible fact, truly magic - the sum of one hundred million pounds.

Even so, only here begins the real story. "I never intended this to happen, but the burden of Hobbs' money sent me in a different direction. I discovered the world, and through it I discovered myself."

Only the one, who has felt the most terrible misfortune, is able to feel the greatest happiness. Laura passed through the deepest darkness, and found the strongest light. She married, had children, the most beautiful life possible*, une longue vie heureuse.* She is no longer valued as a residual cost of debt to the system in which it works, but as a chance to release from the past burden of the soul.

However - this thing is worth highlighting - for about 40 years, she donated absolutely all the money - because money does not actually made her happy, and not the particular social situation, for which she has struggled for years to earn it. The whole fight, all the endured stress for achieving the desired high status, was actually, in vain.

Futility is the experience of considering yourself defeated in the face of a demonstration of attitude that cannot convince a reality to be subject to the circumstances that affect your life.

Are you a priceless jewel, or a simple puppet of the system? Do you accept plunging into "darkness" fighting a losing battle in the hope of achieving excellence? Do you subordinate all your personal life in favor of the professional development in the company you work for? Is this continuous improvement in your favor or to the detriment of your personal life? Will you be able to stray from the right and honest path, when you realize that you cannot achieve the desired status? Will you be able to bear the consequences of your foolishness?

The modus operandi of each of us is determined by ourselves, and depends on the accurate self-assessment of our Ego's dimension, with everything is in it (a sum of strengths and weaknesses, tendencies, desires, and so on) but also of the anchorage in the constantly changing concrete reality.

Overestimation as underestimation, the assumption of some responsibilities that are not in accordance with the expectations, can have adverse consequences, constituting a deserved punishment for the "crimes" called persistence and thoughtlessness, as well as for the confinement within the limits of a narrow horizon. A stimulatory combination, but unstable and often unbearable, between sustainability and the slight erosion of your own capacities, that does not bring victory all the time.

Leadership: Can you test your attitude towards the blows of destiny in a game that focuses on multiplayer or single-player from the perspective of reporting a personality profile that does not match you?

The expert in terms of leadership, John Maxwell, made at one time a statement: "I saw what a good leadership can make. It can transform an organization, and can have a positive impact on its employees. "

Before you dedicate a lifetime to your professional improvement within the organization you belong to, be cautious and do not unleash the urge to transcend towards a higher level. Examine leisurely all the possibilities for advancement. Who are those who have the best chances of advancement? Are they only one category of individuals, of which you belong too or not?

A company with a defective leadership can be dangerous for your personal life. Does the leadership of the organization of which you belong practices a game that focuses on multiplayer or singleplayer? Do you accept to be a part of a high-level game that can make a robot from you? In a game that never offers you the chance to win?

Leadership is a game with a very high stakes, which you, as an employee - aspiring towards a higher status, can rely on, but just as well you can be caught in its trap. Be careful in what organization you want to advance, because you might wake up from start a loser. Do not try to fight alone against a system of a "closed circuit". Your efforts for improvement may prove to be in vain, and you can become by yourself a vanity.

A personality profile that does not suit you has as a correspondent the boomerang effect of your intervention in saving a life that is not necessarily harmonious, rather balanced by collective forces that reorient your course in an unpredictable manner.

Be careful with what you wish for, because it can fulfill - but only if someone confirms and amplifies your expectations.

Laura Quinn is the embodiment of youthful power, but also of the professionalism led to the extreme, until exhaustion. While, Mr. Hobbs is "the surprise" the visible manifestation of righteousness, the angel who fails to appear, but always emerges at the most unexpected time - that something magic that infiltrates into your life, by changing your horizons and materializing itself into the most coveted happiness.

Until when will you resist being a Laura Quinn? Do you think you will meet Mr. Hobbs?

Therefore, once again, the audacity to make an upgrade to your own identity and reality, in our case, takes the form of changing the mentality and vision over your own life. The reward is not just a splendid diamond – the benchmark of our power of choice, but a rational act of engagement - existential, marked by our responsibility for the concrete form of configuring the desired future.

A multiplayer is in fact a single-player running concurrently in several directions of evolution, the case of that type of personality who uses their outer life as a shield in interacting with the inner world.

Only One Who Sees All Darkness Knows This marks the establishment of a new path of evolution that changes man's destiny from an unhappy extreme to a blissful state of correct construction of inner balance, without which life cannot soar.

Life sets you many traps and you have to fight in order to get what you tremendously want. Even so, you must take a fair fight in order to achieve excellence, without plunging into the deep darkness of emptiness.

Only Your Eyes Know How To Decipher Me

On March 12, 2023

In art, the most important thing is to see in any creation a reflection of your own being.

Always, as soon as he enters the room, the kitten pokes around with his eyes, exploring every possible hiding place with unbridled curiosity. Sitting in bed and looking at him, fascinated by this little explorer, I realized that he has the artist's talent of not giving up until he completes what he set out to create. Finally, I threw a toy at him, some kind of string motorbike, to get him to play, knowing that his soul belonged to the wandering artist in endless search for inspiration. His keen gaze, like a sculptor seeking the perfect form in the thing he is fashioning, immediately followed the trajectory of the toy and fixed his gaze on it, then caught the toy in flight like a true feline.

As we have noted, curiosity is the dominant, unique force of his world. A beacon of his mind, still incomprehensible to me, guiding him among the things in the room, traversed with irresistible insistence the infinite space of possibilities. This banner of the desire for knowledge, Inalisezzo Ertusoeur, which gives major meanings to his existence, becomes the complex mirror of the world that leaves freedom to the imagination. It is that endless thirst to explore and discover, characteristic of the artist who enhances the mystery with the help of his creative fantasy. In his incessant vivacity, he does not exhaust his energy in the great tendencies of searching for the meaning of life, on the contrary, I would say that he finds it in the simple and authentic moments.

He transforms everything he touches into art, pouring out his feelings and personality on things, like a painter who leaves his mark on the canvas of life, wrapping in minor details the expression of his own existence. In harmony with its own essence, the kitten retains that primordial sense of infinite joy that characterizes thoughtful children, that pure and unaltered luminosity, that soul setting called "The Forever Now" that cuts through the veil of everyday reality. I also gave the kitten a name: "Indiana" (from the famous adventurer Indiana Jones).

Leadership: How would you describe your vision of a perspective-opening life scene, through the filter of a vision inspired by the reflex of an emotional connection with the center of your attention?

It is a great joy to see him play Indiana Jones. Inclined to explore, he is the one who establishes new relationships between the visible and invisible states of things, imbuing them with a kind of magic, Aslabella Urfexides , a kind of personalization that transforms the mundane into the extraordinary, the real into a dream. Above all, the state of exceptional sensitivity beyond the fierce and alert dynamism, makes him adherent to the multiple faces of reality, sometimes calm, sometimes tumultuous, life itself with all its tribulations, exploring and deciphering layer by layer its complexities.

I can only follow him, step by step, out of the corner of my eye, to realize his hidden intentions. On the other hand, adhering to calm balance, in moments of respiro, when it needs quiet and attention to restore its strength, is like a delicate dance between action and contemplation, between agitation and peace. The serenity of a quiet morning, with all the force of its spirit thirsty for life, will invade the environment, giving it the vibration of its own harmony.

He knows how to put his sensitive stamp on reality, a kind of pendulum between the sensation of contrasting simplicity with the inner tumult, beyond human realities, because this cute little animal, in its essence, lives in a romantic key: "an eternal search, a creative restlessness." The alternation between alertness and dreaming, of vertiginous descents and ascents, the tension with which it searches for its own self, is a perpetual ballet of existence.

Leadership: How do personal experiences and individual motives influence the interpretation of a visual representation that can only be appreciated through introspection?

Strange how one idea leads to another. Watching the kitten quickly look for a place to play, I made a kind of parallel with a scene from the novel "The Collector" by John Fowles:

When it comes to art, I respect people only for what they feel, not for what they know and not for their academic titles. There are things in their eyes that I dare not confess to them, but would you like to ask them to I reveal them to him. And the being that I love enormously seemed to tell me: " You ca n't you understand what existed and still exists between me and you. However , I want to see if you have the courage to marry me you ask. Maybe more than that, I want to see if you have the strength to remain indifferent in front of a beautiful face , or to overcome any obstacle to know me and you know " .

A painter might draw an analogy between the contrast between the fragility of the kitten and the immensity of the world around it. A bright color palette could evoke energy and playful curiosity, while delicate touches could capture the vulnerability and sensitivity of the little being. For my part, I could focus on the kitten's eyes, capture in its gaze a portal to a new and mysterious world, so as to highlight the depth of my emotions and desires. Sure you do. I think the kitten's eyes would be a focal point, a mirror of its pure soul and its desire to connect to my world. His gaze would be an invitation, a challenge to overcome barriers and experience the beauty of the world con una mente abierta y un corazon puro .

In art, the most important thing is to see in any creation, in any living form, a reflection of your own being. The inner spring that starts the whole movement of exploration and creation, wrapping in mystery the personality of an explorer, his great passion that he lives in its intensity, in his sharp sensitivity, in his unusual artistic curiosity, makes him an unparalleled creator. What stirs his soul, demonstrating a resistance against the excess of "snorting", humanizes him by saying that it gives his spirit the freedom of unfettered search.

Leadership: What value can give your images the contrast between the center of your attention and the reality of the surrounding world, helping to create a strong visual impact?

If you've read "The Shoeless Man", you remember when he arrives at the Castle of the Capcaun, where he convinces the Capcaun that his master, a poor young man, is actually a rich marquis. The motan uses a series of lies and exaggerations to impress the ogre. He claims that the Marquis has immense wealth, an army of servants and unprecedented fame. Wearing booties makes him seem more important and worthy of respect. In fact, he manipulates the ogre in this way, making him believe that the marquis is a dangerous rival and that it would be wise to ally with him. In the end, the motan manages to get everything he wants, he miraculously takes possession of the ogre's castle, once again demonstrating his exceptional intelligence and courage.

Yes. I've always liked cats. They are brilliant. As for my kitten, nature was able to give him, positively and with unsurpassed generosity, a single stimulating reality, purifying him like a river cutting its way through stones, leaving behind only clarity and beauty. Of course, what animates his entire universe is that ability to see the world through the eyes of wonder, to rediscover every day the magic hidden in the everyday.

Being more of a psychological observer than a simple participant that can include reality itself, the kitten succeeds in revealing the hidden layers of my existence, in an ongoing artistic endeavor, translating into reality its unique vision, full of sensitivity, of deep understanding of the world. I realized that I am like him in that I too look at the world with an equally intriguing and colorful perspective.

Similar to the shoemaker, I seek to bring a dose of mystery and charm into the midst of my creations, as if I were opening a window to the world of stories, inviting the viewer to explore and discover the fascinating universe I create. Last but not least, I thank my kitten for the inspiration to write this article.

All that leadership means starts from the ability to translate into reality your unique vision, full of sensitivity and deep understanding of the world, so that the center of your attention acquires value and inspires transformation.

"Only your eyes know how to decipher me", the kitten seems to tell me whenever I look directly at him, wordlessly communicating a deep connection and silent understanding.

The kitten is well trained to navigate gracefully and intelligently through the complexities of its space, demonstrating a remarkable understanding of its environment. The more I look at him, carefully following his movements and arcs when he slips among the things in the room, himself becoming as if in the center of things, where everything happens, I realize that he carries in himself a part of my personality. Reflecting the same agility and adaptability, finding my place in the middle of the action, I blend harmoniously into the surrounding dynamics.

On December 11, 2021

The creator is an artist because he knows how to look at a vast space with eyes with which he knows how to see in his soul the feeling of total fusion with infinity.

What happens to my eyes, clear, bold, penetrating, is what happens to the sea when I address them with my life story: the eyes become the central symbol in a painting that is not necessarily descriptive, but evocative and profoundly poetic. Here, then, is a sense of satisfaction with the environment, a sense of peace and security. At other times, when the sea is turbulent, strong winds blowing over it, I begin to face a sensation of sand in my eyes, causing the whole painting of my world, evolving according to the times, to acquire a darker or colder tone.

Can this be ignored? My eyes move in all directions, naturally, mechanically, instinctively, without the sea knowing what they are after when the waves become pleasures to the eye. And I wonder: is it natural to let my eyes look at an image that also addresses the hearing, not just the visual, through an aesthetic of effervescent and vivid colors on which are placed the emotions generated by the restlessness of the sea, regarding the turmoil of the sea identified with my own being?

Strokes of the eyes, part of a broader interpretive art, directed towards a wider spectrum of sensitivity, forces of suggestion of unforgettable memories, here are these images that I am beginning to understand better only with regard to the sea, with its waves that sometimes make me forget. And, like it, the Black Sea is very cold, especially in winter, any suffering and shortcomings finding in it a great power of resistance.

Does some indiscretion make me wonder why it's salty? And the sea would answer me: „I am salty because of the tears I shed for all those who do not have the courage to step into the unknown to know me."

Leadership: Can you highlight the essence of a dynamic of life given by your association with the various representations of a space marked by vastness that reflects the particularity of a story with emotional implications?

As I looked at the sea with the eyes of an artist, with respect, with a penchant for a space of mystery and immortality, I could not help but hear the gentle voice from either the heights of heaven or the depths of the earth, or perhaps it was that voice springing from the depths of my confessional conscience. It also commanded me: „Close your eyes and let yourself be carried away by a story."

I closed my eyes and listened to my voice. A timeless storm seemed to pull me back. I wasn't interested in seeing anything, but I've seen it my whole life, and she wanted to hear me. Then the voice commanded me again: „Open your eyes and awaken your senses ! "

When I opened my eyes, I suddenly regained the sight with which the artist must identify before rendering light and shadow in the drawing. A chiaroscuro surrounded my visionary side. There was silence, a twilight silence. Then the spirit of the beauty of the sea, hidden in a setting dominated by majestic expanses, spoke to me like a character embodied in the work of Mika Waltari, in accordance with the world of Dionysius:

„I will gladly follow you. I will follow you as long as possible. But which way will we go after we leave these seas, we have no way of knowing, because no one knows his destiny beforehand. I have the courage to defy the immortal gods by raising my hand to agree to something as uncertain and unpredictable as all other things on earth."

Feeling a shiver run through my body, I closed my eyes again, and from the spirit of the artist – with the ancient spirit of the sea – a series of transient images appeared, like a moving mosaic of puzzles, full of accidental colors.

A voice from the heavens, like a gentle voice from the dark depths, greeted me again, but this time with that echo of the siren song. And it told me for the last time: „An artist who is not engulfed by impersonal inspiration will never be able to look at the sea, which changes color according to the weather."

Then I opened my eyes and was amazed at what I saw...

Leadership is the inspiration you need to keep in mind when building your vision of a model of reality that pushes you toward creation, even when the immediate reality takes precedence over the momentum of amplifying an emotion over a temporary period of time.

Open Your Eyes. And Close Them.. This is the message of an artist who knows how to give his life an extra imagination springing from an endless tenderness of memory, feeling the shape, the proportions of a large expanse, and successfully reflecting this on a piece of canvas. Whereas here intervenes the infinite: the continuous dialogue between what is happening outside you and what is happening in your mind.

The sea symbolizes infinity, time, eternity – covered with the eyes, with the soul, with the mind...

Open Your Eyes

On March 30, 2018

Raise your understanding of what is told through images of a strong expressiveness, differentiating what lays behind them from what gives them stability and durability.

This song has something of a discrete solemnity, leaving me expecting something at the border of knowledge and arrogance, in the perspective of the real-existing alternative of a static picture frame. It seems to be a special law of creation criticized from the perspective of a logical utopia worthy of Iain M. Banks, with cries that overwhelm my troubled inner world in a whirlwind of vividly written experiences.

When I try to taste the flavor of life in the cup of a verse written in immortality, I have a lot to bear, but I always get to the essence.

The title itself, "Open Your Eyes", by conventionally accepting the innovating element by which the work presents itself as a representation of the universe, from the Immortality Syndrome cycle, makes me reflect – blinded by a star whose mass is half the mass of the Sun – at a new dimension of things preserved as a reference in the mastery of the representation of line, color and empirical, subjective, geometric means, in a symbolic word, of the writing of the writing space.

The gaze directed towards the concrete horizon of the sensible world can become a parable of the true science of life, full of wisdom and depth.

I listen to it thinking of the purpose of a new tomorrow, like in a Persian chronicle. I feel like I'm launching myself on an imaginary journey with lots of blooms but so full of meanings. Things are always different when you try to seduce someone with an ambiguous expression. I see through an open window to an endless treasure where the most precious diamonds are contained only by the mind of the artist and by the soul of a gaze towards the concrete horizon of the sensitive world as a parable of the true science of life.

I learned many things from this song placed against the backdrop of a "cover" that reminds one of Carlo Salmoni's surrealistic paintings, particularly evident in increasing the consciousness of a mental state manifested in many ways, intuition-focused attention being the main way in which important things can be better remembered.

Leadership: Before preserving just what is valid for the creation of an artistic finality, do you try to sketch the consequences of your own interventions in the space of a comparison with what is subjectively revealed?

He who really listens to me seems to have gone through the brushes of a perfect impressionist painter, tearing his soul with questions and answers about life in an eternal quest of treasures lost in the whirlwind of the darkness of times that created my dependence on poetic means of creation.

At the words of Sympathy, in Hazar Afsaneh, silent in exploring time as the sound of a needle falling to the floor, I would now refer to the search for meanings of the notion of "light", thinking simply with the mind of an artist in which the link between the macro- and microcosm, providing the consistent exposure of symbolic parallelism: "And if sometimes some people's conversation is more hidden, they do it this way so that they grab your attention and to delight the minds that manage to untie the most sublime thread."

I feel that after I am better oriented in the maze of creation, I will notice that it is not so complicated to unravel the sublime thread of universal memory concealed in a star outside the real world, far away, where the horizon scatters on what could exist and existed only through profound changes towards light, with penetrations into the psychology of art.

Art that learns only from meanings always has a personal character. Whoever dares to understand me, where creations go one after the other, must show the same attachment to the use of color in a space called "Singularity" where the laws of physics, as we know them, cease to function. Tiziano Vecellio would understand me best.

Leadership: Is your approach to the rigors of artistic perfection allowed by the re-assessment of the creator role in an underground of receiving values that question the ways of seeing the world?

To listen is to see. The Infinite seems to be revealing itself to me as a symbol of freedom of expression gained in the eternity of a pure feeling that I have the power to recognize as the natural component of a rising rhythm: "regain your energy and vitality ! " Trance music seduces through the rhythm of progressive becoming, shaping and embellishing the work of creation, carrying you into a storytelling universe, and making you remember who you are in a higher plan of existence seen through the eyes of faith in God.

How fast and fleeting, among their attributes, must be the states of the soul existing in a variety of artistic expressions, such as the smile of a ray of light thrown over things hidden in the shadows or in a deeper darkness. Wherever it walks, the eye of the mind sees a trajectory of boundaries, or the boundaries of a territory to be populated with shapes, perpetuating perfection in a moment that transcends time.

What a splendid journey to the magical world of a time conceived as an abstract composition of verses without real significance or with many possible meanings, whose duration can only be extended by the shadow of a memory, into a philosophy of history overflowing over the whole creation of a world that is changing.

The values of my art, such as expressiveness, uniqueness or imagination, question the classical ways of perceiving the world in that they can be regarded as a path that always allows for wandering, as a radius whose brightness darkens with the lack of knowledge of the great mysteries of creation. I, the artist of many centuries to come, think it will be so: from my renewing art the whole world will feed and change, but nobody can easily understand it.

The horizon of affirmation of an art of great originality is accessible through an accumulation of tongues that are instilled in your mind with every moment in which you get rid of thoughts and emotions, even if they do not scream to be felt and accepted in a story space.

Open Your Eyes to see everything from the reverse of what is revealed to you through the labyrinth of an illusion that gets accents of reality, even when everything is shrouded in doubt as a question regarding the various aspects of relating art to an ideal of personality.

Behind each image, a meaning is hidden, and what assures stability and durability of the image is the understanding of this meaning that tests the viewer's attention. What did you find out about me after going through this article? What exactly did I hide from you, and how can it be clarified?

Ordinary World (II)

On November 04, 2017

Learn to accept yourself from the perspective of an abstract force, in the way that the possibility of seeing a new face of reality becomes possible.

My life seemed to follow a mysterious internal scenario, an isolation from the rest of the world, an effect of the moment of illusionism that made sense only in the closed world where the trajectory of an imaginary story inhabits the little history of an arrow that nothing and no one can stop.

A connection with the closest relation between the definition of my superior power as being decisive, the struggle for an exceptional achievement and the aesthetic experience of the sublime, necessarily implies a value of "sacred fire" that God has transmitted from His Heart to mine.

I understood all too well the challenge emanating from the sublime demonstration of faith, the exemplarity of a life lived in honor of a magic circle from a world of magicians, a clear symptom of an isolation that betrays the condition of human being in the consciousness of a higher and wider reality, which must only be deciphered.

The apparent impossibility I have penetrated through the demands of a compromise with the sky that often opens its abundance of powers and zeal, a combination of psychology, art and faith equating to a view of nowhere, abstract and embedded in a spiritual science, in the unity between idea and image, it was just a matter of fact: "I've been waiting for you ! " Of course, in prolonging the melancholy of an intense, but unreciprocated love.

What contributes to confirming your divine essence is the passing moment of the present you experience in a world that exists only in the imaginary plane, but with an impact on reality.

When you suddenly wake up seduced by the unbelievable wonders gathered by the most unpredictable thoughts and feelings in a single stone trunk of the crypts specially arranged in the depth of an immaculate exigency to the holy ones, only betting on a playlist of the proposed music for a mood of due solemnity, you are thinking of Aladdin and the enchanted lamp, or the sheikh of an all-powerful Arabian tribe, completely different from the original stories.

I felt I could intelligently co-ordinate everything through a virtual reality from which I could only escape by crushing what was simply brilliant.

A movement on the trajectory of a sacred geometry. I was rather programmed to endure it with stoicism in a setting intimidatingly called "the presence of God", against the laws accepted by the condition of analyzing a work of symbolic art, called the creative mood, a transfer of thoughts full of nuances, sometimes absurd, between Tolstoy or Faulkner.

For beyond what seemed to me to be my work, besides those of the sympathetic magic arsenal, the desolate tendency to conceal the truths of the phenomenon was forming: "Chill, is it something real."

Leadership: Can you show off the authenticity you are experiencing when you are in a position to accept a narrative challenge whose referential plan is symbolized by an unseen mystery?

By comparison, I felt like an instance of an executed program of another special generic unit, usually called a wake-up, but one prepared beforehand and mixed with the reflex of a reduction from more to less, like in a mirror labyrinth which masks the output of an unused logical gate: Pars Pro Toto.

The effort to understand my purpose, to build and model myself, to evolve and define myself, was deduced from the desire to towards things hidden that are delegated through the eyes of a future without a past, the significance given to the representation of an invisible presence constituted as a whole, based on imagination.

Romanian literary critic, Ion Negoițescu, tried to understand the mystery of the profoundly revolutionary change in the way of thinking, feeling, and life of the divine man, referring to Dostoevsky's horizon:

"Why does Prince Mishkin feel alien to existence? Because he is constantly confronted with the problematic nature of existence. The epileptic enlightenment does not belong to either psychology or mystical ecstasy, but to confronting the void. But everywhere, here, psychology cancels itself out, for the feelings and actions answer to what mathematicians call a point of escape.

Like Mitia Karamazov, like Raskolnikov, he must always respond to something tied to a mysterious "beyond", something from beyond a gulf that man can not traverse. Mishkin does not symbolize Christ, but somehow announces Him, his words and deeds hinting indescribably towards the meaning of existence, towards the divine."

To acknowledge the limits of having a purpose in a divine order means to always answer to something tied to a mysterious "beyond" the edges of a gulf you cannot traverse.

If I wanted to be prepared for a situation of being as consciousness registers, no matter how exalted I was in the face of trying to connect to the Divine Source, to eliminate the negative aspects of thoughts, deeds, actions, I had to expect the risk of confrontation with nothingness, the pain of knowing myself far away from myself, my soul feeling the need to reflect in a result of inadequacy in the direction of a destiny devoid of brilliance.

Still I can't escape the ghost of who I am and who I used to be to a great extent of God's intervention.

The final decision that basically involves choosing an alternative to exploiting your own autonomy from several possible alternatives in terms of how to fulfill a commitment to something greater than yourself can be seen through the perspective of what you become when you feel that you are in the presence of a Higher Authority, before which you are responsible.

This decision gives coherence to a mind that thinks in the rhythm of a perceived world from the height of the view of an almost fantastic journey, initiative in an imaginary of ascension and one of descent, synonymous with a path to the edges of the horizon surrounded by an endless abyss. A horizon called "Faith" and a gulf called Waiting."

To listen to the guidance of life engaging in a dialogue with God means to collect the pieces of a true puzzle, until you come face to face with a reality you would not have had the courage to recognize before.

Ordinary World is a life without victories. The greatest victory you can make in this world has as its main feature the power of removal from a certain context of your existence by untangling or breaking the link with everything that is measurable and predictable in order to shape a new relationship with a new reality.

Ordinary World (I)

On October 30, 2017

Learn to discover the world you live in, giving it the sense of "inner experience" through a voiceover.

I started this strange game of search, waiting and programming of events that should have happened to me, extended to exasperation by the painting of an ordinary world, because a high contrast reason that concealed its fault: between madness understood as a rebellion and out of the usual patterns of thinking. "I won't cry for yesterday."

It was an opportunity to exploit one's own memory, a culmination of searching for lost sight and retrieving inner gaze, of what is not said but feels like a complete overwhelming, is transmitted as a divine grace that is charm and poison at the same time, for with them and their content old wounds are cleaned and life is revealed. "I learned to survive."

Same thing now. Often, thinking about what to do the next day, I end up always turning back and facing what I feel in relation to what happens to me when everything is questioned, fighting, adventure, meditation, running, blind escaping, under the care of a God who does not cease to marvel at the capabilities with which he himself endowed me. The beauty of this frontier phenomenon between heaven and earth, between psychology and faith, is flawless, even if the beauty of a painting and the atmosphere it emanates around it is superior.

Though spoiled in a positive sense by this great senior who balances the good, in the form of a rapprochement with spiritual concerns, a state that psychologists call reverie, a necessity that the French call Reconnaissance, a quality that sculptors call the "movement" of the immobile form, I try to distinguish myself fundamentally from the idea of continuous renewal of life and to pas under the suborder of another mystery called: the present moment. "What has happened to it all? Crazy someone say."

Leadership: Must you go through the testing phase of a reality that exceeds you through its complexity, to help understand the concept of "circumstances" that guide your conception of a higher calling?

You cannot participate in a contest of circumstances, with all your tendencies to undermine the rules of the game by prolonging a mystery of divinity, a thrill of an unknown feeling, forbidden and suspicious, rather than plunging into an empty space. Where the idea of a "déjà vu" would work, given by the brain's reaction in the face of new and intense experiences that you have never before experienced.

He left me in the vacuum of my heart, especially if I admit that His infinite power, a reality for which I am not prepared to accept completely, hides the tendency of an unbearable uncertainty, including regarding a particular super solicitation of philosophical orientation in the critique of reason that I chose as a milestone, accepted as an art work and almost on the point of being sold for scrap iron.

Living in a sea of uncertainty means thinking about one question from different perspectives and giving a response that does not clarify anything or does not continue to reverberate with you with infinite force.

And when everything is in the form of a game, a suspicion of a lack of courage to look at reality in the face, as when you are looking for something impossible to predict, after betraying the science of impulses to exaggerating feelings, beyond any limits, the outcome lies in "hunting" details that transform you in a nonconformist and also hesitant guy.

Your aspiration to understanding reality is the manifestation of "I am" directed towards things holy, which makes you recognize that often the answer to the obvious questions is not the assumed one.

I was different than the events of life predicted, upon which I built myself a history, a gallery of paintings where there are few original and many copies. The strongest thoughts in the replies, in the order of relevance and quality promoted by the acceptance of a situation without the knowledge of the hidden details, focused in a direction parallel to the horizon of a world dominated by the maneuvers of decisions made with haste, and afterwards regretted. "Somehow I have to find what I do not know where to look."

The dimension that limited me, which belonged to my level of communion with God, that voiceover, seemed to be especially designed for deception, an epic ambition advancing at random, without a precise meaning, creating confusion at a level of needs, expectations, emotions, a multitude of effects, from the most natural to the most extravagant bows and traits of my flesh.

It is clear that I was not ready to come face to face with the truths outlined around an interrogation of the type "Where is the life that I recognize?", just because I thought myself fit for another determination of my position in relation to the alternative ones, not necessarily in absolute value. A thrill of transcendence. Finally, another name for the tenacity of the will to live, the sense of failure or unfulfillment of Revelation, exactly as implied by the need to add to it an area that many call "the end of the world" or "the spiritual path" towards those visible only by the senses, and not by reason.

The most supreme call of all, like the happiness that life puts in our way, but one we often detour, has the particularity of being the quintessential of many voices saying "I'm not here", but to which we cling hopefully in the name of a positive energy meant to direct us in a bright direction.

The essence that makes you unique is the call that you assume in achieving a higher level than yourself, whose aim is to discover the world you live in to which you should give the sense of "inner experience" through a voiceover.

Ordinary World gains the meaning of listening to the "parties" involved in your knowledge and feeling, and later receives a large extension in the area of life with intensities varying according to your level of perception of everything that comes from a God who seems absent in the palpable reality.

Oscillations Into The Unknown

On February 27, 2013

The way you contribute to creating your own identity outlines the true value of your leadership.

I was subjected to the merciless confrontation with the unleashed reality of a world "off its handles". My world, integrated into a Dali painting with absolutes. The final round of a giant game, revised in the backstage. The expression of a tendency towards indeterminacy. The shaking of beliefs and aspirations acquired during the process of allocation and knowledge refining.

The true test of creativity was to see myself as an alternative to reality, as a result of increasing the value of a thought that, by not recognizing its own limits, fascinates through the labyrinthine interpretations of creative experiences.

Many days have passed without me finding answer to questions that worried me. Unceasing, I was immersed in my dreams and thoughts, surrounded by the sweet heat of ecstasy and also, lastly, chained like a prisoner in the solitary of despair.

A rambling thinking, generally directed toward absolutes, inspiring little confidence, and not related to actual reality, determined me to always reach wrong conclusions. And, by analyzing them, I always discovered, like after a short snooze, something new, but inconvenient and inconclusive.

The identity I built from my attempts to get to know myself was the condition of my existence to transform into a destiny specific to those who embrace the essential content of an invented reality.

What interpretation could I give to these conceptual perceptions and relationships, to this strange twitching of lucidity, to these short snippets of time that completely absorbed me, to these identity spaces that kept decaying and replenishing awry, to these overtensions that often produced long electrical sparks, which seemed to ramify from the positive to the negative pole of my existence?

These overtensions propagated in the conductors of my research line, in the left and the right of my convergence point: the inability of the man inside me to get used to the tragedy of creation, that I can no longer honor the other joys of life.

Leadership: Do you start looking for an image of yourself and of the world from the point of view of building an independent reality in a plane of the expressive ways of the innovative spirit?

Pierced by a deep spirit of truth, I became more and more aware of what was happening to me: I live always watching for the next moment. More and more enigmatic, my mind was boiling with ephemeral ideas, flowing in waves one after another, by the requirements of living with shadows and grace, maladroite et imprécise.

I seemed to rationalize like old Stillman from Paul Auster's novel, who roamed the streets easily advancing, little by little, making breaks, then getting on the move again, then stopping again, as if each step had to be balanced and measured prior of taking place the total amount of steps. And who, however, as if subjected to a conscious purpose, never managed to get out of a strictly limited area, bounded by other streets.

The significance of these brief disgressions, of these electrifying moments of my existence, which seemed to give me a touch of personality, continued to escape me. I had to think and anticipate every move I made, and always assign it a different meaning, as in an equation with many unknowns. An innovative spirit knows how to find correspondences between a conventional external reality and a personal, subjective one, in order to offer another ascended variant of its being.

But, at the same time, something inside me resisted to everything that meant change, to everything that exceeded me. I did not want to accept the uncertainty of the "unknown". These unknowns that escape any explanation reduced mandatory and essentially to my power to search and find the purpose of my existence. Above all, alchemy is nothing but an adventure chaotically set in the human existence, and, like any adventure, it is not explained, but lived.

To start looking for an image of yourself and the world from the point of view of building an independent reality means to extract from your life those meanings attributed to the relationship between what is revealed to you as the beginning of a story and what you are ready to give up to get into the skin of the character in the story.

Do you face the reality of an unleashed world? Are you anchored into a thinking routine that determines you to always reach the wrong conclusions? What interpretation can you give to those strange twitching of clarity that surround you? Do you live always looking for the next moment? Is your being able to accept any unknown?

Something must be done for everyone to change, to reinvent themselves. Some spirits, limited by the fragile shell itself, never succeed.

That is why so many companies make available their authority, energy and even the most valuable resourced for things to happen, to make it simpler for those disadvantaged by themselves or the system – thus trying to make a luxury item from leadership. But the result demonstrates more the opposite – a "cheap" art, available to all.

In reality, the leadership that these companies adopt and share is the result of misinterpretation, calculation and thinking, thus becoming the state, the hope and the constructive solutions it cultivates, something rigid, some king of hostile or totally ineffective "presence". A process that advances and takes places in an ever more arid, volcanic and barren desert, with black stones. The force of passionate calling, made by words, like a tsunami wave that changes everything on the outside, but nothing on the inside of man.

From this point of view, leadership turns into an unmanageable phenomenon. It becomes like a livable space, to be divided to new tenants – too many and too crammed into a more and more stranded space, where only items do something.

If you really want to assimilate the science of management, give up the small place where you confined yourself and extend into a larger and more comprehensive space, with panoramic views: the reality of life and resizing it through what you are and what you can be.

Leadership is the attempt to give a new name to the creation called "identity" through what you are and what you can be by representing your own world in another way of defining the meaning and milestones of existence.

Oscillations Into The Unknown are caused by your efforts to discover your true potential, by your degree of awareness and acceptance, to become responsible and independent, by keeping a certain balance in the interaction with events that happen in your life.

Let's remember what Russian writer Maxim Gorki once said: "Among the hundreds of millions of inhabitants of the world, we see so few well-defined characters – great people."

Are you a great man or a cheap imitation of some that have excelled in leadership?

The way you contribute to creating your own identity outlines the true value of your leadership. Leadership is a field in which you develop on your own. Is up to you if you become a great leader or a trashy kitsch.

Our Name Will Live On

Be the model of the sacred perception of time, creating a work that transcends the immediate and establishes a relationship between awareness and reporting to eternity.

"I am in the mortuary chamber of the Pharaoh. Many skeletons. The gramophone does not help me. The work is hard. It makes you think of immortality. To the common man, I imagine, the Egyptian notion of immortality is the most absurd superstition. But that is only for that our idea of eternal life has changed, whether we are Christians or not. Although we agree with our Nile ancestors that immortality is the most important human achievement (more important than love or a vague reputation for virtue, far more pressing than friendship), we are not so crazy as to imagine that our bodies will be transported to the afterlife.

We use a different vocabulary, salvation of the soul, eternal glory. Call it what you will, but to carry on your name after the names of your inferiors and tormentors have long died out, is one thing we all hope for. And, the most delicious thing of all, to make it happen before their physical lives are over, so that they feel the last threads of their names shatter while they still breathe and realize that when their rotting skeleton will be discovered and thrown into the ground, they will already be an anonymous pile of hair and skin, merrily on their way to becoming anonymous carbon dust, while the rest of us will become suns and stars.

Leadership: Does the reputation you build help you realize the power to make your name linger in the world's memory, knowing that your representation in society is a mirror of your values, actions and contributions?

I don't know anyone who doesn't aspire to this permanence, even if they say they don't. The world is full of triumphal arches and juniors who don't know how, artists who chatter away stressed that their work will last, poets who kill themselves to secure their fame, words spoken with the tongue of death and wills that try to -controls the heirs, names read annually in churches and synagogues, gravestones covered and declarations of love on the deathbed, wills and nominated donations, money left to political parties and charities. We are all still very Egyptian, no doubt.

I'm not an idiot. When the time comes, I know I'll be dead. I shall not run my fingers over the strings of a winged harp, nor even (as I had planned as a boy) savor the hot, carnal delights of a palm-fringed afterworld, guarded by Anubis and assisted by Isis. I'm talking about something easier, smoother, more unassailable and inexhaustible from an intellectual and spiritual point of view. Immortality for us, even if it is incorporeal, is not without consciousness: the consciousness, at the very moment of the expiration of our bodies, that our name will live on."

Leadership: Does achieving a noble purpose and maintaining a virtuous reputation give you the opportunity to contribute to the perpetuation of your name and the perpetuity of your impact on a perpetuating image?

With care and virtue, with a wisdom beyond youth, you will be able to build a lasting reputation, ensuring that your positive imprint will continue to reverberate gloriously in the world around you, even when your earthly body dies. . Especially by aspiring to virtue and living in accordance with spiritual values (knowledge, enlightenment, freedom, harmony), you will be able to create a deep connection with the world, thus ensuring that the meaning of your name will persist in the collective consciousness, even after what you pass beyond the boundaries of physical life.

Do not forget that the foreground in which you detail your image, in a setting of advanced wisdom, will allow you to precisely highlight the essential features of your character and highlight the aspects that will captivate the viewers of your image. This requires a symmetrical and harmonious overall vision. Basically, you have to imprint the image of yourself in the line of the visual horizon of others through symbolism, marking a visual landmark, a place of collective memory, emitting at the same time a feeling of unity with the gods, with nature, with the stars or with the ancestors.

Your image itself must explore a possible history, a poetics of the renewed reception and exhibition spaces of art, adding visual compositions as indispensable accessories of art. Be the model of attention and visual perception, creating works that transcend the immediate and establish a relationship between symmetry and awareness. It gives the spirit of observation, visual memory and openness to superior images with a great color range and stunning contrast.

Leadership: Can you give a quick exposition of their existence in the world, trying to convey the sense of distance or closeness to the image of a superbeing endowed with immortality?

History tells us that many leaders liked to explore a quick exposure of their existence in the world, trying to emit the feeling of distance or proximity to the image of a supreme god, through tones and reflection effects in the constructed image. For example, observing the painting made by Jacques-Louis David, the famous museum piece "Bonaparte crossing the Grand Saint Bernard", we immediately realize how precisely the general was outlined according to clear instructions (worthy of a wise ruler).

It is said that David wanted to paint him as a sword-wielding hero on the battlefield. But Bonaparte uttered the memorable words: "No! Battles are not won with the sword, I want to be painted calmly - on a wild horse."

Dedicate your life to the sublime, so that your leadership may come to life and endure over time, exploring the visibility beyond the present, by creating a glorious image that bears the seal of your divine origin. Basically, your image marks the horizon line and separates reality from interpretation by achieving and capitalizing on your results obtained in a certain field, or through a leading position. Be careful how you outline your image, so that it is more than glorious, it is memorable and inspiring for those around you.

Leadership appeals to the salvation of the soul and the pursuit of eternal glory, serving as a reminder of your responsibility to contribute to a positive legacy, marking your presence in human history.

Our Name Will Live On if our character and attitude will be well impregnated in an image that reflects metaphysical dimensions with a special spiritual charge, as it becomes, first of all, a window to the depths of our inner being.

Pact With The Devil

On May 27, 2010

Reevaluate the way in which you respond to the influence of the superiors, by passing their character straits through the sieve of your thinking and feelings.

The Emperor Qin Shi Huang has only one thought; or rather, he is possessed by it: to be immortal. He paved his way to the throne, removing all his potential enemies, but in front of his most feared enemy, the death by itself, he remains forceless.

However, one day, he finds out about a witch, gifted with special power who was rumored to know the secret of eternal life. He immediately orders General Ming, who was his right hand, to find her. So said, so done. Even so, Zi Yuan, which was an extraordinary beautiful woman of whom he immediately falls in love, and with her help, he discovers in the Turfan Monastery, which sheltered the biggest library of the ancient world, the secret of eternal life.

Zi Yuan appears in front of the emperor who, very pleased of her, promises he will fulfill any of her desires.

- I want to spend my life with General Ming, says the witch.

- Of course, replies to the emperor.

Convinced that he will respect his promise, Zi Yuan opens "the oracle of bones", a collection of mystical symbols of the ancient world, in which laid the secret of immortality, and pronounces the spell in an ancient language that only she could understand.

Leadership: Is your decision-making capacity strongly correlated with the preference for fast action from which a life philosophy based on a "price repositioning" that turns you into the man of tomorrow?

However, after the spell comes into effect; something totally unexpected happens; something that Zi Yuan did not expect, something terrible. The emperor invites her on the terrace of his palace, shows her General Ming tied by both hands and feet, and says to her:

- If you become my queen, I shall let him live.

Zi Yuan looks sadly at the one to whom she wanted to spend the rest of her life, now condemned to an awful death, then, in a moment, she turns her eyes towards the emperor. Now, at the nick of time, she realizes what kind of man he is – a man who cannot be moved or impressed, a man whose desires you try to satisfy in vain, because he will get rid of you once you become useless.

- You will never keep your word, she answers him with a trembling voice.

- You are right, says the emperor. After that, he gives the execution order. And immediately after General Ming is executed,with deliberate, boundless mischief, with an awful hate and cruelty, he takes out the knife and sticks it into the witch's stomach.

The surprise attack on your own allies is the only rule of the leadership experience that a superior man follows, one who cannot descend to mortal status. He cannot claim to be defeated by the exclusive privilege of mortals, to serve a high ideal, but to comply with reasons stemming from reasoning that after a road to hell, you can no longer receive mercy to transfer yourself to heaven.

Leadership: Does the price you pay to prove your supremacy reposition itself to the resistance area of your "work" depending on what you are able to sacrifice for a page of glory in history without affirming your true intentions?

Is the work in progress you contribute to with the cultivation of people's discernment born from egotism, cowardice, blind ambitions, or meek egotisms, hesitations or deserts, contrasted by a serene figure, pure thoughts and impulses? Is this work the consequence of an immeasurable ambition to the victory of a destiny that could choose good, but didn't?

The scene I just told you about, from the beginning of the movie „The Mummy – Tomb Of The Dragon Emperor (2008)" has given me many answers. First of all, that a man tortured by an eternal desire, a man who does not live, who toils but for a single idea, and who would do everything in order to achieve it, can never be a trustworthy man. His inner self, so full of his own idea, does not allow him to feel anything towards anyone, to attach, not even for a moment, of somebody.

He will always refuse, with an arrogant insistence, with an unyielding obstinacy, any possibility to become friends with someone, or to enter any serious partnership with someone. For a man whose destiny, which he himself created and assumes it with all his dedication, is to subjugate the world, by all means, to his own desire, cannot open his heart and show goodwill to anybody.

His unshakable, delirious determination to achieve his goal makes him completely dull towards anything human, towards any human sufferings and needs. He pointed it out well, whoever he may be: "The one who serves the one who should not be served will find his doom."

Leadership: Do you practice a philosophy based on total power by denying any norms, values, beliefs or realities, being among the protagonists of the charity event: "Be the superhero of a ruined dream"?

It is strange how people often realize in the very last moment the true side of the human nature. And even more strange is that no one questions the witness of solidarity of those who lead them, than when their character traits emerge, so when it is already too late.

The one who trusts more in the words of a person without scruples instead of listening to his own senses and instincts, is not fortunate to achieve happiness. A tyrant can win people over his side through the ardor of his passionate temper, his remarkable animation, by promising everything, but he will never be able to be attached of someone. He can exalt people's heart; can offer them a feeling of solidarity, but only for a short while, until his character traits will come to light.

Do you know the character of the one that leads you? Are you aware of his vision and philosophy? Would you follow him if you would find that only his personal evolution is his life's desideratum? Do you have the ability to recognize his way of relating to other people?

The superhero of a ruined dream is like a character that is almost devoid of a story, housed strictly in the embodiment that has managed to overcome its limits, but cannot be alienated from the sense of guilt associated with a psychological pathology manifested through insomnia, obsessional and depressive states.

The price you pay to prove your supremacy is accompanied by a few words that manage to admire the drama of the one who lives his years in an escape from the vanity of this life: deception, distress, continual tension, a freedom built in the wilderness, an everlasting unfulfilled promise.

Conclusion: A partnership requires, besides mutual benefits, efficient cooperation and mutual trust based on actual facts, as well as good intentions in achieving the common goal. When one party has hostile intentions, continuing the so-called partnership means entering "a pact with the devil", and sooner or later everything will fall to pieces.

Do you recognize the importance of selecting the right leader? Or you choose from despair? Can you identify a true leader? Are you reasoning deep and cold the quality of a leader?

It is not easy, but essential. Your future depends on its own, largely on your ability to see and choose. If your choice is good, the benefits will increase, otherwise your problems will seem almost never to end.

Reevaluate the way in which you respond to the influence of the superiors, by passing their character straits through the sieve of your thinking and feelings.

Paganini And One String

On November 15, 2014

Continue to focus on what works by improvisation, so as to integrate yourself into the depths of leading experience.

The famous Italian violinist, Niccolo Paganini, was playing before a large audience when a string off his violin broke. He marvelously improvised and continued playing. Then another string broke. And then another. Soon he was left with but one string. Paganini continued to improvise and finished the composition with a single string. When, finally, the applause faded, the conductor turned to the audience and shouted: "Paganini... and a single string ! " The crowd began to cheer and Paganini began to play again with a single string. *

Leadership: Do you lose control of "magic" in a reality of accepted limitations, more than accepting the power of Creation in ascendancy with the predominance of improvisation experience?

You will not be able to really explore the depths of leading experience if you lack the ability to establish common meanings between the two constants: "the predictable" and "the unexpected" – in the presence of a consequential director represented by the complex report between inclination and duty. The accumulation of these two constants takes shape in a reality of accepted limitations, in favor of focusing on outcomes defined through the prism of maneuvers of the type "slalom through errors, inconsistencies or flaws."

You must first accept limitation, so that afterwards you can transform it into a small work of art. This limitation is given by the inability to demonstrate a special ability when all the others are put on "pause", being the essence of leadership to know how to turn a moment of complacency into a moment of great brilliance.

If you try to only within stimulating and convenient frames to reach performance, being involved in the reports of the professional affirmation process and the creation of an as good as possible image, then you will not be able to evolve towards a higher value. Because the activity you carry out can change your expectations. All incoming impulses from the outside world may come over you with terrible power, the limits you reach becoming an inner experience. In this case, you are confronted with the imperative need to choose between being true to the expectations of others and being am experimental model for some vain ambitions.

When you find yourself in the shoes of the magician that loses control of his "magic", distancing himself from his own model of innovation, you begin to manifest your complexity from the perspective of an Ego that feels abandoned by any form of trust and any hint of inspiration. This Ego starts holding you captive within a horizon of expectation, in a concrete "somewhere" which recapitulates and repeats itself all the time, until reaching an "elsewhere" that eludes the significant. This, in leadership, is called "The Effect of Changing the Experience of the Regular Functioning."

The leader is a mathematician of the formulas of continuing concrete experience, able to solve an equation with many unknowns, or rather, to bring it to a solvable form by resorting to the algorithm called "Possible". Acting in accordance with the rules of professional responsibility, by composing the norms of professional responsibility, he opens the door for a reasoning that modifies the perception of what appears wrong during his "representation."

The power of Creation lies in the artist's ability to design a new expressive, impactful and relevant content, in a reality that stubbornly closes it in a selfish, lonely self, without means of consolation.

Paganini And A Single String brings into view that unexpected situation in which the results can be quantified only through fireworks of acumen and creativity. In leadership, limits can always be pushed forward. Actually, true experience in leadership, victories and defeats on the background of unexpected challenges, is to be authentic in what you claim even when you are about to run out of credibility and value.

The limits of your own performance are not found, therefore, on the path of your progress in a certain direction or in a certain model of operation. In fact, you will encounter such limits only when you deviate from the normal way of producing results, heading towards situations for you are unprepared. Your enthusiastic vision about the possibilities of operation (through improvisation) should be imposed to the uncertain results that suggest the existence of certain inherent barriers that you must surpass.

Painting Is The Mirror Of The Creative Soul

A world that the eye takes in chillingly becomes the background for a personal inner journey.

Sometimes I imagine that I am a creator of universes because my art transcends ordinary reality. Only in this way can I reach the divine essence of creation, esa perfecta armonía de la existencia , in a symphony of colors and forms. Hard to believe, isn't it? I still don't know for sure where the inspiration will take me, I don't even know if I will achieve the perfection I dreamed of, but I often see a lot of color in my future works, a lot of vivid blue, and already I feel myself touching the creative potential, not the limits imposed by the increasingly gloomy setting of the world.

In the barely perceptible silence of his workshop, where the shadows of memories mingle with the beatings of the present time, sits the master, his face beaten by the winds of the ages. His name was a timeless murmur, worn by the ages, wearing various masks: alchemist, physicist, magician. But in every existence, one thing remained unchanged: the unceasing search for knowledge, the unquenchable thirst to unravel the mysteries of the universe. In the end, this is also a gift from God: to know how to find the essence of what is hidden beyond appearances, beyond the forgotten veil of fruitful life.

On December 01, 2024, in a thousand centuries, of an endless cycle of reincarnation. I have always been someone else, but I have remained essentially the same." The right half of his face, marked by faces and symbols, recalls the mentors and rivalries that shaped his path, those transformative experiences that sculpted the essence of his being.

Leadership: How do you manage to provoke the viewer's conscious perception, when the visual perspective oscillates between concrete and abstract elements of your composition?

To the left of the room, as a kind of memento mori, a figure pushes a massive pendulum, in a continuous struggle with the measurement of time, refusing to yield to the predetermined order. This is the man from another life, when he mastered the forces of nature, seeking to turn lead into gold, reveal the secrets hidden in the stars, and defeat time itself. But the deepest transformation, the deepest spiritual leap, came not when he split the atom or when he summoned the spirits, but when he opened his heart to the divine. That life was the most beloved of all, for it was the life in which he met God.

Painter: "Why, Lord, are the world's colors so vibrant and mine so muted on the canvas?"

God: “You don't just paint colors, you paint emotions, hopes and pains. Your colors are reflections of your soul, and every shade tells a story.”

Painter: "But how can I capture your light in the darkness of the canvas?"

God: “Enlighten your heart, man. When you do this, your light will also shine through your colors.”

Painter: "And how can I see beyond what is seen?"

God: “Close your eyes and open your soul. That's where you'll find the answers you're looking for."

Leadership: Can the fusion of artistic vision and transcendental experience change your perception of time and reality, revealing unsuspected connections between the visible and the invisible?

I sit in the silence of the room, thoughtful and brooding, feeling my being vibrate with the echoes of past lives, as if I were a container of cosmic memory. Art transcends temporal boundaries, uniting the past with the present. The massive pendulum in front of me, as far as I can see it, seems to beat to the rhythm of the universe's heart, reminding me of the days when I thought I could control the very essence of time. How naive I was, thinking that power means dominating nature! How blind to true wisdom!

Yes, I look into the mirror of my soul and see the man I was, blinded by ambition and thirst for knowledge, so close to the divine and yet so far away. I still feel that burning desire to discover the secrets of the universe, to turn lead into gold, to hold the key to immortality. But now I understand, more than ever, that true alchemy does not take place in laboratory retorts, beyond the barriers of physics, but in the depths of my being.

Alchemy is a metaphor for inner and artistic transformation. Even now, I try to remember the exact moment when everything changed, when I stopped fighting the forces of nature and opened up to something bigger than myself. It was a moment of grace, a revelation not from the stars or books or chemical experiments, but from the depths of my heart. In that moment, I felt the divine presence, a love so vast that it dissolved every barrier between me and the universe. The viewer's eyes are invited to see beyond the immediate reality of my paintings, to see me as I am in a setting of eternity that God has created for my immortal soul.

Leadership encompasses the process of inner transfiguration, letting go of conflict with outer circumstances to facilitate openness to a more comprehensive and deeper perspective.

Painting is the mirror of the creative soul when the artist completely abandons himself to the creative process. And that's because in moments of total abandonment, the inner essence of the artist manifests itself freely on the canvas.

Now, in front of the pendulum that marks the inexorable passage of time, I realize that true victory lies not in conquering the world, but in finding your place in it. I feel like every beat of my heart is a silent prayer, a gratitude for the gift of life and consciousness, just as painting is a mirror of the creative soul.

I still wonder, how many others are wandering the path I left? How could I convey to them that true power is not in control, but in trustingly abandoning yourself to the divine mystery? The transformation of lead into gold metaphorizes the process of artistic creation.

Finally, I feel how each breath becomes an invitation to a deeper, more authentic existence, because each moment is an opportunity to transcend the limits of the ego and touch the divine. And in that acceptance, I finally find the peace and fulfillment I've always sought.

Painting Must Be Seen Through A Single Window

Every painter must try at least once to represent the splendor of nature on canvas, so that nature is a projection of his inner states.

Painting must be seen through a single window, as is the case with things made to look like the number 0: if you want to render a round ball high, you need to make it long, according to the same law, so that by standing behind it, it appears round. For this we must take into account the first eight parts into which the painting is divided: darkness, light, body, face, color, place, distance and proximity. Two more can be added to these: movement and stillness, because these are necessary to be depicted in the movements of the things imagined in the painting.

And, of course, the painting is divided into five parts. The parts of painting are five, namely: surface, shape, color, shadow and light, nearness and distance, or I could say: movement and enlargement, which are the two perspectives, as in the reduction of quantity or the reduction of precision of things seen in the distance, as and colors; and color is that which diminishes first, at equal distances, and that which lasts longer.

As for the two main parts into which the painting is divided, here they are. There are two main parts into which the painting is divided, namely: the contours that surround the imagined figures and that demand to be drawn. The second is the shadow. And the drawing has a very great merit, because it is not only in search of the things that can be seen in nature, but also of an endless number of others, which nature does not make. The drawing commands the sculptor, as well as all the manual arts, to carefully finish his embodiments, and although their number is endless, to show them in their perfect completion.

To this end, we will also conclude by showing that drawing is not only a human science, but a divinity in all the power of the word, a divinity that also manifests everything that God undeniably created.

Leadership: Can you relate the rendering of a phenomenon of nature to the fact that it previously had the value of sensations and states that defined man at the moment when he contemplated his image?

My opinion is not different from what Leonardo Da Vinci said above. The observer of an image, like an abstract painting (thanks to the flowers with petals that combine white with crimson-red), can only see the outside, but not the inside. Although, this is the most important characteristic of a masterpiece: the viewer of a painting must first of all feel the feelings of the painter, not contemplate the spectacle of nature (presented through an authentic coloring) through a permanent static attitude.

Every painter must try at least once to represent the splendor of nature on canvas, so that nature is not only a projection of his inner states, but also a projection of his own existence beyond infinite time and space. In vain does the painter attempt to draw the shape of things, in the most vivid colors, if the observer fails to penetrate the mystery of eternal things that unites him with God.

In the work of the painter, the description of the image of nature must be inseparable from his life. And the observer of the painting will find that it is not enough to know the states of the painter to be able to see the diversity of nature in colors. But if the observer directs his attention to some previous states of the painter, he will find that he can safely foresee the unfolding of the phenomena of nature, since the painter's behavior appears reflected in the form of aggressive or calm colors.

If the painting is successful, the observer will connect the rendering of a natural phenomenon with the fact that it previously had the value of sensations and states that defined the artist at the time when he created the image. Thus, if the observer is not able to directly observe the inner part of the painter, he will not be able to predict the course of his existence, especially if he takes into account the previous values of what he can observe. The possibility is motivated by the correspondence between anticipation and reality.

In order to resize leadership and integrate it into the space of art, you have to argue that the leader himself is an artist who conquers the world with his paintings. An artist who knows how to capitalize on his symbolic potential, an artist who made a creed out of being the eternal mirror of nature.

Painting Must Be Seen Through A Single Window that provides a wider perspective on the inner world of the artist. This window must ensure, at the same time, a good view of the landscape, which, however, can degrade if it bears – by analogy – the consequences of the inner conflicts that the artist faces.

Inner conflicts occur when a part of you wants to believe one thing and another part of you is totally against that thing.

Pars Pro Toto

On March 13, 2016

Learn to capture the part that reflects a new dimension of the already-known, using that sequence of transformations that contribute to the maturing of the relationship between the particular and the general.

But more than that, Eisenstein uses the close-up and in a way similar with what poetry calls a synecdoche. It is the ability of film to recreate within the consciousness and feelings of viewers a whole through one of its parts. The entire representation of the medic Smirnov is in the detail of that pince-nez of his, remained hanging from a rope, after the uprising of the sailors.

*This detail has a greater emotional power than representing the doctor himself and his throwing overboard. Pars pro toto, the part acts here for a whole and is included in an ensemble in which, in turn, the likeness of the doctor is shown, in its particular, a general idea, the idea of the social class he is part of, the role of this class. And further, the uprising on the "Potemkin" is the part that reflects the entire revolution of 1905.

Leadership: Can you create in the consciousness and feelings of people a WHOLE through one of the components of your artistic creation, so that the whole representation of the reality that you are about can be embodied in one single detail?

In the case of the most complex form of artistic production, also called an authentic creation through which a certain theme is imagined, analyzed and constructed, with great relevance to events more or less significant, there are two different systems that operate in series.

In the first system, called however for personal reasons "Extractor", more suggestive and concrete details are extracted from the perspective or experiences of certain personalities towards an illustration that goes from image towards a certain type of reality, sometimes in a deductive guise, breaking down into acts and deeds anything that falls under the incidence of an order of the primordial. Here are filled the gaps created by the shortage of information which the subject has, for deciphering, understanding, interpreting a new phenomenon, an isolated case.

The second system, called "Reactor", that for every image decomposed, different options of customization are used, includes the key elements perceived as being benchmarks for comparison with what exists outside of personality, through a series of transformations that contribute to the maturation of that segment of the relationship between the particular and the general.

For leadership to be labeled as a means of personal expression through the very participation to an original act of creation, susceptible on a certain level of depth and integration of the being to a certain reality, first you need to capture that part that reflects a new dimension of the already-known, a parallel one, which translates life or events in a different composition – an artistic one.

The whole representation of the reality you create can be contained in one single detail when the reasons of the theme chosen to be exposed highlight, particularly, a general idea.

Basically, the most relevant part that mirrors a particular aspect of the historical moment in Eisenstein's film is not given by that stormy period of revolution in which spirits and currents evolved in an unprecedented acceleration, vertiginously. But, above all, it is given by that vivid torch of the Revolution which, tragically, makes the connection between what happened in the souls of men and the event that has triggered profound and substantive transformations, making the image of the future be open to an attractive, up-to-date experience.

Pars Pro Toto is that part of overlooked reality that, containing all the steps of a story, fuels the entirety of what you want to transmit.

Film directors are the biggest modelers of the world, succeeding in creating within the consciousness and feelings of people a whole through a component part of their artistic creation.

The argument of a certain idea is an integer expressed in a complex manner, which can be placed between any "brackets", interposed in the attractions and challenges of the real or unreal world. The representation of that idea needs to be included in the significant detail of an event, of a character, or of a milestone.

People Are Haunting Me

On May 25, 2017

Start adopting a proper attitude towards the entire creation representatively called life, to bring it closer to receiving a work of art.

People. Good people, strengthened throughout the attempts to overcome any obstacles, achieving maximum results, boldness that is sometimes "paid" through an open attitude to loneliness. The people snatched out of the double-oscillating hourglass that gradually changes the phenomena of reality, which correspond to the aspirations of future fulfillment, in relation to the destination and functions that the resistances of a censoring force in the Self meet.

Through the craft of transcendence toward a state of inner balance, of ultimate spirituality and grace, they give in to the warmth of the environment throughout the length of an uplifting experience, from which the content of unusual experiences is composed.

The art of putting a breath of life into an inevitable desert, with its dunes full of restrictions of freedom, can be seen only through the mirror of a soul that is always lost for a minute or two. You miss it, as you miss the beauty of a sky-colored rose, the nebulous reveries of an active fantasy, driven by the circumstances of the science of the fullness of God's presence. Even when the longing falls victim to the sin of bearing with it the message of pain.

The people, positioned in the situation of Jean Valjean, shining between a nuance of the consequences of world injustice and the saturation of remembering the reason they were chosen by God. Over which years pass so easily. Demonstrating that you have to be really great to understand yourself.

Though very tried and exhausted by fate, like any soul rejuvenated by the aspirations of magnification, but guided by this infallible cornerstone of any misfortune, Jean Valjean saves a man trapped beneath the wagon. By doing so, he performs the supreme gesture, an act of piety, the true forgiveness that brings true deliverance to the burden of past mistakes, demonstrating how much the safety of consciousness contributes to the security of prosperity.

Leadership: Can you see your own image in someone else, against everything you lift up in a light that keeps you awake?

To live in an indisputable place – this being the escape, escaping the blindness of intimacy built in years of living in parallel, both from the bruises and the exile of a destiny seeking its healing, in the long silence that reveals hidden fears. Does this not mean that you are like a genius who has occasionally slips a word of spirit, and in this genius, in this imperial power that is considered to be of divine origin, which we so often refuse to know, does not the safety of the one who is valued by the testimony of a vision over time reflect – to which the infinite is attributed?

Remember little Cosette, a defenseless being, who sets the real and legitimate demands of human nature with a renewed breath of dreaming but deeply beaten in the circumstances of a world that has lost its compass. It is a parable of the condition of playing with fate.

She builds her future, the nerve of a new life, through a doll received in gift from an angel.

Then succeeding in escaping from the hell of a memory from which we do not have to remain loyal, a resuscitation of the genuine suffering endured only through the unwavering hope that one day everything will turn into peace, peace, joy.

The degree of perfection of man belongs to an existence that is prepared from the excess of an emotion that you would not even have thought yourself able of and from which you cannot escape.

Cyrano de Bergerac, with his Moon States and Sun States, reminds us that the stars are fixed, just as the laws and principles of the universe are unshaken, that is, worlds we do not see here because they are too small and because their loaned light could not reach us. But just as God could do the infinite world, if it is true that eternity is nothing but an endless time, and the infinite – a stretch without boundaries, so could the immortal soul of man.

And when I think of such an uplifting spirit, who always says YES to the universe, I remember the background voice from the end of "The Book Thief":

"I've seen a lot of things. I witnessed the worst disasters of the world and worked for the biggest villains. I have seen the wonders of the world. But it remains as I said. No one lives eternally. When I finally came to Liesel, I felt a selfish pleasure to know that she had lived 90 years. Her stories excited many. Some of them I met in passing. Max, whose friendship lasted almost as long as Liesel lived. Almost. In her last thoughts, she remembered all those whose way crossed with hers. Her three children. Her grandchildren. Her husband. Among them, as lanterns, were Hans and Rosa, her brother and the boy whose hair had always been the color of lemon.

I wanted to tell the book thief that she was among the few souls that made me wonder what it is like to live. But, finally, there were no words. Just peace. The only truth I really know is that people are haunting me."

Leadership is a decisive criterion of truth that you must never miss: You cannot live forever, just as you need to know that God is not everything. As one might say, the miracle is not to live forever; it is reflected in what you remain forever.

If I thought it appropriate to draw attention to this aspect of the human dimension, with its implications, I only did it to highlight those elements that are usually forgotten, or that many have not noticed. Based on the examples subjected to my own appreciation, I wanted to highlight the necessity of presenting the totality, inner purity, of the divine that dwells in the depths of every human being, manifesting progressively through the thoughtful forces of time and its effects: pain, mercy and supreme happiness.

In this way, it may be easier for us to adopt a proper attitude towards the entire creation representatively called life. Let us raise it intentionally and consciously in our eyes through a "flicker of light" on the pedestal of a golden dream, a wall of support and a child's smile to bring it closer to receiving a work of art. On the rhythm of a reading of the song: The color of love (by Yakuro).

Leadership means to reach an understanding of your purpose by agreement of the thoughtful forces of time and its effects: pain, mercy and supreme happiness.

People Are Haunting Me is a journey into the space of thinking offered by an incomprehensible world, near a color, a shape, a flavor similar to the seeds of a divine creation from which we must extract that power, that pure energy, from which we are what we are. A star, chained into the body.

The Perfect Master Of Composition

On October 25, 2010

Consider obtaining high performances in order to avoid the lack of "glow" that can diminish the quality of your leadership.

The first thing which the Russian film director, Sergei Eisenstein, had asked the great composer Prokofiev with whom he collaborated in numerous movies, was the music for the sequence "The Oath of heroes" sequence that he wanted to be filmed on the base of music. Eisenstein had not concretized the way in which should be built the sequence. And for this time, the music performed by the great pianist did not please him.

Then Prokofiev got angry and declared loudly:

- I will never write music without "scraps" that is without drawings because only so I can follow all the nuances of the film director's thinking.

Leadership: Can you best represent your vision through the transfiguration power given to the artist, a real one, able to convert ambiguity into a functional and sustainable factor?

If your performances stand under the sign of a doubt, then your leadership value is also uncertain, and its duration of operation, and the way in which you transmit to others your beliefs, scale of values and feelings to which you link to them, is no longer certain.

In everything that you elaborate you must start from a very exact study of the reality of others, and their acceptability according to their ideal of professionalism that they carry out in themselves, and from their vision towards perfection. Your leadership must be the result of a severe process of deliberation of their essence, of their tendencies to "pimp up" their activities and results, without putting in doubt the ideal path that they want to follow.

From the production of that little incident, the working method of the two artists functioned perfectly, without differences of opinion. Since then, the collaboration always followed eight precise successive moments. First, Eisenstein showed him the montage sequence. Then, the sequence was clocked, after exposing his desire for music. He expressed in a plastic way these challenges:

- Behold, here must sound like someone would snatch the child from the arms of a mother ... (or) ... to make to be heard as you hit a bottle shutter.

Prokofiev always showed himself excited of such plastic indications. And once the frames the composition, were fixed with precision, on Eisenstein's taste, he composed the music that was part of the previously calculated network measures.

Leadership: Is there any debate regarding your creation about the meanings of art and visual representation (in the sense of realistic judgments) that the concept of dynamic efficiency serves?

We have to learn something from these two artists. Always, the work in a team must be carried out in a perfect harmony. Just as between the heartbeats and breathing there is a correspondence, so there must be a correspondence between your level of thinking and of other the people, with whom you work, even if at first glance might not be obvious. And the creation you bring to life together must culminate in credibility, in creating a leader profile, or in what you are able to bring out of a simple mistake.

In order to avoid the lack of glow that can diminish the pure aspect of your leadership, you must consider obtaining high performances. The more your performance will shine in the eyes of others, the more they will become more aware of your own value, and will report more easily to your interests, your expectations, to your skills, and your results.

All that create can be identified in the leadership that you practice. Everything must be thoroughly and accurately deliberated in relation to the ability of expression and suggestion of each element that defines your style of work and management, in order to avoid the lack of some imprecise coordination between your perceptions and of others.

Just as a skilful painter performs compositions by handling colors, so you have to "handle" people, so that the collaboration between you and them to take place in an optimal way; you need to transmit your own thoughts, ideas and certainties, so as you transmit your willingness to help them develop, by focusing your efforts to an optimal accomplishment of the determined results, and of course considering the time factor.

The concept of dynamic efficiency has as its first consideration the capacity of artists to reinvent themselves through the "mix match" option, but also the common ability to produce from a simple error a topic of great interest.

At the same time, artists must critically perceive reality and extend it through the research and investigation side of the highest aspects of consciousness of a certain archetype of dedication, will and determination.

The Perfect Master Of Composition can be considered any leader who, based on his contributions to the smooth operation of his activities and of the other partners, manages to create a special feeling of stability at his workplace. Teamwork is a "composition" of efforts, analysis and achievements that a leader can shape at his own will. However, it must resonate with the reality of others, with the thoughts, feelings and their expectations; otherwise your contribution will be considered ineffective and will not be received properly.

Conclusion: If you want to be a perfect master of the "composition" called leadership, if you want to become that factor to which would refer all those around you, then you must make hard work, you have to be that example that should be followed by all, you need to get those professional performances to shine and to be followed by all.

Strengthen your relations of cooperation and determine that people to understand the importance and quality of their work - on which depends the whole team performance. Just as the tone makes the music, so in working with people you need to use the right tone, tact and tactics that would be understood and accepted by all.

Perfect Silence

On December 13, 2015

Support the effort of understanding your reason of being, taking into account the immense value of self-forgetfulness.

The momentary perimeter of my consciousness was quite limited due to the density of unspoken thoughts. The bracelet of my identity I leave in your care ! Thoughts uplifted from the gloomy darkness of self-forgetfulness, like a thread of smoke from the house lost in the cold of winter, absorbing my raison d'être from its purest form. "The most perfect silence is when there's no need of showing."

The ration between the difference of potential applied to the ends of a conductor and the intensity of the current that passes through it is, by definition, the electrical resistance of that (passive) conductor. Admissible. It is easy for me to understand that everything flowed from this strange, but true law, including the power of forgetting myself, beyond everything that was temporary, from the outburst of an Ego that experiences its multi-dimensionality. "Something is true when you see the same pictures from another point of view."

Thoughts are the expression of a current that grows and becomes strong as you focus on an imaginary fact without interrupting you. I could easily imagine how things were against the multi-dimensionality of my distinct being, reluctant in recognizing the immense value of a breakage from the real when it came to me indulging into the madness of believing in something beyond myself: the fiction of living in a haze. "The most perfect moment is when we just come from different circumstances."

Eric, the hero of one of Herbert Franke's novels, tried to represent his own image, moving through the oversized rhizome, along with his impassible and alien to human kind companion. He would represent the deserted vastness of the Cosmos to himself and within it, the speck of dust of the star Heyse II. It was precisely there he was located, with his mission and helplessness. Something within him refused to consider this fantastic as being reality. But the truth was, without a doubt, true.

Leadership: Can you represent your own image in the name of a truth you experience in relation to the density of unspoken thoughts?

Famous writer, Ana Blandiana, had a clear thing in mind and she asked: "Who among us could explain the beauty of this road through the mist, the beauty of obscure courage and the victory of each conquered step of the way?"

Perhaps in the mind of the man hurried by time, in which are gathered regularly the thoughts that flatter visions and support aspirations of strengthening a new form of wisdom, slowly opens, in the mark of a significant image, the path to a much more interesting world. But one which belongs to the traps of a wandering, of a freezing of the self.

My thoughts seemed as unintelligible as a non-grungy diamond that awaits someone to discover its glare, beyond what I could know, whose value exceeded the horizons of realizable expectation. I know that I was trying to give a picture of what I could expect to see in the future, to reach the high heights that will not change with the passage of years, like when you want to discover in an invisible box those things that no one knows. But always something awakened me from the dream. It was the consciousness of not slipping too far into the utopia of a moment's exaltation, strange drunkenness of a short miscarriage.

Certainly, the truth we experienced in relation to the density of untold thoughts could be matched with a perspective of improving an ideal of solidarity between these two extreme units: the intelligence of turning reality into fantastic and the fantastic into reality.

We become birth givers confusion from a perceptual point of view, being subjected to investigations of our own image, when we place our trust in a new being, where the reception of the world unfolds on the basis of a set of thoughts that keeps that maintain the well-defined relationships between two characters. One who constantly judges himself and the other who finds himself in a world attached to the real one, called "Nowhere."

Leadership starts to take shape through the materialization of a vision that rekindles that struggle of the two characters, the harmonious intertwining of the two twin-dimensions (the episodes of the soul's life) influencing the way in which you redefine your style of being.

Leadership: Do you truly understand the essence of what it means to have an image and not have content as you focus your mind on a thought that tries to gain consistency?

When the momentary perimeter of your consciousness becomes limited enough due to the density of unspoken thoughts, producing that boundlessness of self-forgetfulness, meaning the identification with something in which you can lose yourself completely, you become a victim of your own explorations, a victim of your own way of thinking about the meaning of existence.

To create an image of what you are, of what troubles you, of what makes you cheerful or sad, without giving it a certain content and direction, is to lose yourself in a labyrinth of unnecessary ideas and elements germinated just for the sake of creating an attractive pot for fast-view audiences (to meet the demands of the quick viewing).

Leadership can keep its status as a configurator of your own becoming, making accessible the creation of mental representations of the most meaningful perspectives of reality, when you establish a new direction to follow in life.

The inner satisfaction confirmed by this new direction, bringing a sort of understanding of the moments of failure and of accepting any type of experience, is an essential factor in relation to personal success.

A thought that does not begin to gain consistency is a condition of self-forgetting during a reality that you can never meet in everyday life, one that cannot be conceptualized, which is not at all verisimilar. And a thought that draws consistency is the fruit of a fiction that turns you into the image of a world that inspires the search for true change.

Perfect Silence is the moment of maximum lucidity when you speak to yourself, you open the path towards a more critical approach to the experience of dreaming, meditation, and you realize that the only way of redefining yourself as a strong man is to change the direction of view, without being accused by someone else that you can not see anything but your own ascension in isolation.

Perform Your Tasks Properly

On July 11, 2009

Keep moving on the route towards excellence, without diverging your "traffic" of efficiency to a wrong direction.

For about 10 minutes now, a fly has chaotically been fiddling right round me. I'm sitting at my desk, over my computer, spewing my mind into the last chapter of my latest book. Because of the buzz, that's getting more and more grating and annoying, I can't focus at all on my work. I decide it's time for me to seal the deal. I'm going to try and snap that devilish thing, if not, at least chase it out to the window, back to where it crept from. I'm focusing on that tiny little beast.

I'm hunting its abrupt fly, every twist, every "lay-over" next to my desk. Bang ! All of a sudden, the fly piles on right beside my printer. There's a fair-sized elbow room to get it. I roll up lightly, cat-walk style, avoiding spontaneous movement; I see it close by, right round the corner, that's unthinkable to miss it. Crack ! I hit it ! What a glorious fun, what a pleasure rushes through my veins for defeating my enemy. Enough with the buzz and the trouble, I can grapple my pen again. I've already wasted about a quarter of an hour with ruling it out.

I sit comfortably in my chair and I start to type. I feel livelier, more able-minded to pursue my work. It is quiet - a nice quiet, full of intimacy. And suddenly, in that silence, from somewhere close by, is heard again that awful noise. Buzz... buzz... buzz... another fly pierced through the window.

Leadership: Do you make the mistake of believing that you can keep the score of 2-0 in your favor in the game with the experience of evaluating the things that you focus on, without exceeding the limits of the detachment from yourself?

A leader extracts value from personal experience by evaluating the things he focuses on, but not from the perspective of satisfying his own needs, but from the perspective of understanding life. For him things are like paintings, under which something, an idea or a concept is hiding, in no way represent a return to attitudes that are typical of reactions that can be said to express physical or psychological constraints reflecting the factor of "limitation" in terms of orientation.

Concentration is a form of special attention and is the most important factor to achieve maximum results, fast and efficient in our work. If we want to achieve good results, then we must focus only on the tasks we have to meet, giving up the ability to see the things that interposed between what you have in the "dish" and your reaction to what is happening to you in this situation.

We have the power to choose the work on which we focus on, regardless of what happens around us, no matter who diverts us. We can choose to concentrate on primary things or to badly heed on frivolous, twelve-penny things. The main rule in our activity is to opt for always concentrating on the most important goal, despite the things that happen around us. We are the ones who decide how requisite is to achieve the goal we designed ourselves for, we are the ones to determine the one thing we have to lay our focus on in order to achieve our goal.

Leadership: Do you represent in a pattern of efficiency your natural tendency to visualize things: as a whole that fulfills your existence, or as part of a load that narrows your horizons?

Whenever you have to fulfill an important task and especially if you proposed or you were imposed a deadline, you need to focus quite right alone on it and not to allow bluffing around until you put it through vividly. Your evolution within the company you pertain to often depends on your ability to focus on one task you have to fulfill before the deadline. And in crisis situations, when various demands arise, you cannot afford to waste your time or not to proceed in a professional manner.

It is strange that many people do very much so - they always waste their time, always lose time chasing after flies, hoping that someone will finally betake their duties and fulfill them. Other people devise other ways of pottering, very obvious, like taking smoking or lunch frequent breaks.

What thoughts float through your head about the employee that takes a cigarette break every 10-20 minutes or that, all day long, from the moment he gets to work till he finishes his duty list, his brunt is to vanish himself to the shop across the road to get something to eat? You can't ditch those kinds of people (especially in public offices and public services) that fudge, ill-disposed and that, at the end of the day, they will advocate fiercely and with formal arguments that, in fact, they didn't enjoy enough time to accomplish their duties. Oh... so much sweating !

Leadership: How many expectations do you have of what surrounds you when you place yourself on a level of understanding and responsibility close to the context of a misunderstanding of your goal?

A misunderstanding of your goal resembles a fly hunt: you are entitled to catch them, but because their number is too big, it just so happens that most of them will escape.

Leaders have great expectations from their team members. They do not want under any circumstances be simply spectators in their team to carefully monitor "on edge" those who really give their best interest to work helping the company achieve its objectives. The team-members need to heavily endeavor in order to lighten the leader's burden, to bring their contribution to success of the company. They have to help him make the right decisions, come up with new ideas to improve the performances of the company.

Leaders are looking for serious and active people in their team that will make their contribution as more and more effectively as possible to the achievements of the company and that are willing to do what others refuse. You take delight to see how people you trustingly hand-picked to be part of your team are eager and impatient to put their talent, intelligence and dynamism to serve the company. And it's, indeed, a great joy to reward them for their hard work, for all the efforts they make in order to develop and streamline the activities within the company.

Leadership is the impossible you seek and find without running after supposed "equivalences" that lead you astray from the path of performance.

Conclusion: There's a huge difference between proficient people, the ones that are working to evolve professionally, and others, who don't show the slightest interest to do some good, efficient and strong work. What distinguishes qualified people from the crowd? Well, the first focus on achieving their goals, tasks and responsibilities that vest their position, the others "bend upon the flies". The latter will be expelled from the squad, while people with true values will be better rewarded.

In order to make the step to excellence, learn how to be productive - do not divert your "traffic" to efficiency to a wrong direction.

Personal Color Of Master „Ego"

On September 11, 2011

Get closer to the ideal that you wear in yourself, without betraying your potential to be brilliant.

The famous Russian film director, Sergei Eisenstein, the "Father of Montage" as he was considered by the film critics, had collaborated with the famous pianist Prokofiev, whose main responsibility was to compose the soundtrack of his new film about the Civil War, entitled "Ivan, The Terrible".

Prokofiev was sometimes unhappy with the film scenes. Once, Eisenstein showed him a fragment of battle. The composer, looked twice at the passage, then shouted angry:

- Enough ! I don't feel any rhythm. That confuses me and I couldn't do anything !

Eisenstein explained to him that the passage in question was still to be retouched. Unsatisfied, Prokofiev asked him:

- First grind it and then show me ! *

Leadership: What relationships could you establish between the forms of representing the concept of "Brand" and the forms of communication of the initiative to review your own "favorite" image of the transfiguration of creation?

You arouse the admiration and recognition of people by what you are and by the value from yourself. This is the main criterion by which you are evaluated by others around you. Being a man of value, means first of all to have a high capacity for development of your creations and resources, and at the same time, to know to realize your "own production" by collaborating with those around you.

How could you accomplish something special, to give life to the desire in that you believe, to get closer to your aim, if what you do, it is not too clear not even to yourself, or it is not completely finished? First of all, grind the edges of the work on which you want to realize until you bring it to perfection, first, play your role well, then let the others to play their role as well.

The brand is what you fully finished after you lost partial or total control at certain stages of an experimental approach. It is in a report of direct proportionality promoting images of "favorite" of the transfiguration of creation when you manage to respect of validating term of the requests of content that do not reflect the conditions of "return".

Why do you call for help: to lose it or win it? Your weakness occurs just in the moment when you incline to yourself the balance of your hesitations. Moreover, when this happens, you betray your true potential, means that you have turned against you, against your own beliefs, desires and ideals, means you have left something that you care, and on which you have anchored your hope. You could not get closer to the ideal that you wear in yourself if you betray your potential to be brilliant.

The Creator reveals himself to the one who is willing to find him in a perpetual state of dissatisfaction. Whoever is willing to encompass all knowledge in an exciting adventure must automatically conduct reasonings of the type "me, and not them", through endless obstacles.

Leadership: Do you polish through your patience, discipline and intelligence the work you project to the rest of the world, or are you heading towards that part of the labyrinth in which everything you do stops?

Nothing is accomplished if you wander in a labyrinth created through a form of belonging to a space that seems immutable, if you tend to that part where all you do it stops. In this case, you aggravate and your situation, and of the other employees of yours. You cannot enlighten others through all the dilemmas that torment you, but you can find a connection and a match between what you intend to deliver and what in reality can be a justification of a phenomenon of cumulation of several perspective construction methods.

To retain your value, look at your performances as a harsh judge who correctly holds accounting for pros and cons, one who cannot be mistaken in interpreting certain situations, expressions or confusing images. One who devises and gives meaning to every detail that can betray uncertainty in the process of processing and integrating an alternative form of presenting information and the transferring of it between the various levels of art.

If the proofs of confusion in the expression of an image are convincing, then you will fall in your own eyes, and you will lose ground to others.

The work you project in front of the world is a fragment from a script called "an example of pretentiousness" that can be accepted as valid provided you customize it to the brand of a brand-name personality.

Personal color of master „Ego" is the expression of evaluation of your own potential, which only if you will properly exploit it, could get to the desired results. First of all, grind your potential by adding a personal color, and only then you will shine in your own being and in the eyes of others.

Just as good diagnoses lead to better therapies, even so, the development and full use of your own resources and capabilities lead to more solid and effective collaboration with others.

Conclusion: For you as a leader, it is important to know to get your correct self-assessment in order to evaluate properly the people around you, especially those with that you must work together to complete a common goal.

You always have to judge fairly and impartially your own "master", afterwards the other ones, trying first to improve yourself, and only after that to ask performance from them. In other words, do not expect from anyone more than you can give by yourself because everyone refers to you, the leader.

A Method That Yields Results

On March 16, 2009

Find the element that highlights your operating frequency in order to reap the benefits of a superior performance.

When Columbo investigates a case, no killer escapes. Yes, that it is. The cute detective Columbo, never failed when it came to detecting criminals and catching them. He had an almost brilliant intuition in quickly identifying the most relevant information and linking the details seemingly unimportant at first sight. However, the secret of his success was not only due to his intuition, but also to his very sophisticated method that he applied in the process of investigation.

To be sure that the murderer was the suspect whom he was investigating, Columbo had to check his reasoning.

For example, in one of the episodes, during the investigation, Columbo asks the supposed murderer to help him reconstruct how the crime was committed. Thus, on the reason that he does not like guns, Columbo gives a gun to the suspect and asks him to shoot a bullet in a brand-new sponge mattress in order to investigate whether the bullet it is shot identical to that found in the victim's body. The murderer suddenly panicked. And as Columbo anticipated, he tried to find an explanation of how the crime was made, demonstrating his innocence, "You have the gun, the bullet, the document which identifies the owner. It is clear that I am not the murderer."

Columbo often applied this method of intimidating the suspect. By giving him the murder gun, he watched carefully how he reacts, trying to justify himself for something he didn't do.

Leadership: Are you able to establish the truth and the source of your own authority, the same as other people assume the interior states during the continuous update of their identity?

The man's inclination towards that truth which makes him free with respect to his own being and to the effects his actions produce, not depending on any obligation assumed by his own will, is following the example of his nature - designed to check his representation errors.

You transmit what you represent. Man is, on the one hand, a universe rich in feelings, a whole defined by thought, but mostly an accumulation of updates of his evolution that helps to better measure the impact of circumstances allowing him to value his potential to the maximum.

In an attempt to express different aspects and manifestations considered important in a state of becoming which judges the moment's steps on the scale of values, where the emphasis is on seemingly unimportant details, leadership is achievable by means of investigating that reason delegated to discover the truth about man.

This truth is closely related to the circumstances that favor or disfavor its role within society or in certain circumstances. How do you relate to people who exercise their emotions, virtues and strength of mind?

Leadership: Can you turn yourself into a coherent WHOLE regarding the way in which you access a reality that hides under various "masks" the experiences of people and the deepest nuances of their motivation?

If you want to integrate in the size of a leadership corresponding to a raw, unfiltered of doubts human reality, but that actually lives largely by connecting to the interior states of people (it becomes a real challenge to interpret them), you must reach that evolutionary level of knowledge that enables you to know truths beyond their self-imposed breastplate.

And if people must decide with the help of their mind how to cultivate, train and proliferate feelings that have the potential to harm their ethics and image, the leader aims to bring them back to a reality they seem to have left forever.

This implies experiencing that consciousness that, surpassing the feeling, should urge people to fairness and integrity, pushing them to be present, identifiable and recognizable by a judgment which is rather related to a realistic philosophy within the moralistic approaches, rather than the "show" created by an escape from normality patterns.

Being able to establish the truth supporting human consciousness gives total power to the source of your own authority. A leader takes into account the principles on which it builds the real identity of people, trying to find himself in those bits of soul they offer.

Listen to the definition of identity that someone suggested on a website: "Identity is what provides continuity of the inner life of man; it is the stable part, always identical with itself, of the human being, which is carried from one stage to another, second by second, throughout all life experiences and creates a coherent whole of a person."

Leadership: Can many aspects of your own motivation be understood through the simple analysis of the abilities that accompany you on the road towards capitalizing on the reality perceived by filtering the experiences of others?

If you are passionate about geography, then you probably know that the landscape fragmentation density is the element of analysis that highlights the alternation frequency of the valley couloirs with the interfluvial surfaces. In relative terms, this density can be regarded as small, medium and large, by the simple observation of a topographical map. In case you need a higher precision, it is necessary to draw up a map of the horizontal fragmentation of the landscape based on calculating the ratio between the total length of the valley system (in km) and the surface, on which will be performed their measurement.

You will be incapable of reaping the fruits of a performance that would confer you some superiority over others, if you fail to fragment your attention. Or if you do not allow to your beliefs to be concerned with all the details that complete your personality. The more attention you pay to the mental map which allows you to completely change the perspective of approaching the functioning of the human being, the more you can better understand the beliefs that govern your mind.

You could also be a Columbo of your own thoughts, of your personality, if you pay attention to the details that make your judgment to be a more malleable process in the detection and elimination of your own "malfunctions". If you draw a map of your personality structure, the detective within you, will help you understand easier the impulses, the moral and social tendencies, and the way you are perceived by others - based on the report of the active and the passive within you, between your actions and your values, namely between the form of your ego and its truth content.

Is your leadership made up of a psychological intervention that takes into account numerous perspectives of approaching the functioning of the human being in relation to a reality that supports or denies the truths inscribed in a situation of the type: "trap"?

A Small Coin For A Lost City

On January 26, 2012

Respect your commitments towards your potential of accomplishing what can be truly virtuous, reassessing the way in which you perceive your own being.

Do you remember the little boy, Nils Holgersson? Nils, the roguish, is transformed by a dwarf in a shrimp, in this way being bound to start a long journey across Sweden with a flock of wild geese.

In an unbelievably beautiful night, the stork Ermenrich and Nils have stopped on a deserted beach. While the stork was resting, Nils was walking on the abandoned beach. Suddenly, he stumbled against something hard. He leaned and saw in the sand a rusty small copper coin. Realizing that he had to deal with something valueless, he even has not thought to take it up and to put it in his pocket, but kicked it away.

Leadership: Is the manifestation of your value, based on the criteria for assessing reality, limited by the testimony of a life experience that happens in a moment that gets lost?

When he wanted to go further, remained stunned when he saw that at a few steps away was raising a long entrenchment with battlements and towers. He slipped under the gate and stepped into the unknown city. He never saw something like this before. Only stores with precious things, very presentable people, tall houses full of grandeur, frontispieces adorned with more and more crafted ornaments etc. Anywhere he would take a glance he saw only work and enthusiasm. It was the heaven on earth.

Nils scoured the city a good piece of time, but no one paid attention at him, especially because he was small as a finger. At one moment, he thought in himself: "I will never be so rich to buy something of here." And, suddenly, to the calling of this desire, more and more merchants have gathered around him. All of them were making him understand that they were claiming as a payment for any product only one coin. But, Nils had no money. Then, all the merchants began to cry with tears.

Moved by their pathetic condition, and remembering the small copper coin from the seashore, Nils scuttled away. He got out of the city's gate and headed directly toward the place where he discovered the coin. He found it immediately. However, when he had to go back to the town, he saw only the sea unceasingly billowing its waves.

Just as "knowing" is the act of the intelligent being, so too is "being sorry" the act of the being that has missed its purpose offered by fate in an equation of personal affirmation and capitalizing on the potential of exploring a new and unique life experience.

Leadership: Do you have the power of accepting to be an artificial person in a confrontation with the image of a world that only appears in certain contexts?

Every human being has the obligation to protect his own moral and spiritual code that describes and facilitates his way of "functioning" which defines his whole being, his importance and his characteristic personality. However, in the same time, every human being has the obligation to penetrate the reality, expressing an attitude of acceptance of what it is true. The human orientation towards a certain area of reality, the same that deepens his perspective on the way he can exercise his value – it is the one that gives beauty and essence to his being.

When it comes to personal development or leadership, the emphasis is always put on your defining character trait. You can transform yourself into an "artificial" person, slowing down the process of evolution of your being by the lack of feelings and of the morality - or you can transform yourself into a person of high moral and spiritual qualities due to your desire of accomplishing what can be truly virtuous.

The real in this case is the compromise between your moral duty and will, between what should be done and what your conscience requires you to do. The personal development and self-knowledge begins with the honesty of your consciousness.

Leadership: Do you have a certain responsibility towards the "nothing" in you, by confronting "at some point in your life you could have achieved something that really matters"?

A world that only reveals itself in certain contexts symbolizes your openness to novelty, to adventure, to always learning something of what you knew nothing about beforehand, as a sort of responsibility in the face of a change to which you can only contribute through a widening of consciousness over the entire experience of "I am".

Being an artificial man, as a sort of mismatch between yourself and the surrounding unknown from the great picture of the world, means to renounce self-image (the totality of beliefs and conditionings of remembrances) that highlights your "personal legend".

The city was called Vineta. It was destined to have lot of joys, but because of the pride and luxury of which got ill its inhabitants, the city was cursed - drowned by a flood and sank into the sea. Once in a century, the city was rising from the seabed in all its glory and remained on the surface for one hour. If in all this time, it was finding a living being to buy something, the spell that swept the city would have been shattered, and the people from it could have lived and died like all humans.

Nils carried his hands to the eyes and began to cry bitterly. If he had on him that coin, no matter how small, he could have saved the old city.

Are you finding yourself in the Nils's hypostasis? Do you feel that your value has dropped to zero? Do you feel that in some point of your life, you could do something that really matters? Have you kicked your chance to be more than you are, to complete your fulfillment? What have you missed? What significance would have taken your life if you had acted under a just cause and of some noble feelings?

Leadership: Can you harness your inner essence to become a transformative presence, so that you move from mere existence to the role of destiny maker?

You can be more than a simple man in a certain moment of life; you can be a real creator of destinies. If you have a "small coin". It represents a step towards your own spiritual and emotional development, being in a certain sense, which commonly is called "background" - which is adding essence to every human being.

This "small coin" may appear as a sublime thought, as a positive decision or a solution, of good words, a sparkle of inspiration, or may be the strong manifestation of some beautiful and noble feelings. You can weigh your value by the way you are using it.

Do you have a certain responsibility towards the "nothingness" of you? Do you accept to be a nobody and nothing, and to never claim anything else from you?

Leadership is the fruit of experiences at the limit that individualize your journey through an increase of the need of knowing yourself at peace with the status of a man who does not shy away from being harsh when it comes to failures.

A small coin for a lost city highlights what you may become by yourself if you give importance to those "little things" that contribute to maximizing your potential of becoming "somebody".

Just as a doctor must not return his look from anomalies, but have to seek and understand them - and so you should not lose your hope about those situations where you have not raised your potential to the highest standards, but to re-evaluate your way, in which you perceive your own being - showing your willingness to change, eliminating all the obstacles that stand in the way of your spiritual development and self-discovery.

Respect your duties towards your potential of accomplish what can be truly virtuous, reassessing the way in which you perceive your own being.

Act Confidently And Efficiently

On March 15, 2009

Before you demonstrate a point of view to be adopted by other people, you must create a domino effect from the elements that practically hide reality.

A mysterious murder that took place on a cruise ship has sparked panic among the passengers. Although, all the clues led to one person, Detective Columbo was convinced that someone else was actually the murderer. It was someone so wily that managed to send everyone on a wrong track, and who knew to hide his traces very well. So, stubborn to God, Columbo continued his research: investigating the crime scene many times, and constituting many plausible scenarios, he put a lot of questions to all the passengers. Ultimately, he became a nuisance to the travelers who wanted to continue their entertainment !

Observing the trouble that Columbo produced everywhere around him, the captain of the ship has addressed to him on a very serious tone: "Lieutenant, why are you stubborn to continue this investigation? The murderer was caught. Tomorrow, the competent authorities will take the appropriate action. I insist not to bother anymore the people on the ship ! "

Do you think that the ship's captain managed to convince Columbo to stop the investigations? Well, he does not. Columbo continued his investigation, and in the end he discovered who the real murderer was.

Leadership: Have you taken it upon yourself to investigate a fact that seems unlikely by deepening an area of views expressed through an inadequately detailed description of reality?

Sometimes, leadership is dimensioned according to the following aspect: "When you always work according to certain reasons, and these reasons change, or when new ones intervene over the former ones, then your determination and action changes."

Thus, leadership has the value of perspicacity and customization, because you are tempted to split the thread in four and impose your point of view without the right to appeal, especially if it comes to escalating a truth that transcends logical reason.

If you are good at cars, then you know that the role of the Engine Control Unit (ECU) is to control the amount of fuel entering the combustion chambers. ECU receives these data from the sensors placed in the engine and uses as input parameters in the equations, which it has to solve in order to produce the output values that will control the motor control mechanisms: injectors, pumps, spark plugs.

The same is in your case. Your potential is given by that very active "sensor" within you, which measures the way your perceive the circumstances, the way you think, feel and act – which, if it is properly regulated and well-kept, increases the level of trust and efficiency, charging you with an impetus and an intense enthusiasm. This sensor grows the pressure of your potential depending of your type of personality, depending of your training and your willingness to get involved in the core of all the matters concerning your career.

In order to give a maximum efficiency in the activities that you carry on, you must increase the control over the functioning of your own evaluation "engine" of the configuration of a reality that you find foreign - which can guarantee you better performance and more power to manifest your professional skills. Do you know how to adjust the detection and configuration sensor of a reality foreign to you?

Leadership: Can you produce a domino effect on the issues that lead to meaningful results, from a fact that seems to come out of the observations you just keep for yourself?

The domino effect involves touching a piece that engages other pieces in a continuous fall to the last. It is the cumulative effect produced when an event triggers a chain of similar events. This approach also requires you to have an overview of the actions, processes and things that are in a unitary and continuous process, as they identify the main resource of a future action.

Before you demonstrate a point of view to be adopted by other people, you must create a domino effect from the elements that practically hide reality.

For your impact with the excellence (in the field where you perform your activity) to produce in a fast and controllable pace, without affecting the essence of your value and the integrity of your operating system, you must adopt an attitude of a winner. You have to get involved in your own role of investigator. Namely, you have to transform yourself into a Columbo, to strengthen your ability to produce an effect of optimization of those processes which lead to positive results, not to false ones.

How do you get involved in making this role more efficient?

Your excellent ability in an area of activity and the attitude is forming the leverage that transmits the propellant energy necessary to achieve a superior performance. Before launching a career that opens yourself new perspectives, it is very important to build an attitude of investigator of facts and assumptions.

Leadership: Are you interested in the context of finding a "piece" that verifies the possibility of a controlled chain reaction by creating a private space that becomes the resource of a future action?

Probably, the motto of Columbo was always: "I will never, never give up until I will not discover the truth." This is the kind of mentality you must adopt when you face a difficult problem. You have to be very persistent, even stubborn in order to find the optimal solution. Moreover, if you are determined enough to go to the end despite all the obstacles that you encounter, you will surely find a solution that pleases you.

What would have happened if Columbo abandoned that complicated case and would have left the conclusion of the investigation in the care of the authorities? You guessed it. He would have lost his reputation. All his colleagues from work would not have trusted him anymore, and would not ask so often for his help. In other words, Columbo would have become a common police officer, a simple detective, from whom no one would have expected too much.

It is so embarrassing to lose your reputation, and others, less talented than you, to outrival you through sustained efforts. That is why it is important to keep your spirit alive and to be always in alert. Being always ready to act with determination in any situation, try to find more effective solutions before others. Maintain yourself on favorable positions. Be stubborn and persistent in your efforts in order to achieve the proposed objectives.

A private space that becomes the resource of a future action is the foundation of the solution-based mentality, seeing a solution to each problem and a possibility in every impossibility. This mentality finds no support in the external reality, but only in the inner perception of the wider context of interpreting an essential part of the revelations incorporating the meanings of some apparent hints that overturn any verdicts.

The full dimension of the role that favors your detective reputation is given by the perception of the broader context of the hidden reality exploration area where "stopping" is not forbidden.

Be The First To Make The Move

On October 09, 2009

Enhance your performance level, by enabling that useful option from your operating mode that allows you to get results with great effect.

They perished because they have not acted on time.

During an expedition to the Australian desert, a platoon consisting of 60 soldiers was attacked from all sides by the enemy. The commander has ordered the soldiers to take the fight position. Aligned in the shooting position and armed to the teeth, the soldiers were waiting with fear the order to attack from their commander.

One bullet fatally hit the commander just before ordering the attack. All the soldiers were slaughtered while waiting for the order.

The leader is not a picture that stays put in its own frame, looking somber and imposing a certain seriousness in interpretation. But rather, he is an image that stands behind a strategic transformation: from the status of a mortal to that of an idea that cannot be killed.

If you like to walk with the bike, then you know that the faster you are pedaling, the more stable you could maintain your balance. If you stand still your balance is seriously shaken.

To act effectively, often means to "pedal" as fast as possible. To act quickly is often more important than if you continue to create strategies, or if you expect the appropriate moment to emphasize yourself.

The Presence of a leader is directly related to the degree of focusing attention in the direction of risk analysis, with an equal intensity of consciousness directed at the exercising of his attributions through acts of courage and heroism.

Typically, the feeling of tension and the need for urgent action, can transform yourself into a real magnet for failure - because they fragment your performance capacity, by making you forget to concern about all the important details that can support you in the steps that you carry on.

This fragmentation of your own capacity has an impact on the way you function. However, it does not impede your progress, on the contrary, if it is positive can facilitate the appearance of success and the premises of a sustainable development. It is aimed to activate in your modus operandi that useful option that allows you to get results, which allows you to focus on conquering the virgin territories of your field.

Leadership: Do you make your presence felt by adopting a look that analyzes everything from the perspective of consequences that you anticipate in a risk-free manner?

Performance ability refers to all the fundamental human traits that are constant over time, with regard to scenes experienced through their approaches and understanding of their representation on the line of consciousness, being responsible for the stable patterns of responses to the situations they could change in favor of a collective identity.

The fragmentation of your own abilities, which involves a certain representation of yourself on the basis of attributes specific to the collectivity in which you live, is a process of spontaneous breakage of the connection between the existence of reality and the perception of it, between what inspires you and what you produce, between what you see from behind the curtain and what is on stage.

These abilities, almost eliminated in advance in the process of planning your own course, are the following: the ability of making deductions regarding the content of communicating a prognosis, the ability of initiative, enterprising spirit, sense of responsibility, perseverance until the completion of the mission, the ability to think of problems from different perspectives, the ability to act when faced with change, the ability to anticipate the course of events.

Leadership: Are you aware that by the means necessary for the realization of the proposed objectives you can determine the manifestation of the authority of authenticity that can be persuaded even before it is clarified?

The idea of being always the first who "attacks" is the basic idea of the Japanese negotiator. In chess, the player who starts the game, the white, has always a greater advantage in that he has taken the first step, the first move. Furthermore, as I said a little earlier, in a battle, the army that starts to shoot the first should not let the enemy the opportunity to respond.

Likewise, at the speed test, the athlete who has the best start wins most of the times. A fraction of a second can make the difference between to be or not to be a champion. Moreover, if you do not know, many times the students that graduate with the highest scores manage to engage themselves in the famous companies, without even appearing to the interview. Only through a simple recommendation. Therefore, occupying the top positions, to be among the best, can offer you many advantages in time.

In any company the most valuable employees – who always come with new ideas, who are more active, who permanently involve themselves in solving problems are always appreciated by the managers. Therefore, they are better paid and are promoted faster in higher positions than those who are not sufficiently productive.

Learn to create that magic of predestination that will lead people to align to your convictions, ideals, and actions in a context of the type: "the only weight we do not feel, but we experience, is the air, glory and history."

Act effectively. "Pedal" as fast as possible. Be always one step ahead of others. Be always the first in the domain in which you work. Be the first to find the best solutions to the emerged problems. Decide today that you will become the most valuable person in the company.

If you do not want to diminish your uniqueness, enhance your performance level by enabling that useful option from your operating mode that allows you to achieve spontaneous and lasting results.

Godly Perfection

On May 06, 2010

Create an overall picture over your own values, so you can accede more easily to a higher level of perfection.

"David" the most famous sculpture from history, together with the wonderful "Sistine Chapel" are living witnesses of the talent, with which was endowed their creator, an unmatched artist, illustrator, painter and sculptor in one place, a genius of imagination, of improvisation, of art - Michelangelo Buonarroti.

The question arises: how could one man, one heart and one soul, to go beyond the human condition and to rise above all with an amazing skill? Was really Michelangelo a human being or a god taking the aspect of a human being, as a testimony of divine existence and presence?

Fated to be almost a god. Michelangelo did not reach success in his youth, although ever since birth he was endowed with an extraordinary talent, but rather at the middle of his life, once with his improvement in the art of sculpture and drawing. His mission, which he alone has chosen, and set with determination, was to go beyond his rivals once and for all. However, could one artist to outrival all the others in mastery, refinement and originality?

The world, in order to truly believe in divinity must be a witness to its miracles. Just like Jesus, in front of all, resurrected people and made them well through his miraculous power, so and Michelangelo wanted to prove, in front of all the people, his creative and divine power, springing from his unsurpassed will to rise above the others by miracle, and to remain, if it were possible, immortal through his works.

Leadership: Can you affirm yourself on the world stage as an outward manifestation of a miraculous power by looking at it with while thinking of a subsequent accessing and coordination of your spiritual side?

The elements of leadership and the ones of personal development can be combined, modified so that they would be always in balance and harmony. Leadership requires you to position yourself higher in the rankings of values and to take a leading role in the service of creation. The personal development presumes to recognize the peculiarities of your own personality in order to improve your performance level and to transform yourself into a pretty capable type of person in providing qualitative results for those who analyze and monitor the trend of your progress.

By not recognizing your qualities or not getting the best out of them, it is like moving to another end of the world - no one but you know where you are. You are living a life independent of the other people of value; you distance yourself from the performance, of which you are able to give proof, and staying anonymous. Do you want this?

Are you preparing for a higher level of personal development? How do you intend to access this level? Have you prepared a personal profile to reflect your areas of interest? How do you evaluate your progress? Could many aspects of your own motivation be understood by simply analyzing your personality and the skills that accompany you on the road towards performance?

Leadership: Are you ready to reach the heights of greatness through a spiritualization of the image of your own value?

Absolutely right was the one who said: "Michelangelo was perhaps the greatest architect, painter and sculptor in the history. With his infallible sense of proportion has set new standards in architecture."

Yes, the great "Stone Lawgiver" reached the highest peaks of mastery, by accomplishing what perhaps only a handful of artists managed to do.

A spiritualization of the image of your own value is achieved when you deepen your mind in a direction wholly alien to the world you create, going from artistic to what an experience means that has itself as it's only guiding point, even in the remnants it inevitably leaves behind.

Are you a very determined visionary? Are you seduced by the idea of creating something completely new? Are you animated by the desire to be the best? Are you able to assume difficult challenges? What specifically grows your motivation? What is the image that you have about yourself? Is consistency a crucial part from the process of cultivating your own values and passions? Is the creative power one of the greatest gifts you have? Are you developing your skills according to your expectations?

The spiritual side of man is like a supreme consciousness: you first have to access it from outside your own entity that is contaminated with reality and then translate it into a creation that embodies perfection through a proximity to the divine.

P.S. The great works of art and the great achievements were not due to some supernatural forces, but to that inner impulse, that passion and inner desire to demonstrate that you can get closer to perfection. Moreover, achieving perfection implies a lot work, a lot of thinking, a lot of steadiness, however, the effort put in it never remains unexploited. Those who have almost reached perfection were not gods, but people with certain qualities that have worked a lot to reach the glory.

Invest In Excellence

On April 11, 2009

Highlight your abilities of a researcher before managing to bring out vivid gold from the resources of knowledge and intellectual strengths that you have.

People have tried to imagine how would look their future. What will be their financial situation, how will be their health, how much will they achieve their objectives, will be better or worse? It's something natural to think at your future, to hope that you will have something good in your life, to try to make things better, to look, to think, to calculate so that you turn only toward something better and to put yourself in a favorable light.

Isn't it? We always can imagine a happier future, brighter and healthier. But what are the real chances that the future to follow the path that we want?

Let's say you are a researcher in the domain of medicine who loves very much his job and he gives his best interest to support people with HIV. Day after day, years you have tried to find an efficient treatment for the people who have HIV. Unfortunately you didn't find anything concrete. All your attempts of finding a medicine failed.

And suddenly, one day, another tone, this time of success: "I succeeded ! I found the cure ! " And like this, in a moment, you become one of the most famous people in the world and extremely rich.

Leadership: Do you try to discover new means of perception of your own efficiency, by influencing the occurrence of certain revitalization effects of your deep zone?

Many individuals ignore their own value and are getting stuck without solution in the act of law, in the process of searching for those ways to improve their own performance, on the road towards excellence. For this reason, the ability to make a qualitative research among the factors that can guarantee the optimum level to create results, it is very required.

The true leader, and to the same extent, an artist with vision, is dominated by the concern for the transition to an innovative model of leadership. He attempts to pinpoint more clearly the unity and interaction of phenomena or structures of reality by extending some categories of predominant factors that can influence the occurrence of certain revitalization effects of his deep zone.

Through experiments, by adding new additional research hypotheses of the interaction modalities with his own realizations, trying to discover new means of perception of his own efficiency in terms of intellectual exercise, he can ensure an optimal functioning, without blockages and with a higher yield.

The coordination of these research activities, which may generate a positive impact on individual results and performance, following the gradual development of the ability to acquire competence elements that, when composed, may lead to a functional innovation in leadership, is a requirement for evolution. These elements are: the ability to see things from the perspective of winning opportunities and the ability to communicate your value content in the form you give to your aspirations.

And a continuing activity of seeking new opportunities for personal capitalization, largely depends on the methods of self-analysis and self-evaluation of the knowledge used in the creative process.

The depth area of your art of individualizing yourself, being the backdrop of the internal life from which emerge dreams and ideals, earns its peculiarity of being the quintessence of success when you emanate a special fascination for the significance of the curiosity with which you see the world.

In other words, if you want to live up to the claims of quality leadership, it is important to engage in an intense concern for knowing the world and its requirements. Think as high as possible and try to understand better the "resercher" within yourself. Meaning to develop your creative potential until you succeed, like an alchemist, to extract the living gold from your knowledge and intellectual strengths.

Do you want to feel that you have done something useful, something that matters? Do you want perfection? Do you want the work that you do to be important? Do you want to be known what you did?

If so, then create your own "research laboratory" in which to highlight all your qualities. The Laboratory is that place where you practice your skills, in which you are free to experiment, to find yourself. Is a tool meant to reinforce your development process, and to bring you closer to the career of your dreams.

Every person who "shines" in a field, has its own research laboratory of those generator forms of performance and quality - which directly influences his state of operation. Excellence is directly proportional to the results of self-knowledge and your intellectual achievement.

Leadership: Can you capitalize upon yourself through the ability to signify, meaning to notice and communicate a new sense of novelty to the Ego and to the World by referring to a direction that is being sought and "bought"?

Do you understand why some people get results beyond all expectations? Because they act instead of looking out the window. Excellent people do not expect to be dropped out from the clouds a gigantic safe full of money, but decide their performance through everything they do, by work, diligence and perseverance. Certainly, the failures do not bypass them less than to other people. However, for them all these obstacles represent a step towards success.

Without a doubt, the one who works more, and with a higher efficiency, that invests time in productive ideas - increases his chances of being brilliant. If you propose as a goal to be one of the best "players" in your field of activity, the probability of achieving your goals, of transforming your vision into reality is much higher. Unfortunately, the things will stay exactly the opposite, if you do not excel in anything.

Hence, invest in excellence, do your best to become exceptionally good from the professional point of view in the domain, in which you operate. Thus, the probability of achieving your objectives and having a brighter future is much higher.

Leadership: How do you see yourself in a knowledge called "discovery" or "the experience of being someone else"?

How do you increase your probability of achieving excellence? Highlight your abilities of a researcher before managing to bring out vivid gold from the resources of knowledge and intellectual strengths that you have.

A direction that is being sought and "bought", finding support in a material and professional manner, reflects the means of exteriorizing the will made with the intention of creating a new perspective on the world through an impulse called "Knowing a completely different man".

Learn How To Share

On March 10, 2009

Be a model of efficiency in the art of leadership, by creating that special bond between people that would correspond to your standards of excellence.

Two teams of archaeologists went to Egypt with a single purpose: to discover the burial structure of the Egyptian people. Both teams owned some information such as the funerary structure was in an area, within a perimeter of 640 meters. However, both teams arrived at the same time on the spot and started arguing about which one is more entitled to carry out the excavations.

One of the archaeologists' chief of one of the team intervened and solved the problem.

- The perimeter is quite large and the Egyptian government has left us only two weeks to explore this piece of land. If we want to discover something in this short time, we will have to work together, and for that we must learn to share everything between us.

After all, the two teams of archaeologists shared their area of search, and both of them discovered interesting things.

Leadership: Can you amplify the potential to make things happen, according to the exchange value that an asset possesses at one time?

It can be said that there is a value of the type of "unity", even where apparently it would seem that it is not applicable, when unquestionably is triggered a resonance process leading to an amplification of the significance of the effects obtained by a joint effort and that can be quantified.

The potential to make things happen is a vision that gives new ideas the opportunity to shape and materialize through a synergistic action that draws attention by eliminating differences and discrepancies between people.

Thus, the exchange value that a volunteer asset possesses at one time can be attributed to the quality of people to not work against their will on the structure of a large project, taking into account that the utility of a common cause is what turns the model of group dynamics into a prospective result obligation and a reference value of the final "prize".

There where it is evident the unity of people-work, namely there where exists claims of honor, to make performance and the desire to build something sustainable (as in the teamwork all it is based on these three elements) there where it is accomplished an order of priorities and improvements, on which they should go together - encouraging the cooperation assurance must reach the highest potential, must be accomplished in a superior way, and to give a pronounced note of authenticity - that is to produce simultaneously an active power, an energy capable of ensuring productivity.

To fail in creating that special bond between people, so that they would develop according to your expectations and to evolve in order to be more optimal, so according to your standards of excellence, it is like trying to reach by bike a distant point by pedaling emptily. For reaching somewhere by bike you have to pedal, while the other people are following you.

Leadership: Does the link you create between people correspond to your excellence standards, taking into account the final cost of a benefit that gives no distinction between the investment value and the balance sheet value of non-material assets?

Winning it is a habit. Just like losing. It's up to you how you build your team. You can make friends and to face more easily any challenges, or you can impose to yourself an unconstructive attitude and to be intractable in doing everything by yourself. It is your choice.

Working with other people and showing them that you are interested to continue working with them, you gain their respect. By gaining their respect, you determine them to get involved with more energy and seriousness in the activities that you organize. This is the point where you have to bring people: to put soul into their work and to be proud of this. And, in case something goes wrong, do everything possible to avoid the disputes and seek a common solution.

The final price of a benefit that gives no distinction between the investment value and the balance sheet value of non-material assets is the pleasure of being part of a whole on which its component parts depend, a whole which without you may not function as well. You become the leader only through the ability to generate the phenomenon "all for one and one for all".

As a leader, your duty it is to establish a stronger bond between the team members, to create that cooperative attitude that would determine them to provide a work of quality, to be fully involved in achieving common objectives. Consequently, if you are the manager of a company and if you want to achieve the proposed objectives, you will have to found a team that would work effectively as a unitary whole.

Be a model of efficiency in the art of leadership, by creating that special bond between people that would correspond to your standards of excellence. Learn to contribute to the proper functioning of your team, by providing a complex infrastructure of leadership and excellent facilities of cooperation.

Leadership is what you gather together after you have finished a certain activity, which can be represented by a vector called the "feeling of immeasurable significance".

Test Your Skills

On March 04, 2009

Improve your professional performance, by outlining in a very convincing way the style of interpreting your role.

A theater actor gets on the stage and plays his role. His biggest desire is to capture the attention of the audience. After almost 50 minutes, when he gave all he had the best in him, the actor expects the public's reaction - which either applauds, or not. If the audience applauds enthusiastically means that the role he played was exceptional, if they are not supporting him, perhaps the actor did not resonate with them, hence, he did not offer them a very good show.

Even so, no matter how he played the role, the actor receives an immediate and direct reaction from the audience. Therefore, he knows exactly what effect had the interpretation, and will know what he has to change, what he must improve in his profession, so that the next time to play his role flawlessly.

Just as a seeker of pearls takes a deep breath before plunging into the water and exhales it all when he comes to the surface - and so you have to incubate in your leadership your consistent and deepened concern for each of the decisive stages of the interpretation of your own role, taking into account of your deepest and most valuable quality. That is, in simple words, to bring out to the surface all the best in you.

Leadership: Do you evaluate your performance by sending "synchronization signals" in the adjustment circuit of other people's expectations?

The thing that differentiates a valuable actor of an average actor is the fact that the first one tries to improve his performance by outlining in a very convincing way the style of interpreting his roles - always taking into account of the public reaction. For, in the end, the public is the one who decides the quality of his performance.

If the actor fails to capture the public's attention, if he does not stir in them that inner thirst to watch him until the end, then he should seriously reconsider his interpretive style.

The expressions of the results obtain not only through effort, but also through a continuous update process of abilities, and moreover through an analysis of the extent to which you accept others, plays the role of connection forces that act upon your validity. These expressions stand in close connection with the way you manage your interior and schedule yourself for success when you're crossed by the awareness shivers of the dependency you assume in relation to the reaction of your evaluators.

The synchronization signals represent manifestations of your performance, which carries the information that identifies you as a valuable person, and based on their amplitude you will get appreciations and follow.

Leadership: Can you keep your availability in a transition phase from a role of great meaning to a privileged means of openness to the vast field of appreciating the value that comes from itself?

The best results you can get, as an element of your power of persuasion, can be determined by abandoning your position of dependency to public impressions, that is, when your role on stage is not in contrast with reality.

The appreciation you lend to yourself is based on the degree of position to what motivates you on the inside, at a level of imagination and emotion, when you enter into dialogue with the public, which sometimes makes up the feeling of insufficiency of the abilities of interpreting the role in an experience of learning acceptance and self-esteem.

Validity is what you get as self-worth after playing your role, measuring your resonance with those around you beyond "applause".

And self-worth, related to the focusing of consciousness on the act that is done at a certain moment, that belief in one's own forces determined by the fulfillment of personal and professional achievements. It manifests itself as a causal relationship between attitude and emotions, meaning that what is provocative, easy or even relaxing for you, can become threatening or impossible to accomplish for others.

Only the results you get outside the stage are deciding your value. So do not expect to flatten out the world at once. It will be necessary to periodically test your skills and competencies, and depending on the reaction of those around you that assess you, you could establish at which level you are situating yourself.

It is difficult to believe that someone can get remarkable results if they are not doing their best in this sense, and if they do not periodically test their skills. Therefore, I believe that alike an actor you have to get the reaction of more people before advancing to the rank of a professional.

P.S. Do not forget that the professional training degree is based not only on theoretical knowledge, but also on practical exercise.

Walking the path towards the potential of leadership means to show the world that you are able to have a big role both at the moment of the maximum attention offered to you and at the moment when you feel unsatisfied by your performance.

Test your skills whenever you face new challenges in an attempt to continuously improve yourself beyond what you think you already know. For this reason, I want to state that true evolution comes from self-knowledge, in a way where experiences and failures become valuable lessons, due to a constant learning process, from which you draw your strength to move forward.

The Curse That Threatens You

On April 14, 2009

Being so passionate about surf, the champion put on his specific equipment of a real surfer, took his surfboard and bravely jumped into the water, with the thought of crossing the ocean. His greatest desire was to make a great deed and become famous.

The ocean was calm and clear, the waves were acceptable, the air temperature was positive, so he could advance without problems. But as he moved offshore, the ocean became more agitated, the waves were becoming higher, swifter and more turbulent, the wind was blowing with intensity from all sides. Despite the weather, which visibly worsened, he did not freeze, but kept going. It was not the first time surfing in such weather and, because he had experience, he believed that he could maintain the necessary balance he needed to cope with increasingly unpredictable waves.

Then, all of a sudden, everything changed. The storm that began, dramatically escalated, the surfer could not fight the waves anymore, he lost his balance, fell off the surfboard and did not have the strength to straighten up. He drowned on his journey to celebrity.

Leadership: Are you aware of your connection with everything that surrounds you when the intention of exteriorizing the manifestation of will comes into play?

All our ambitions can break down if we do not put soul in everything that we do. Whatever the type of activity that we perform, if we are very skilled and talented, we will come off winners. But when we rely on a single card, it is recommended to think twice before taking the decisive step.

Acquiring personal success is for some a mission against the clock – they want to reach the finish line as quickly as possible, but without taking into account the rules of the game or how dangerous it is. We do not live in a fair or less fait jungle, but in a world governed by rules, reason and principles that we have to respect. And if we do not take them into account, we will come off losers.

Externalizing the manifestation of will, to the style of venturing into the unknown, is usually done with the intention of demonstrating a point of view referring to the ability to accomplish a certain purpose.

But that when we think of such a display of courage take to the extreme, the psychic element of visual nature comes to mind: what does a man who masters self-control look like?

Most likely, such a man is limited only to outside impressions, looking at them with great interest. He is unruly, stubborn, defying, unresponsive, opposing foreign influences, guided only by the saying "if you don't take a risk, you don't win".

Leadership: Do you expose yourself to the danger of losing your discernment in the context in which a changing of attitude is the only constant of personal identification?

In the book "Twilight thoughts", the writer Emil Cioran made an extraordinary statement: "The curse is an immense challenge and it grows in strength as it heads towards the immeasurable."

I think that the most experienced people in a field are more exposed to the danger of losing their judgment. And that is because they have too much confidence in themselves and their success, excluding any possibility of failure. Few manage to maintain their balance in the troubled waters they sometimes swim in. And the waves of misfortune anxiously wait to strike those filled with pride, who live in a world that does not distinguish between reality and fiction.

Many of them are delineated by the tendency to exteriorize reflections on their own experiences, especially during the process of forming a perspective of understanding the personal importance of moments of consciousness near the point of impact. They are those who do not take into account the warnings from events of maximum importance for their ascension.

Are you a pioneer? There are no unreliable companies, but only companies led by ineffective leaders, who make all decision on their own, without consulting with anyone and nor caring about anyone other than themselves and their own future. Such leaders are not pioneers for those around them or themselves. In fact, in a way, they sabotage their own career and life, to the delight of the other competitors in the market.

Willing to prove their "superiority", they take hasty decision without carefully consider the following step, and ultimately, they do not get anything, like the surfer who wanted to cross the ocean on a wooden board. And I repeat myself, saying it is irrational.

You cannot get anywhere without knowing that where you want to get there may be the end of the race whose only record is the violation of respect for life.

Conclusion: Try to avoid by any means falling into the curse of straightening to the unmeasured. The actions that we want to undertake must be the result of a clear and reliable study, weighting the gain and the loss. It is true that we cannot win if we do not take a chance, but if we risk rationally, we will have more chances to come off winners.

The Evening Star Of A Creator Shackled In The Chains Of Reality (II)

Prove critical firmness in appreciating the forms and direction of self-development, without circumventing the authority called "the force of interpreting creation".

I completely sunk into the darkness of the "room with no windows" in the more and more powerful thrill of a creation that was increasingly reinforced its value, like a skyscraper growing constantly in height. In the warm and the comprehensive partnership of some deep feelings and judgments, of some theories, calculations, coherent arguments, many times empirical. My world, which I called objective, somehow resembled the theft of that painting that you take everywhere with you, but you never get a good look at it because your eyes always turn to other, more valuable paintings.

Absolutely incredible, but you can live with effective power even when the artistic ideal is missing or not found. However, within me lived the truth expressed by an old writer: "Man has always lived under his real condition, through an inversion of reality. He thus entered a nightmare, struggling with non-realities akin to tilting at windmills. To escape an impasse, man must find out only one thing: that he is a miracle."

This immaterial vibration, this pure constant pressure exercised under special laws by a strong electromagnetic force and becoming more and more comprehensive, had to manifest also in the material world. To shape the characters, physiognomies, to penetrate as a continuous current in the great whole of human nature, decisively influencing its existence. It was as if I were a creation that originated in the middle of a multidimensional universe, only if one could imagine a gigantic universe through the inversion of its laws, which acquires its specific character through a harmonious structure, corresponding to the needs of the human being for color and expression.

Human alchemy was as tempting as gold. Only that much harder to find out. Much harder to maintain. Much more difficult to be processed. It was an enigma that comprised all my feelings, which put me in contact with the world of symbols, always opening new doors, and new windows. It was unlocking the road to unsuspected passions, reviving me with every step. It was transposing me into a state from which I did not want to get out.

However, have I really understood its purpose? In the moments when I returned to the objective reality, another question was born: "Quo vadis, Domine?" Up till where I could deepen the self-knowledge and the knowledge of others, without falling in the extreme of disorder, confusion, illusion, and discouragement?

Leadership: Does the universe you relate to offer the opportunity to get acquainted with the artist himself and with his work, without limiting the possibilities of interpreting a creation that is at risk of failure?

The first chapter of the universe you relate to presents an inversion of the condition of man's existence as a human being, as a means of listening to the cry of creation to transform into personal duty that which happens with the world and to thus recognize that contribution that everyone can bring to its beauty. This universe represents that 100% authenticity that you choose to define you in a climate alien to the old expressions of life, highlighting the struggle you only have with yourself in acquiring a mediator between individual consciousness and the world.

You are convinced that you are wrong regarding what the universe leaves in its uniqueness, you criticize yourself, you add reproaches, you reflect on what you think you lack. However, at the same time, you let the flame of imagination guide you into creating something amazing in this darkness, changing the essence of all that you feel and think in a broader sense of the concept of aesthetic experience (form, color, structure, positioning), just as God modifies His world according to human standards.

The creation that you express with the help of what your own universe is trying to reveal to you is not a caricature of the world's disorder, but rather a kind of dream experience of your power of being one with God.

Only the one who appropriates the power to enter in the deepest bowels of human nature, only the one whose principles and values are not dictated by the limiting factors of an alienating reality - that owner of an individual reasoning, l'homme avec une libre pensée - will manifest a continuous tendency towards self-knowledge, by making from it a pillar of support for the leadership area. However ... up to certain limits.

In fact, the personal development and the ascension towards the high peaks of perfection, is the "Egg of Columbus" in the subtle area of leadership, on which primarily seeks to be based the self-knowledge, so necessary to every aspirant for the statute of a leader. Many are the mysteries of human nature, and they are difficult to decipher for the who does not to resort to self-knowledge.

In the high rock walls of the personality of everyone around you, there are small portions that can be shaped with your arsenal of resources, intellectual and emotional. However, for this you must turn yourself into a magician, into an alchemist, a discoverer of an unparalleled beauty of the human area, into a real thinker of the individual and general.

The "general" is what is revealed to you by comparison with the attributes that a particular philosophy attributes to the universe, while the "particular" is the conclusion you get to after translating into a concept the experiences experienced in this universe and later inserting them into real life context.

The Evening Star Of A Creator Shackled In The Chains Of Reality marks that self-seeking that ascends to higher spiritual aspirations, from which must be extracted the essence of a thinking up different types of laws referring to the quality of the image that you represent in the world by relating to a universe that is always played between the personal, the artistic, and the creative.

The Evening Star Of A Creator Shackled In The Chains Of Reality (I)

Polish the diamond inside of you, so that you can give to your leadership a form as perfect as possible.

My inner world seemed to tick more and more strongly, sinister and inexplicable. A thought constantly haunted me in the rhythm of some intense palpitations, accompanied by the strangest feelings. I harbored at that unique spark of genius, of the superhuman, optimum et maximum. I was waiting for the spontaneous appearance of a complete Ego. Like an evening star shining on the nighttime sky showing me the north, the great ideal led me to refine the asperities of my thinking.

With the impeccable seriousness of a seeker of answers, I got into the adventure of detailed knowledge of an immaterial world, of an insufficiently known universe. A knowledge of consciences and souls that comprise a mass of different people. A knowledge, which presented unexpected fluctuations, giving rise to unsuspected forces that emerged seemingly from nothing.

It was an overwhelming work that could depart me from a reality limited by laws, clichés, dogmas, and prejudices. I was at the border between possible and impossible, between creation and evolution. A creator, whose creation is nourished by the warmth and light poured out of the most hidden mysteries of the world, life, and human nature. I could fabricate anytime other laws, to notice constantly new truths, to accept other points of view. I would like to build, like Einstein, the model of a pulsating universe, which would relax and contract as a huge heart. Would I succeed?

I had to polish my own knowledge, in order to increase the value of my own "Ego".

Leadership: Does the appreciation you give to reality depend on the degree of implication in your inner universe, beyond what you are ready to understand from it?

You cannot go through a development process which led to become a better leader, if you are a prisoner into a reality that limits you.

By stopping any reaction, any attempt to get involved in your own fulfillment, in the realization of that something that would motivate you and make you more dynamic – it is like going to a small provincial town in a foreign country, where you do not know anyone, being pursued by the thought that everyone could guess your every movement with a single regard. Basically, you are in the perimeter of a dead zone, where you cannot enjoy the privileges for personal advancement.

What contributes to completing a new conception of the reality that makes up the world of man is that categorical clarification of obsession that does not give him peace, agitating him and reassuring him, which becomes a struggle for the defense of values, beliefs and ideals.

This obsession, supported by the integrity and the great continuity of an attitude in the manifestation of truths that make you see life with other eyes, aligning your system of values to new points of expression and orientation, may contribute to triggering a new correction of image attributed to authenticity, or to distort any good initiative.

Leadership: Is the obsession of approaching the path of creation the center of your universe, beyond the ciphered form of the meaning you give to the term of "validity"?

Obsession is the beginning of the act of creation. It is something that constantly bothers you, an individualized support that is gained by successive additions, a protest against the subordination of aggressive external content, in order to define the normal accepted by the correspondence between the soul, reason, consciousness, and personality. It is a more advanced intellectual development that can see further into the future, being able to tense the spirit on the means necessary for obtaining a desired result, even if these means do not inspire pleasure by themselves. It is that certain something within you that does not let you give up, which anchors you and at the same time gives you wings to believe when all others doubt you.

You can give to your authenticity a form as perfect as possible, only if you polish the diamond inside of you. For only the one who ventures in all the mountain areas of himself, disconnecting from the distorted reality of the outer world, stuffy with all kinds of prejudices, will be able to "awaken" of sleeping that creative force appropriate to people amazing by their skills, and that can be proud of themselves.

I was on the verge of revealing and understanding a world governed by laws, and rational principles. Where the right to "life" and "death" was determined by the existence of a completely different reality, impressive by the way in which interacted the forces that composed it. A world, with a limited power of an abstract understanding, where the deepest secrets, dispersed by a reactionary force coming from within the human being and that was reflecting upon the universe, were the very condition of its existence.

The convergent action effect of the reality and fiction which ensures the veracity of a parallel world, under the pressure of a unique and totalizing change, the perfect form of a timeless dimension which tended to become perfect, could be lost if it was not enhanced by the relationship between art and science, between man and the spiritual plan, and their impact, in order to increase the intensity of the impact on life.

The validity of your universe variant is the size with which you can cross from one end to the other that portion of 100% fidelity in rendering a reality inadequately deciphered by others.

The evening star of a creator shackled in the chains of reality is the expression of the complete perfection, of the high fulfillment of the self that depends on the free will of you. You can become a very good leader, endowed with the ability to shape the characters. You can penetrate as a continuous current in the great whole of human nature, decisively influencing his existence, and you can give to your leadership a form as perfect as possible. But, only if you polish the "diamond" inside of you.

 Note: optimum et maximum – the best and the greatest (lat.).

The First And The Last Wanderer From The Desert Of Shadows

Perfect your evolution, by placing your existence under the sign of Ego that defines and leads you to an ascending path.

I felt that something had to happen to the world that I created. Something, that could no longer be maintained, which could no longer be connected with my plans. Something, that could no longer be returned, which could no longer be recovered. Confused, I was willing to look for a revealing answer in all that continuous chaining of transformations, updates, extensions, conversions, which made possible my wandering in the labyrinth of existence that I heavily crossed it. All were the same and all were different. Strange and repetitive. Confusing and contradictory.

I felt complete stranger and lost, as a wanderer in the desert that seemed never to end up, in a torrid and dry land where no one survives. A desert of dense shadows that coldly enveloped all my senses, all my steps. My heart and soul. Which fully absorbed all my energies, all that I had positive in me, disturbing all my thoughts, one by one.

Just like a famous character of Dostoyevsky, I was about to break contact with the whole world, to get away from myself, to let everything go. And, as a man who categorically refuses any invitation from life, I was risking to retire myself in the solid shell of indifference, of the incomprehensible one. Of the weakness which puts you to silence.

Leadership: Do you accept the status of being "yourself" in creating the content of thought that inspires you, beyond what you can access with the help of a reality that insists on opposing you?

I felt locked in myself, as if my inner world was the victim of some vicious attacks from the part of an unseen and hostile force, with a huge capacity of influence. A force that had a shot down effect, by the more powerful blows, as if put on "repeat". And that could always be decisive. A malignant force, un symptôme d'une maladie inconnue, of which I could not find anything. A discreet presence, but disturbing. Real or imagined?

A long time ago, I closed this topic because I had no choice. However, I cannot hide in me, endlessly, as a coward, what I felt so intensely, good or bad. I cannot let myself be caught in the vortex of the most characteristic phenomenon in my life, without understanding it, without sharing it with others. I cannot promise to me a full life, without finding answer to my own inner unrest. Especially when "She" the single force, definitely dedicated to the interruption of my ascension, was coming back. Each time more particular. More threatening.

Implacable ! I was subjected to a steadfast and durable influence, as a slave of his own convictions, running away from a force that cannot leave him. The biggest part of me felt outraged. I was trying to hide my fear and emotions, pretending that nothing happened to me, that I do not see the truth. However she was there, steadfast, waiting with clenched teeth, surrounding me like a malefic nimbus that manifested its action even stronger on me. I was not supposed to know her, but I was forced to feel her. Almost close, more and more impetuous.

I should have to decide right from the start one thing: who's the boss? I? Or, the Force, which comprised me in a strange consolation, propelling me gently to the mystery of my existence? I was put in front of the alternation: either I or she.

Leadership: Are you the only access to who you truly are in a hypostasis from which is deducted the content of a life that is enclosed within itself?

You cannot lead others, and especially to teach those whom you lead to develop other leaders, if you fail to pass the test of maturity, "the transcending test". The existence awareness of the two sides of your being, successively and sometimes simultaneously, always creates confusion. As it clarifies the new way of thinking, of receiving the reality, as you explore different emotions, your existence will begin to change.

Leadership makes its "entry" into your life long before being properly a leader. During your evolution. When you deal with your Ego, with the inner world that defines you. There, where the meanders of your own evolution are very intricate, where the endless scope of your own thoughts and beliefs are unbalancing your existential balance when each of your feelings are misleading, only then starts the battle for self-knowledge.

Transcendence is possible as a widening of horizon, meaning extensively and in the direction of clarifying the depths of worlds in which you choose to introduce yourself through the power with which thoughts and emotions interact with an ideal beyond time.

Here you are confronted with the hypostasis of the superior man, the genius, who is constantly thirsty for that inherent knowledge, accumulated by the wise throughout the millennia, experiencing the drama of incompatibility with a person of a different inferior condition: you yourself, at a world level.

Leadership: Do you succeed in bringing out something from yourself that you did not thought was higher than the reason you initially limited yourself to?

It is said that the leader, the man who longs to be his own master, is the architect of his own experience. However, nobody ever mentioned that, first of all, the man aspiring to the status of a leader is most of the time a wanderer. An anonymous, in the long and often dark journey towards his own nature, towards his own inner development.

The rocky border of the existence that defines you as a person and as a leader can be pierced, especially if you find a "gap" through which you can get inside an Alter-Ego superior. That gap is the mirror of your consciousness, which must be out of the purest crystal, always remembering who you were, who you are, and whom you could become.

The connection with the whole world can destabilize, if you shy away of yourself, if you stay away of the flaming arrows of your own thoughts and feelings. And the second Ego, the singular force designed to permanently discontinue your ascent, will overwhelm you, destroying any of your privilege that you can use for personal advancement.

The existence awareness of another side, of the second Ego, successively and simultaneously, will create confusion at the beginning. The first Ego will encourage you by saying, and repeating, strengthening your belief that you can rise to the desired level of excellence. The second Ego as a discreet presence, but troubling, will put you under pressure, will put under lock any of your attempts to know yourself, by reminding you how unclear is to be yourself, causing you to lose your "coordinates".

What you can bring forth through introspection, as an attempt to look at yourself only from the perspective of the identity that only posterity can find fascinating, is the very condition of the existence of the superior man: to recognize yourself through the "Other You".

The First And The Last Wanderer From The Desert of Shadows is yourself, in the long and arduous journey towards balance, towards understanding your own Ego, of the past, the present, and the future of that Ego - that needs some coordinates to be defined. However, for this you will have to pass, like a wandering, through those watershed moments that will induce changes in the course of your life. This implies, inevitably, at some inwardly renunciations and transformations.

In football, the refinement of leading the ball and the seduction of passing find their standard assessment by the goals scored. Likewise, the knowledge of your own Ego and the personality pattern, in which you get to fit, find their balance standard in personal confidence that you acquire during "wanderings" on the sinuous road towards the mystery of your existence.

Perfect your evolution, by placing your existence under the sign of Ego that defines and leads you to an ascending path.

Conclusion: More or less, we are all self-analytical. Those with a developed analytical mind are better understanding the consequences of their own wanderings through the labyrinth of their lives, at the same time, drawing lessons from them.

For everyone the best friend will always remain their own Ego but at the same time the worst enemy. Both poles must work together, so that the man would have an ascending path. This thing is essential in leadership.

The Fuel Of A Creator Who Restrains The Chaos

Find the way towards the true essence of human being in order to enhance the depth and quality of your ego.

Two constants were reflecting imperiously into my life, without being able to separate them: what I am of what I can be. Like a passionate man of an unattainable ideal, I launched myself into an exciting and unbelievable adventure. In which, I had to face the unfathomable mysteries, indecipherable by the variety of meanings, which weave simultaneously, giving way to all sorts of interpretations. With much deeper horizons and significations than of the real world, rational, which I thought perfect, and in which arms I nestled all my hopes, all dreams, all vital resources.

Was it an absurd passion of madness?

I fall into a weak extreme, totally unfit to my human constitution, intellectual and emotional. A totally disagree with myself, between angels and demons that streaked with light and shadow my inner universe, was suddenly born, manifesting in the most acute form, forced, of some intangible aspirations. A law trial of a utopian ideal?

Something that does not have a specific purpose. Something that could not be confided, because it could not be explained. Something that was constantly defining, which was fading and lighted as a lamp. Here was the answer !

Something that formed, that changed, which gain another content giving life to other elements subject to external mechanical pressure, more intense, generating a continuous voltage, filtered with the opportunity to be adjusted within certain limits. Something that lived and died, as an engine that requires the adequate maintenance, a field of universal energy, which may limit or expand my ability to be someone else.

The expedition to explore the most inaccessible human areas began. A whole range of issues, nuances, reflections, relationship types, an unknown world through its shape and sizes, was opening up more and more in front of me. A world that lifts you up or gets you down, which can imprison and possess you in every moment, the faraway land of a higher reality, situated beyond any finite human understanding, was outlining at the horizon.

Honor to this non-speaking entity, the magic, which was opening, masterly, the boundaries of truth in front of my will !

Leadership: Does what is challenging for obtaining access to what no one knows have to ability of being accessed more easily as you modify your projection on the image that represents you?

The general tendency in leadership, this relevant science in terms of its influence, which concerns above all the human nature, is not towards differentiation, towards diversity, but rather towards homogeneity. You must unite all the parts of yourself that defines you, and brings them to a common denominator in order to be accepted by everyone.

It Is a categorical condemnation of leadership, of the concepts or idealistic goals that you defend, to try to maximize or minimize the significance of manifestations of the interiority of an outside world, without knowing closely the major aspects of the reality which ensure a true and a fair image of the human being.

The magic of leadership, the brightly lit labyrinth of the most intense and sound rays of science to understand human beings, is based on a total agreement with yourself, with the explorer of you, into identifying and maintaining those mechanisms that trigger vital energies, carriers of unexpected values and virtues that are condensed under a latent form.

The process of awakening of conscience and values which remodels the human being is, in fact, the mandatory and necessary premise of an efficient development, decisive for outlining personal traits.

The image that represents you in a space with horizons and meanings much deeper than those of the real world, leaving self-power to express its will unhinged, is a departure from the rules of a rigid society, in search for expressions and revealing experiences with the purpose of redefining your personality.

Leadership: Does the appreciation you give you yourself depend on the degree of positioning to what is superior to common understanding, in the equation of the tendency of producing a new content of reality?

Something changed in me, as if I made a covenant uniting life with the universe. Two forces manifested themselves simultaneously, blending and balancing each other, like some colors of the rainbow that vibrated, and seemed like disjoining and mixing again into a perfect unity. A divine will and my will were merging together, exceeding any imagination, any limits of reason, becoming a single one, une seule force de connexion. I wonder how many emotions and events are crowded into so little time and space.

Just like Epimetheus that opening Pandora's Box, released all the evils within it, and then, frightened, hurrying to close up the cover, did not notice that the only thing left in the bottom of the box was "Hope" - I launched out in the higher spheres of human conception about the world, fostering a new understanding of the "assets" from which he is constituted, subjecting his existence to some specific norms. However, without realizing that the only thing to look at was the image, the overall picture of the entire rational area of the universe, in terms of self manifestations.

Pushed by the curious nature, I somehow managed to open the gate that connects with the Universe. However, I paid a high price. Without noticing, I felt into temptation. I started to transform myself more and more into a soldier of science, the exalted defender of alchemy, a Merlin obliged to unravel the significance of the fight between good and evil, to which was subjected the human being.

I suffered more and more of a heavy burden. I had to keep intact "Pandora's Box", to protect the most significant mysteries of the being, of life, and universe. As a creator who restrains the chaos. As a magician, a supporter of a superior way of thinking.

I was the sole author of my own destiny.

Leadership: How do you see overall picture of the area of understanding human nature from the need of being the sole author of his destiny?

Knowledge of people, the process, in which you have ventured as a leader, is essential in leadership. Their deep knowledge, their relationships, their individual and common motivations, involves a thorough analysis of human nature, a realistic and especially a prospective research, of this force of masses of people that can propel or can destabilize you, as a leader.

Just as the chemist patiently distills the ethereal substances from plants and flowers, so and you, to open the gate which is found at the border between you and other people, you must analyze the "painting", the overall picture of the entire human rational area, in terms of his manifestations. Then, to try changing the perceptions, which contribute to his formation, and hook them up to your beliefs.

Leadership must be reflected in the upper layers of the entity called "human being". Hence, to live up to the height of your potential as a leader, first cultivate a new understanding of the "assets" from which is constituted the human being, starting from the elements underpinning all its "construction".

Keep locked the Pandora's Box because once opened, the chaos will rule in all that you created as a leader, and the main pillar that supports your entire development will crumble.

Being the only author of man's destiny is to limit yourself to creating a world from which the words "THEM" or "THEIRS" disappear, replacing them with stimuli of the type: "I am the only content of reality to the likes of all."

The fuel of a creator who restrains the chaos reflects the personal position adopted towards the knowledge of people in real life. For advancing in leadership, you must stimulate the deep connections of a perfect self-knowledge, to highlight the strengths of those parts of self that constitute the unity of your being.

Find the way towards the true essence of human being in order to enhance the depth and quality of your ego.

The Light From The Mysterious Depths Of Darkness

Strengthen the bridge between self-knowledge and your potential, in order to perfect your identity.

Sometimes, in the middle of my active existence and animated by the most daring dreams, it produced a fissure. I was suddenly falling into a state of anxiety. I could not get rid of a deep conviction, carefully hidden: that everyone else around are superior to me. I considered myself a big nobody, a fiasco of divine authority, a man suspended by an oscillating ideal, sentenced to gather once again and again the wasted energies of a bygone world.

I shuddered, trembled; I turned my mind on all sides, walking from here to there like an addict, like a man out of mind, as I have received the terrifying commandment to become the slave of a strange passion that looked in all manners of ways to get me away from what I could really be.

My sense of inferiority was understandable, but so hard to bear as a boulder pressing my whole being. I was slipping down more and more up to self-disgust, like a helpless devoid of any leading idea and sense of direction. I was always the last to all, le dernier des hommes. I hugely despised myself. Held prisoner in a relatively narrow space, tied by the rope of the most exhausting trials. Like being punished for an action of that I was not guilty, I carried in vain the stone of my fate irony, each time heavier, like Sisyphus, ignoring crossing the same route, the same destiny.

Leadership: Do you understand the overall image of the area that forms from the need to be the sole author of a path that excludes any possibility of control from outside the "immediate"?

I still considered an inexplicable privilege that I could not sense anything of myself. I could not understand what was so brilliant in some people. How they succeeded, and I do not? I could not lie to myself. I could not pretend to be someone else, rivaling with others. The area in which I developed belonged to pain, fairly persistent, of not being part of the miracle called "meaning", without taking into account the qualities that I had not yet discovered within myself and which could have transformed me immediately into a dominant character.

I became much more aware of what I gained from these turns of my life - the contact with a form of understanding my Ego, more demanding, more incisive, more objective. The "immediate" was that form of breaking away from the past, so that I could be present in the consciousness of the moment of the experience of using favorable circumstances for change, without keeping in mind the traces of the impression I had experienced long ago.

In all those heavy moments, but useful, I had the opportunity to compare what I am, with the final result, what I could be. The finding was obvious: in the mysterious and dark depths of my own being, still, were to be found the necessary tools to produce the spark that could ignite the torch of the most incredible comebacks.

I had the sensation that the more I insisted to get closer to whom I can really be, with so much more I got away of myself. It was a kind of asymmetry between the two sides of me that enveloped my existence: Ego and Non-Ego, reality and pain, self-knowledge and perfection.

I came back on the right path, understanding that the two sides of me were inseparable, and complemented each other. I learned to know myself better. To reveal many wounds, but also many talents. Was it really the first step towards achieving perfection?

Leadership: Do you have to step away from yourself in order to create the perspective of a total recognition in a context such as "conquering your own individuality in relation to others" which is required to be reduced to a single constant called "image multiplication" ?

If you want to achieve something valuable, leadership can become your reliable aid. However, the success in leadership does not come all at once. It comes with small steps, as you rediscover yourself and come to maturity. And these two constants, subordinate to your character, are manifesting only when those «fissures» in your life appear. When you are slipping down more and more up to self-disgust. When you are filled with a sense of inferiority, which urge you to reflection.

Leadership is based on understanding your own defense system against the unseen enemy "conscience" which can accept or not your state of weakness induced by the diminution of your trust reserves. To step away from yourself in order to create the perspective of your own recognition in a context of the type "conquering of one's own individuality in relation to others", actually means to cancel any attempt of being the same man up to that point and realize that nothing will ever be the same.

The multiplication of personal image derives from the acceptance you give to the obligation of being yourself in a context of recognition that is late in manifesting itself. This means to capture yourself in the display of strength of two rival identities: one that is based on the opinions of others, and another that subverts any attempt of the past of making yourself one with it.

Leadership: Can what was challenging to gain access to it will be later be more easily accessed as your consciousness expands its perceptions towards a rise that does not know the monologue?

The future of leadership is born today from a deeper understanding of your own being and of the way you relate to your natural state of development. Therefore, it will look mostly the way you meet it, the way you configure it in the moments when the two parts of yourself are interrelated and influence each other. The first part leads you to blame yourself and to judge your Ego, to get away from yourself. The second one will jump to help you in times of unrest, when you will compare what you are, with the final result, which you could be.

Leo Tolstoy illustrated this point of view in his memoirs, by saying "The most important event in the life of a man is when he becomes aware of his Ego; the consequences of this event may be the most beneficial or the most terrible ones."

The genius of a man, who aspires to perfection, consists in the faculty to understand everything, to resolve all contradictions that occur in his life, between Ego and Alter-Ego. The monologue you must avoid at all costs is that lonely attempt to constantly excuse yourself from the accusations you bring to yourself by failing to turn two entities into one that will represent you anywhere.

By not becoming aware of your ego is like getting into a car that will not start, but nevertheless, you insist to put your seat belt. Basically, you are standing at a point where the meaning of your life does not get any response, still feeding you with the hope that you are safe, and you will ultimately succeed to head into what will be advantageous for you.

Do you find your safety in a utopian way of saving whenever you cannot dominate an inner conflict? Are you slipping down more and more up to self-disgust, like a helpless devoid of any leading ideas and sense of direction? Or, you insist more to get closer to who you can truly be?

Strengthen the bridge between self-knowledge and your potential in order to perfect your identity.

Identity is a constant of the type "total acceptance" inscribed in a context of recognition of personal value that arises with the passage from a small and superficial Ego to a solid and radiant self-consciousness.

The light from the mysterious depths of darkness brings into focus that essential part of the process of self-discovery and perfection which supports the affirmation of your identity.

Just as a writer always emphasizes the particularities of his characters, which he extracts from the objective reality, and projects them beyond normal in some sort of parallel universe, in the same way and you, to realize your strengths and own limitations, you must build up the particularities that highlights you, which you can extract only from the objective reality when you cannot get rid of some harmful beliefs.

Conclusion: To perfect yourself, you must know your potential, which can be achieved only through a deep self-knowledge. Do not try to turn into someone else. But, knowing your "heritage" that God gave you, increasing it through a crafted knowledge and perseverance, you can become that special man for whom you long to the heart.

Do not forget that in you is the force that will propel you forward, in your lies the spark of performance, and of all your achievements. Not knowing this force, not recognizing it, to pass with indifference or recklessness by it, is equivalent with your social collapse...

The Principle Of Change

If you are dissatisfied with reality, shape a different one. If you can't do that, shape yourself.

If you are an admirer of actor Robert De Niro, then you have surely seen the movie "Stanley Iris (1989)". Iris, a widow with two children, tries to rebuild her life and live in a way that would make her well. It is not easy at all for her to manage on her own, and merely as a worker in a pastry shop, her wage was not enough for everything that she needed.

But everything changes when he meets Stanley, a cook. They become friends, but Stanley has a great flaw: he can't read and write. For this reason, he is fired and he must look for another job. He realizes that reality can't be changed. Without being able to read and write he will never get too far. Everywhere he will look for a job, he will be objected with the same thing, again and again: that he is illiterate.

Leadership: Do you express the intention of being a life lesson for tomorrow, finding that unique reasoning for being "COMPLETELY" at the center of a creation in which the nuances of your own character are imprinted?

Stanley is too rational not to realize that his life wastes away, that he sacrifices himself in vain, that the dream world that he so intensely and confidently covets for is getting farther and farther from him. Unhappy with the reality that he was struggling every day, not wanting to always bump into refusals and dismissals, he decides to change himself. So, one day, thanks to his infinite desire to live happily, turns to Iris, whom he asks for help. Iris gladly accepts to teach him how to read and write and, in the end, she really succeeds in teaching him.

However, Stanley, although he has always been illiterate, had one great passion: to learn things. Among other things, he invented a complicated mechanism to cool the cakes. And because he learned how to write and read, he could valorize his invention and sign a very good contract with a company, where he was quickly promoted. He was now living in a different reality, the one he always wanted - a reality where everything becomes possible.

The ending of the movie is sensational. Stanley returns to Iris, whom he owed everything and whom he got to love very much, asks her to marry him and proposes her to move in with him in his new house.

Leadership: Do you allow yourself the respite of supporting the aspiration of renewing self-perception by measuring your ability of being completely present and aware of what you are doing at any given time?

What a triumph for a man like Stanley, to accomplish the impossible. I wonder what was his most important feature. I would certainly say will. And the will to change nourished his dreams. The impulse to a different life, everything he did in order to change the road of his existence gave him green light in order to follow his dreams.

In other words, he learned to chose before he gathered in. He focused on the absolutely necessary things because he didn't have another possibility to change his way of living. He realized that the only way to change reality was to change himself. So he molded his strategies and adapted to the new requirements, this being the only way to fulfill his goals.

Stanley is an excellent example of a person who did what he had to do in life. Driven to the core of his being by a burning desire to fulfill his dreams and deeply influenced by the love of Iris, he decided to put an end once and for all to the dull and painful life he was living.

Self-perception is based on the direct relationship established between the effort of giving a new meaning to life and the nature of intellectual or affection inclinations that push you to action.

The key moment when you become aware of the importance of renewing your self-perception, along with the return to consciousness of the need of giving a meaning to life, based on how you pay attention to the lessons offered by failures, occurs when you have the chance to acquire a new orientation through a gain (material or emotional).

Every man must take a moment in order to ponder upon where he is coming from and where is going. And if, after a careful analysis, the conclusion is that the direction is not the good one, the he must certainly change. And change always comes from inside, because in order to change the outside world, first of all, the solution is to change yourself.

Life is not always easy as every one of us would like it to be, but we could certainly make it better if we try to change ourselves.

Leadership: Do you wake up the echo of your own Ego so you can give a new direction to your life?

Just as a painter fascinated by the expressiveness of the athletic movement is able to seize the human body and his members in the trajectory from one point to another, where the photo instantly fails - and so you, in order to place your existence in another context, to give a new direction to your life, first you must wake up the echo of your own Ego. Meaning to eliminate any tendency of diminishing your own value, to be aware of your abilities, then to firmly set the goals that you want to follow, by seeking opportunities for development even where the others have failed.

Evaluate in a realistic way your position to the factors which could negatively influence your performance, reformulate your system of values by eliminating that oscillation between will, abandonment and doubt - as to regain your own being, then impose to your existence the trajectory towards the access to a new way of manifesting your potential.

Somebody once said that every person is reserved something better in this world if he molds his strategies by which he lives. He was right. It is absolutely necessary to carefully analyze our character and personality and find out what are our vulnerabilities and what are our qualities which can put us in a good light.

Only if we discard our weaknesses and develop our strengths will we manage to build a reality closer to our aspirations.

The change that destiny brings to you starts from the sincerity of your heart and always manifests itself morally through the conditions compatible with vision, innovation and the capitalization of knowledge.

The principle of change refers to deep inner transformation, from the moment we become aware of our unexplored potential, as evidence that personal evolution is possible at any time. Beyond all apparent limitations lies that burning desire for progress, which combined with unwavering determination, creates the idea of spiritual rebirth. So every step towards knowledge becomes a victory, becoming important for the discovery and fulfillment of one's own destiny.

The Seeds Of The Dead Sea

Open your horizons all by yourself, showing your full commitment to your aspirations.

They say that seeds which don't germinate unless they are removed and made fructify in conditions beneficial to their development, lie in the mud of the Dead Sea. Likewise, there are unsuspected forces and unknown virtues within us until a given point, which are not enough or at all exploited. What could be the driving force to activate them?

Day and night, beings are born for the sweet pleasures of life. And also day and night, beings are born as if to be condemned by society. This is one of the messages of the movie "Gattaca (1997)".

Vincent Freeman was one of those people whom society had harshly condemned. Since birth, specialists predicted that he would die somewhere in the age of 30. Myopic and unhealthy, Vincent stood no chance to build any successful career for himself. His attempts to employ in various companies have been in vain. Nobody wanted to hire him because he didn't have "a clean profile".

Your progress has another direction than: forward? But Vincent, despite all predictions, was a man with a strong spirit; it was something within him that nobody had noticed, and he had a great dream. He wanted to go into space, where only a handful of people could get – only those considered to be "superior". His desire to join the elite men grew from one day to another.

What a tremendous attitude ! Always perceiving things in a positive light, gathering all his courage and ambition, putting his imagination to the test, he eventually found a surprising way to get a job at Gattaca as a navigator, and eventually flew to space with the best.

Leadership: Do you validate your input of value in the general model of the motivation for change by making the effort to improve the construction of a universe from which you observe what is happening in your own world?

"You weren't born for it, and you know you do no good if you get out of your womb." What do you feel when you hear this almost every day, from everybody around you?

Vincent did not belong to that class of privileged minds, with strong beliefs, which is always right. He saw everything from the point of view of his desires, being certain that, if he ever believed the world, he would never reach too far. His input of value was represented by the state of resistance with which he answered the challenges and interests of a world that rejected him, but one that could be easily reconfigured through his transformation into a different man, under the guise of a champion.

The immense universe he built for himself, from which he looked only at what was happening in his own world, was symbolized by the attempt to dissimulate to the point of denial the form of his own inner suffering, the inability to ever get close to perfection in an unshakable reality.

Do you intend to follow your path as blazed by fate and not even try to resist it? If you want to get to the top of champions, prepare to think and to act like Vincent.

It's too much for a person like you? The true test of your character doesn't consist in the walls that society raises too many times around you, but in your ability to knock them down. Strengthen your character, raise the bar of performance and never level it down.

Leadership: Can you construct a vision for yourself that evolves despite the beliefs and conceptions of others, starting from the premise that a picture that is erased from the foreground is easier to accept as being an expressive one?

Vincent's personality was composed of two parts: the foreground (the image of a man perfectly integrated in the patterns of perfection) and the secondary plan (the image of an introverted man who cannot recognize his weaknesses).

Relying on the idea that everything in sight is an expression of the Absolute Creator, but does not portray His true identity, Vincent exhibited his mastery of being himself, going through many experiences, knowing that before him stood people who would not have suffered him when finding out the truth.

Be yourself, express yourself, feel good in your skin no matter how many masks you wear or how many identities you undertake !

In order to give value to your person, you have to open your horizons all by yourself, showing your full commitment to your desires. You should never consider anything impossible to achieve.

Only the weak ones see everything through a black cloth. As time passed, Vincent's perspective on things changed. He made efforts to get to a distance from the negative beliefs of others, without being ashamed of himself or afraid of the circumstances.

Is your true value given by the purpose you undertake around a low self-image, but permanently perfected with a winning mentality?

The seeds of the Dead Sea designates your highest aspirations that cannot fulfill if you don't become a different person. As you progress to a status consistent with your level of aspirations, there will be a phase which I would call precursory: to open your horizons all by yourself and develop the confidence in yourself, showing your full commitment to your aspirations.

Release the seeds from the mud of the Dead Sea. Discover your qualities and your talents and learn how to use them in order to achieve your goals and to get out of the difficult situations you find yourself in. Always perceive things in a positive light, gather all your courage and ambition, put your imagination to the test and, eventually, you will find a surprising way to achieve your goals.

The Tribute Paid To Life From The Heights Of The Eternal

On February 02, 2012

Show the superiority of your conscience, by removing the destructive influences of your own feelings' oscillations.

Once again, their eyes met at the party of her father, the great businessman Bill Parrish. Susan approaches Joe with that joy that an accomplished woman feels in front of her lover, keeping deep in her soul the image of their first meeting. Joe felt the touch of her eyes as if a butterfly would be settled on his skin, waking up in him all the emotions that he felt numbed by time.

- Remember that morning in the coffee shop, Joe? When you said: "What's wrong with taking care of a woman, who takes care of you?"

However, in her soul, it was like she begged him "Noble heart, high spirit, I am urging you, by the name of love that you've gave to me, remove by any sign, by some revelation, this drop of heavy doubt that I feel how it invades me ! "

- Did I say that? he asked with fear in his soul.

The sincerity that precedes the awakening of consciousness is a pale attempt to recognize your true purpose and identity where faith in a separate self cannot move on from being a curse to being a blessing.

For a moment, Joe fell on thoughts, as if that remnant of memory touched his innermost cords of existence, emphasizing his pain and increasing his sadness. You suddenly feel a tingling all over your body, springing from the depths of your own thinking, that vibe, that almost imperceptible sound, that quiver of clean conscience.

For the first time, he had to be honest with himself and to Susan. And, to tell her the truth. That he was eternal. But she only a mortal. Nevertheless, how would she react to find out the truth? Now she had time to quickly examine her judgment, to appeal to all her senses, to the only bit of excitement that for the first time in millenniums of existence, the goodness betrayed them.

In the end of the movie "Meet Joe Black (1998)" the Prince of Darkness, saddened by the Susan's feelings of love, resurrects the real Joe – thus bringing a tribute to life from the heights of the eternal, which he directly ruled.

Leadership: Can you manifest yourself through the need of feeling superior and dominating an individual, considering the contradiction that is created from what you where before and what gets lost within you?

Regardless of the circumstances, the clear conscience appears like a victory, sometimes after several stages of confrontation with yourself. And this victory is encountered enough rarely, generally only at the people that add meaning to their life, doing something that really matters for others.

The French philosopher Albert Camus wrote: "The greatness of a faith is measured by its doubts." Can you carry out something against some deep principles, against a consciousness that knows what is good? Do you doubt the accuracy of your faith? Do you prefer controlling and managing everything from a distance, surpassing any limits imposed by your image and your self-esteem, regardless of the circumstances?

By infringing your consciousness, leaving it to radiate impure feelings, which separates and creates uncertainties among those around you, it is like getting off at the wrong train station.

The journey towards the personal development you will do it by detour routes, you will explore unknown "territories" - feelings, emotions, feelings. And nobody will care to tell you where to get off. You need to figure out by yourself where you need to stop and how to feed your soul once arrived at the destination.

Only your conscience will tell you how it is better. However, the negative emotions will prevent you connect to your clear conscience, keeping your eyes closed, keeping them apart from the world that you can easily recognize as an ally and that can serve you as a bridge towards a higher level of self-knowledge.

Being honest with yourself in relation to the parameters of consciousness means expressing a truth that makes you special – in memory of what you where, before releasing yourself from a past that challenges you to constantly re-learn what the present moment means.

The tribute paid to life from the heights of the eternal expresses your ability to listen to the voice of your conscience, perceiving the inner state changes over a period of time.

As a leader, your concerns should gravitate, in particular, around the states of consciousness, or rather around your image and personality that reflect your own defects or qualities, of which you are aware or not.

If the negative feelings continue to take you over despite any attempts to escape of them, then your conscience will never be on your side and will never be reconciled with what you do.

To be filled with remorse means to have your mind wander on scenes lived in the past, in a brilliant environment, atoning for the mistake of having left your true identity for who you have become.

Just as the human body manages to maintain its temperature almost constant, even if the external environment suffers very significant variations of temperature - and so you, to keep your clear conscience, and for it to accept the truth of what you are, you need to keep constant the "quantity" of positive emotions that occurs in you along with overcoming your weaknesses - even if the environment in which you lead your existence influences your personality, even if your feelings suffer significant variations.

Show the superiority of your conscience, by removing the destructive influences of your own feelings' oscillations.

You Lost Sight Of It, Didn’t You?

On May 07, 2014

Turn your leadership into a reality check tool, without trying to reveal people's true value depending on your expectations.

If we see an oak tree leaning to one side, does that mean it does not have strong roots? This question, sparking a comfortable mood, reminds me of that old comedy, with "School for Thieves".

The instructor used to test from the very first day the prowess of his students. Every time he interviewed someone, he left a $50 bill on the table. He used to leave for a few minutes and, when returning, he would notice the bill was still there. "I'm sorry, you are not suitable for this job. You should have... You know what a real thief would have done, right?"

But, stupor ! The bill was still there. Each of the students had stolen something else from the table. One stole a pack of cigarettes, another, a flower from the vase and another, a lighter. So who rose to the bait?

At the final test, when each student had to prove his "qualities" in real life, the professor concluded that things will never happen as he wished. What we expect to happen will always happen differently.

Leadership: Does your experience allow to be placed in some strict parameters to accomplish, by a vision beyond the visible reality?

We build scenarios, establish strategies, test all kinds of judgments and draw conclusions about people, erroneous conclusions, while contributing to the widening of the disapproval current of those that, in case of leadership, dare to advance to a higher level of performance.

Why? Because we don't "feel" the truth, we can't see beyond what we expect people to do, beyond the rigor curtain to dominate a self-imposed reality.

When experience does not allow to be placed in some strict parameters to accomplish, by a vision beyond the visible reality, then the vision itself is shaky, not the experience.

From the first to your last intervention in the area of training and assessment of people, you can be traversed by a hostile spirit, an offensive style of leadership, being one of the main elements causing a certain frustration among people, causing them to draw into themselves and lower the bar of excessively high expectations.

Do not try at all costs to test a man, for his true value will not always come to light according to your expectations. The extraordinary is never obvious, never stands out a mile and is not the result of its own laws of building the desired reality. It is always where one does not look, where one would never even think.

Leadership: Is the experience that you measure through your acquired skills a form of submitting yourself to an external reality that dictates your own judgment and honor?

A vision beyond the visible reality usually belongs to a will that judges everything by achieving the correspondence between what corresponds to the ideal of perfection and what corresponds to an exigency of the difficult to achieve practical life, especially if it is arbitrary and contorted.

You lost sight of it, didn't you? Bring out that side of your experience that you ignore due to the strict coating covering the aspects of the vision that completes true reality.

Peyton Westlake

On June 29, 2016

Learn to connect to a noble cause, moving from its place the visible part of the reality you experience.

Ever since I began studying the fundamental notions of science, under the influence of the need of affirming myself and being unique in my own way, solely through the means of self-satisfaction, I seemed accompanied by the feeling that I live in another world. I felt tied to something that didn't naturally belong to me, something that did not yet exist, as if I had stumbled upon a landscape no painter could have imagined.

All this unceasing activity, like a disease of the intellect that you can't get rid of, of which only artists are struck by, a disease that explodes, pulverizes, spreads in the state of mind with the brilliance of phase transformations accompanied by diffusion, bearing in them symbols and chemical valences, was a form of departing myself from my suffering. From the shortages of identity occurred from not exploring in due time the line of personal records.

The secret of obtaining superior knowledge resides precisely in the noise of findings produces by the inquiring mind, from this annoying background sound, while meaningful, speculative, triggering a strong reaction in the subconscious, making you experience the transition towards another dimension, in the virtue of a virtue of universal balance.

You suddenly get to experience the film of a mysterious journey, undertaken directly between independent parts, in an isolated physical system where all forces work towards obtaining balance, uniformity, between algebraic equations, bring objects, incident rays, electromagnetic fields, in which is reflected the addition of stimulants that encourage the formation of a new mental construct.

I needed the artistic experience of a Rembrandt and the visionary knowledge of an Einstein to approach the ideal of perfection in every aspect of a utilitarian creation if I wanted my invention to work and therefore to be successful.

Leadership: Can you discover yourself, as an intellectual orientation, in the direction of a journey under the sign of personal worth where creation acquires meaningful valences in the only existence of the intention to produce a prestigious result?

The beauty of the art of being more than you are, the ability of soaring towards what is outside the condition of a prisoner in an unpredictable existence, consists of the unity between qualitative and quantitative, on which the informational vectors, in a variable measure, acting through a sort of bizarre effect that destroys its cause, facilitate your entry into a sort of revolution of the mind.

And there is only one way of testing this ability: embodying an absolutely brilliant role of which you never thought yourself capable of, a scientist, a Peyton Westlake, with a different identity. Personal value takes into account the inevitable consequences of past causes when you find that you have worked according to your will and experience and not forced by someone else, so when the most important reason for an effective and novel approach is not overcome by the role that others play it in your life.

Leadership is a continuation of the orientation of man towards a more stable version of himself, linking the means of self-satisfaction with the information needful for transitioning towards a different stage of expansion of personal worth. In turn, personal worth has at its core that superior intelligence that presents the ability of perceiving, from a higher perspective, what you think you are capable of possessing and being.

Intelligence is an awakening of the abilities of surpassing personal limits, at a level of deep intuition and understanding. It cannot be reached exclusively through the means of self-satisfaction, but by participating to the process of forming conclusions, hypotheses, theories, by extracting and analyzing the findings from numerous sources of information.

The danger of intelligence, encountered only by the man who throws himself in the whirl of the all-encompassing, is that of believe that the reality he experiences is everything, and that through science he can transmit what is within himself. In all cases, man is responsible only when he has not worked willingly, or when he has worked in counter-responsibility, forced by an outside force to abdicate from any provisions and regulations.

And when the invention of a chemist hits the fate of a molecular charge, being pushed by a foreign mind, it means that he did not work according to reasons of reflection, judgment and reasoning, but from an impulse born out of the need to share his emotions with other people.

Leadership: Do you think that you have to form a certain complex of skills and abilities assigned to the important role you have in enriching a precious image of an order-mess transformation?

In order for intelligence to contribute to the development of personal value, first of all the possibility of a selection must be taken into account, of a choice of the characteristics of propagating information – needful for the acquisition of certain, very sought after, abilities, which can induce the feeling of a distinct, authentic identity. Therefore, you need to better weight the ensemble of successive-alternating elements that you can recognize and assume in the process of substantiating scientific concepts.

I read in a book of physics and optical problems the following: "The image given by the converging lens acts as a virtual object for the diverging lens. Using the Gaussian formula of lenses, in the case of the diverging lens, for the situation in which the object is virtual, it is given that the converging lens forms the image in the image space of the diverging lens at a distance of 20/3 cm from it. Because the image given by the converging lens is formed in its image space, at a distance of 30 cm from it, we obtain the distance from the object to the converging lens equal to 60 cm."

Discovering answers to certain questions, deducing all possible combinations and permutations between the options of filtering information, first starts with the pleasure of condensing into a painting, closely framed into a new theory, all the results of the various observations on a general background of suspicion.

Yet another one of the peculiarities of becoming is a third eye, which closely views the painting, perceives the elements that cannot be seen regularly and manages to connect you to a noble cause: that of moving from its place the visible part of the reality you experience.

The role that you have in the evolution of science can be represented by a precious image of an order-disorder transformation when the determination with which you can prove that you can build a reputation is achieved by developing the capacity to face unconventional professional situations, would be the formulation of a notion deriving new creative rules that do not attenuate their effects.

In the equation of science, order or disorder can be the catalyst of a forward step only if the possible combinations and permutations between the information filtering options you process are likely to materialize in a finished product following a maneuver that, in the opinion of others it either does not exist or does not work.

A noble cause promoted by the incessant activity of the intellect in the creative space can be exerted by moving the visible part of the reality that you are experiencing in comparison with someone more experienced in the field and escaping from that contest of circumstances leading to an outcome equal with rejection from others.

Peyton Westlake is the main hero from the film "Darkman (1990)". He not only symbolizes the struggle to find a new existential purpose that is marked by the same implacable determination, but at the same time symbolizes the finding of the elegance of intelligence which, although subtle, is distinguished easily and decisively.

This type of intelligence is, first of all, an assumption of a new reality that can only be accessed through the force and methods of science.

The Phenomenology Of Exceptionality

On February 17, 2015

Discover those indices of exceptionality which involves the affiliation to the status of a model to be followed, by pushing higher and higher those virtues that put you in touch with yourself.

An untying of enigmas shaped the line of opportunities hidden by reflection, by living and expression, crossed by an intense creative drunkenness that made me perceive the world differently. I was sailing through the secret meanings like a magic shadow before the growing phenomenon of inviolability between the consecutive lows and highs of the type of thoughts: "What would have happened if ..?" - backed by the oscillation between their aggregation on a particular area and put them on the physical plane.

All this excessive zeal, updated by progressive advancement of the penetrating thinking, without which the transition to a new experience could not be complete, established the basis for calculating some indexes of special perception. Aiming the incomprehensibility, involved in conscious and unconscious reactions of fulfilling a great number of functions for correcting the science. Type reactions A + NonA, subjected to some volume variations, were supporting the search and resizing any features that had not been revealed.

It was looming in my case the same relation developed by attachment appropriate to the old Pierre Munier from the work of Dumas, which identified his life with that of his child, that he felt he lived the same experience and could not conceive that he would even support a moment the loss or even his mere absence.

Everywhere I seemed to be accompanied by this spiritual reality full of meaning, full of substance, full of feelings, capable of selecting indices of exceptionality from the block of a universe of thoughts. With her help I could clarify and communicate my beliefs in a way that others would resonate until there was nothing left to conquer, no continent to discover, no idea to defend.

Leadership: Do you always let your feelings surface in an exaltation of what you can express at the highest level through a mirroring in "something more than yourself"?

Being a deep thinker means delving in a new self-discovery experience in the name of an approach to life built into the interaction with the meanings of events that make you meditate, ask yourself questions about various aspects of your experiences in different contexts. But so as to fill your soul with a knowledge doer of amazing things and new changes of perception towards the reality that'll push above all the most important virtues, such as curiosity and the appreciation of discoveries.

The whole work of the self hangs on the number and quality of those reflections that make it easier to achieve the goal: recognizing a personal value that confronts the time and the attempts of life. The way you think about yourself and your life, through the knowledge accumulated over time and along with the impulse of the feeling of belonging to a higher consciousness, creates the virtues of a strong personality capable of giving a new meaning to the reality that it represents.

The first virtue that puts you in touch with the significance of life is associated with the ability to discern between what puts you in the eyes of the world and what isolates you as a determinant of a cumulative spiritual state. The second virtue puts you in touch with yourself, being associated with the idea of transforming existence into fiction from the perspective of a language experience. These two virtues, gathered in an emotional and psychological life, form the status: "a little more than yourself."

Leadership: Are you prepared to accept in your essence the reflection of a mirror in the forefront of life on the background of a reality that is devoid of the verisimilar, but expressing its explicit acceptance of the content of a priori thinking?

You can create premises for development of an exceptional leadership based on the existential process that depends entirely on your soul, by projecting with the imagination (beyond control) the surreal reflection of another life. To pass through an experience-type of virtual reality, sailing among its symbolic meanings, you win a smaller or greater amount of information and inspiration that later may identify you as a user of a product intellectually oriented towards the area of unique, of prototype.

Just like Alice in Wonderland, you'll be tempted to constantly look into a mirror, to the beyond, lying in the field of self-knowledge - at the crossroads between the consecutive lows and highs of the type of thoughts "What would have happened if ..?" and "Why would this happen?" This equates to the attempt of verifying your idealistic visions into a reality that persists to react by different rules, of the soul which start an open battle against reason.

The mirror reveals the different plans of accepted reality on the background of self-affirmation in what we call the search for an authentic sense of life. For example, if you look in a mirror, you don't see only yourself, you see what you expected to get from a life put under the sign of aesthetics, conjugated with the sense of good, beautiful, noble, confident - which confirms a reality more powerful than a dream.

Leadership: Can you endure the truth that can confirm the possibility of overcoming an identity crisis, demonstrating that the world beyond the mirror is the same as the one you are in?

Someone wrote at one point in an article of literary critique: "Alice, fascinated by the question of whether the world behind the mirror is the same as the one she is in, uses imagination to make the glass soft and then turn it into a kind of "mist", which makes it possible for the heroine to pass into the Mirror House. When leaving the mirror world, the heroine does not return on the same path, passing through the mirror but awakening from a diurnal dream."

No one can limit a being that bears in its essence the reflexion of a mirror located in the foreground of the stage called "life", aligned with the imagination of creating other worlds, of looking beyond what is actually present. We refer to the transition towards a new experience that might not be complete only by progressive advancement of the penetrating thinking that goes beyond external phenomena, establishing the basis for calculating the indices of special perception.

These indices, increasing the flexibility in approaching some new visions creates by untangling some limiting or restricting wires a particular state that fulfills you. You start to see yourself as a more complex being, not as you are, but as you can imagine. And these indices of exceptionality can be found only in the solid block of a universe of thoughts and exploited then as a primary source of learning, of assessment, of creation, of personal and professional redefinition.

The truth that can confirm your ability to overcome an identity crisis is built around the belief that everything you think can become reality. Understanding and listening to the self, from the perspective of the wonderful structures of the "mirror" existence is a privilege of the sufficiently deep ones. First of all, leadership should have as a support the practice of the spiritual essence through the lens of science, then through the lens of consciousness to discover the meaning of a vision of the world in which you are moving every day.

The content of a priori thinking is formulated by the following idea:

Everything you think about yourself can be suggested at any time by a picture of reality you have not seen before, but one you accept as being a part of you.

The Phenomenology of Exceptionality refers to those daring searches beyond the rigors of reality, suited to the revealing expression of yourself, which outlines the representative side of your way of life. That is why I grant a high grade to the Internet user who called on a blog: "Try to let your mind to understand your soul. When the soul understood the mind and the mind felt the soul then arises in you the new man, the man who wins."

The exceptionality involves rising with your mind and soul at the size of the new man which defeats any limit. Or, better said, up to the human dimension that continues to go beyond reality with the new methods of reinventing the self and the identity.

The Phenomenology Of Imagination

On February 15, 2015

Report yourself to authenticity of storytelling in the light of subjective knowledge, by emphasizing experiences lived in the middle of the reality you are creating.

Hard to describe, such as the magnetic spectrum of a current carrying coil, my thinking seemed to be subjected to some forces of direction obtained from the equal relations between real and unreal. Its construction could not be detached from the edge suspended between wakefulness and dream. In fact, the thinking that helps me to express my beliefs and points of view has been transformed into a hard disk that seemed to store the secrets of the entire universe. Willy nilly, I managed the first insight into the imaginary world.

In the special order of the symmetrical elements found on the axis of a narrative construction, to my imagination is has been reserved the area of some antecedents with positive results, based on some conquests of epistemological fundamentals dissolved in the deepest secrets of an esoteric transcendental.

Things that are hard to understand are the key to a fantastic prose, but even so imagination has to sneak out of the fertile soil of reality. The art of writing is the fruit of the skill to select what is beautiful in nature, everything that remains in our memories, passing every idea through a process of symbolizing reality in a time become immortal.

My point of view can be found at the end of the novel "On the thread of the spider web of memory", written by Cella Serghi, as follows:

"When my novel Gențiane appeared, Camil Petrescu died. But how alive he was in my memories, how much he lived in the characters, in his work, and how well he knew that the existence of death compels us to give our lives a meaning, one which death he cannot take away."

Leadership: Are you willing to acquire an experimental knowledge of the course of the superior "Ego's" life, fabricating a reality in which nothing seems to be what it is, but in which everything communicates and reverberates?

"I am not that man" informed me the natured unconscious impulses, the aprioric forms of knowledge carried to extreme, in a dizzying zigzag produced by an unlimited magnetic force that guided the frequency waves of reality towards a new science. A science of the correlations and interdependencies between phenomena still unclear, through random thinking operations used in a state of self-reflexivity.

And when the man pushes aside the door of that vital parts of himself that requires resetting the identity with the creative imagination momentum, is like as if he passes through a kind of extended hypnosis, waves of light penetrate to different depths and creates that virtual reality - a present, in which the man forgets himself, forgets everything around him.

In the sleep caused by the state of the lyrical Ego, a hypnotized can answer the questions that do not have yet a scientifically proven answer. Clairvoyance begins to speak. The subject is transformed into a visionary of the provisional, into an exponent of the obscure superiority. The world becomes a reflection of a dream produced in another dream, an expression of the unity between the absolute truth and the relative truth, an embodiment of an evolved pensiero magico that is no longer guided by attention, but is subjected to some subjective and affective factors.

A character of the writer Ion Moja, comprised by the same imagination with no sense of measure has left to break through the question: "Hey you, who do you think you are?" Except that for the lack of something to cling to, of someone within which to exist, he had to accept that he was wrong. Actually and ultimately, his imagination, like mine, was down to a purely experimental knowledge.

The life of the superior Ego can be identified and understood by analogy with a fictional work that has become reality, by the way you are open to experiencing a line of events without a final one, from which you choose as the reference model the one that suits you better. The higher ego is a state of continual transfiguration, a continuous fulfillment of your being through the knowledge given to you not only by the quality of witness of your time but also by the biographical encounter with various legendary figures.

Leadership: Do you support that special attitude of the intelligence that accompanies the sense of conscience to accomplish an untried experience?

A leading place in trying to improve the quality of creative thinking is the ability to delineate yourself from the immediate reality, relying on the imagination's reflection patterns. More specifically, you need to consider ensuring the experimental dimension of understanding about what cannot be perceived in the course of changing external circumstances. This understanding must open up to the representations of a virtual world, but correspond to the real understood as a source of inspiration, and less as a determination of a form of change.

The experimental dimension produces creative spark for forming or approaching an intuitive-perceptual vision useful to authenticity in rendering the idea of "artificial consistency" by replacing the logical thread of the unfolding of existential events with dependence on the "haphazard" factor that increases the significance of the story.

This dimension supports not only the act of creation, but rather the development of that new science of correlations and interdependencies between still unclear phenomena, through operations of thought used in a sort of self-induced state.

No wonder that the Romanian writer Rădulescu Motru said: "The knowledge retained by memory has nothing of the universal panaceas value. To become helpful, they must be supported by a special attitude of intelligence of the one who receives them."

He refers to that attitude of low profound understanding that can be corrected and straightened only by the result of some inner searching, accompanying the meaning of the conscience by the accomplishment of an untried experience.

A mutation of meanings in the very context of the situations described in terms of circumventing reality aligns with the efforts to train you and to form you as a visionary of those still unimaginable as an exponent of obscure but profound and reforming superiority.

The triggering factor of a story that catches the reader from the first to the last page is that dose of reality perceived as hyper-connected to a single immense structure called "artistic vision" - because it provides an increased degree of expressiveness to the significance of depth attributed to man's purpose in world.

The Phenomenology of Imagination is presented as a position held by the man who always wants to approach a new peak. He must possess and reinforce that natural sense of penetration to the essence of some new knowledge and new points of reflection through a "sleep" of reason, taking control over the forces of direction obtained by the equality of relationships between real and unreal.

The most important obstacle that you must pass over in the struggle for your better representation on the scale of assertion and value it is exactly you - in an attempt to substitute yourself to a mentality that crosses the fiction.

Can you support the development of authenticity by increasing the self-awareness through a process of subjectivity or even denial of the reality, through an act of indirect knowledge?

This initiative favors an understanding of what you really are beyond any expectations.

Pink - The Color Of Love

On May 27, 2018

Learn to recognize yourself from the perspective of a warm glow so that you will grow in the revival of a work that never dies.

Art is primarily color, an eternal dimension of the educated self in a culture of authentic beauty, the forefront of a long-thoughtful act of creation that reflects the way of thinking, feeling and understanding of life in the pursuit of a play of tones and nuances, lights and shadows, natural lines and curves. This is where it all started.

The understanding and explanation of immediate art, with all its concrete aspects closely linked to the existence of a God who continues his expansion of abandoned meanings despite all the nuances of optics, behaves as a force of expression that is difficult to separate from the whole sense of time. Few have the artist's ability to deepen himself in formulating a chromatic premise as the only inspiration of the Holy Spirit and to face sustainable cultural landmarks, because everything in him expresses the tendency to expand the most intense mirage.

Turning vision into action involves recognizing the value of contrasts, creating a balance between light and shadow.

Ever since I was a child I had understood that I am like a stranger on a mystical living background, neighboring the initiating plunge in a parallel and accelerating world, but protected from any anecdotal contamination from the visible part of a continent almost completely submerged in oblivion. Art, with its secrets full of the sensibility of the universe, is not at everyone's fingertips.

In a completely amazing way, I had to win my success in an atmosphere of strong, obscure contrast, modeled by a fairly convincing red light that treats the spectacle of a deeper, more hidden beauty of the soul. Something insignificant as a plastic construction, but which received immense proportions of rigor by using the principles of art as a reflection of a literary-artistic life of remarkable effervescence.

To perfectly recognize myself from the perspective of a warm, underground glow, into a bloody, uncultivated fund, vitaminized by deep meanings, which presents itself as a mosaic of greatness in front of pure aesthetic consciousness, was what in art is called: "The rebirth of a work that never died."

Leadership: Do you control your tendency to be considered a part of an abstract universe, reserving the privilege of a life seen as a correlation between some colors that focus their shine on an authentic image background?

The initiator of an artistic movement that will complete its essential features in the 21st century, provoking by its example the extension of an exclusive concept of educating the masses, in the style of Paracelsus, which let understood the universal message "Hold on to knowledge until it falls madly in love with you", has mixed or fully fed with a cultural supplement, full of meanings and symbols, which are at the foundation of any plastic or literary construction.

I should have approached a splendid example of preserving intellectual charm as a result of the contrasts between the supreme beauty of a graceful heart that always knows to be tender and the culmination of finite art by trying to symbolize the exposure space of a series of educated subjectivisms, full of consistency, as they appear in the attempts of the great artists to give birth to a new stream of sensation and thought.

Pale Pink and intense Red. The combination of these two nuances with values centered on the ideological background of a rather insistent expressionism is done by transfiguring the sensible into a superior, pure and harmonious spirituality. The most intense emotions are confused with the color of the blood flowing through a heart full of jasmine as a kind of law of nature that confirms the symbolic ambivalence of a temporal and immortal, sensible and intelligent macrocosm alike.

Leadership: Does the aesthetic with which you ennoble the vastness of the subject called "life" confirm the arguments about the emotional reactions that invite to contemplate an authentic artwork?

The very coordinates of thinking based on a background image superimposed on a crepuscular chromatic fairy tale in a fictional scenario dominated by the impulse to creative exploration can be associated with the artist's impossibility of knowing his emotional content in a sort of infinity column seen as an attribute of instrumental polychrome, in the form of an echo of serious philosophical resonances: Take a look around, don't you see what I have meant?

My master, close to the amazement that a strong light focused on the joints of an infinite universe in which deity is the supreme model, often repeats: "In art, touching the heart of the pattern is for naught if you do not reveal the soul that complements yours."

To represent the spectrum of the finest vibrational signals of joy or pain, oscillating from nerve to nerve in a hatching of chromaticity perfectly balanced with the deep meaning of each story itself, is to modify all the entities and dimensions of the most infinite universe you could imagine. But at the same time, you have to respect the secrets and the gift of the mirror, without giving up on your personal story.

The world of God has left in favor of art only its positive, and he who manages to use the raw material (which represents just as many metaphors and symbols) to compose a new chromaticity of the balanced relations of red-green complementarity, in the note of a dark-obscure soul characterized by the supremacy of forms inspired by nature, will become a force of expression and artistic value.

Leadership: Can you prolong your life through aesthetics that ennoble your ego, without turning your feelings into a color without flicker and without reflections?

The beauty that the artist inspires is a color that speaks about the infinite space of the universe suspended between dream and reality, which the inner eye identifies as a message of a materiality that gets spiritualized. And also through an artist who has gone around the world, the writer Mika Waltari better highlights the experiences a soul that enters the spiritual world and cannot escape goes through.

"Listen, stranger ! I fret alone to dare do what no one else yet did. The gods protect me, but I do not know if they really understand the despair I am dominated by in my attempt to showcase my unique traits in the world. Those who do not know the language of art, its size and monumental scale, are satisfied with its traditional forms and colors. That is why the world is full of skilled people, who enjoy success and have an easy life. But a true artist only compares himself to himself. No, I have no rival in this world ! I, Aruns of Tarquinia, compete only with myself ! "

The constant expression of a deep, careful look that is lost in the light of the destiny of others is what constitutes and causes a thing, a reaction or a visual direction around an idea: it is easier to translate your story into images than to be yourself framed in a reality that goes beyond the borders of the everyday world.

An authentic image background resembles a color without a beginning and an end: it captivates and deceives you at the same time because it allows you to consider yourself an infinite creator, a small part of the earthly, visible and cognizable universe, but not the absolute master in the perfect plan of the macrocosm in which divinity is the supreme model.

Leadership is the content of a story that you can color as you want, but within the fixed boundaries of a subject that remains immortalized over time in a painting that cannot exceed its original size.

Pink - The Color Of Love is the expression of the emotional dimension of the color that I choose to represent "my own story" that has not been visible so far, at least not in the case of a painting signed with blood letters in the literary universe, in the lower left corner of the page in which the earth unites with the heavens: Neculai Ioan Fântânaru.

Place The Dream At My Feet So That I May Go With You Towards Reality

Try to give meaning to a strictly individual intrapsychic experience, so that the impact of your creation is not limited to external observations on material reality.

So many times I have tried to come to terms with myself, to relate to certain decisions with positive potential that could have been taken without direct intervention on causes and effects of a subjective nature, whatever they may be. Just as many times I tried to traverse the field of knowledge like an artist of the brush who reconciles two parallel universes very well, insisting on the most delicate chromatic and ideational overlaps, given that I knew nothing about realism and surrealism.

The material world being reduced to color, visual perception and daydreaming, I paid more attention to the huge, deep, all-encompassing notion, which is the DREAM, the matter of a beginning of artistic path, an essential element of daydreaming and creation, the middle primordial transcendence of the concrete. Thus, I believe that the dream is characterized by an ineffable fusion of the creator's ego with the image of a transfigured reality, which can be considered – why not – the image of the Heavenly kingdom.

And I could never have imagined anything more difficult to achieve in all this Vousernharus, the need to establish a boundary between man's curiosity and his intrusion into the space of absolute subjectivity, than to make an art liberated from the pressure of the concrete.

It is rare when a Creator sees in a dream the imitation of a reality pierced by the imaginary of a landscape of memory, representing a scenario of a memorialist action that, for one reason or another, impresses us with the visibility of all those who are and are not.

Does this mean that I have paid so much attention to my soul that I feel and perceive a world beyond the familiar, characterized by an intensity that nullifies any concealment, but accepts any expressiveness?

Leadership: Do you understand your artistic approach as a continuous confessional exercise, in a sensitive and intense dialogue with a reality that has not yet taken place, but is waiting to happen?

Let me tell you what I dreamed: I dreamed of a world in which art depended strictly on the suggestiveness of a recurring metaphor, such as that dependent thinking unfolded in circles, and creative thinking in spirals. In this world I was a perfect painter who always had at his disposal the right canvas, brush or color to fulfill his artistic approach as a continuous confessional exercise, in a sensitive and intense dialogue with the universe. Seeing his sails, you immediately transposed yourself into a corner of heaven and were permeated with calm and peace of mind.

Even the dream to which the bibliography of a particular thought connects me is based on the belief in an unchanging and transcendent ideal of beauty, because it has occurred as a major mutation in the way the conclusions of encounters with myself are communicated in another dimension of reality.

The dream shows the coordinates of an improvised, avant-garde cerebral imagery, shows the increase of the contrast between appearance and essence, between the illustration of the soul disposition of the man who trusts himself and the temporal perspective of watercolor painting reflections. An imagery not infrequently bold and daring...

The artistic approach is a method of improvisation in which the narrator and the characters work together, simultaneously, and in which reality and dream are so well intertwined that the reader fails to differentiate between them.

With a kind of hidden pride, with the indulgence of inexhaustible depth and mystery, I expressed in these lines a kind of summary of my passage into another reality, a mystical process which in art is called Luisorethis, or the "reconstruction of the visible into the invisible". It is as if I had assumed the privileges of a higher entity in another space, under the guise of a hero called the "spirit of cerebral observation", discreet and fine at the same time, to exist under the banner of the Illusions of a Fantastic World.

The dream is the creation of a screenwriting mind that wants to suggest or emphasize a certain message. To be in dialogue with the visible and to be invisible in the plan of a magician who wants to rule over the higher and lower worlds. This fact makes the difference between an expansive, damping stage of consciousness that does not support restraint, and a form of imagination pierced by the invisible of a special epic in which the emblematic destinies are projected on a background painted in warm tones.

The artistic approach is a migration from the plane of an extrinsic to an intrinsic orientation. It is the perimeter of an emblematic figure, automatically transposed into an original creation that never ends because everything the artist experiences is part of the plane of an image that tries through the sensible to penetrate the intelligible.

Place The Dream At My Feet So That I May Go With You Towards Reality is the motto of an artist who sees everything through a "spiritual lens", recognizing his faith by accepting the challenge of seeing himself from the perspective of a new dimension of expression, of reflection, beauty and "elevation".

Someone said this well in a blog post: "When we go or are invited guests in the soul of an artist, we can be grateful that that man gathered his inner strength and chose to come before us, to expose them. In this way we can enjoy the expressiveness and beauty of his work and creation."

Player And Gamer

On April 21, 2016

Demonstrate your superiority by extending your freedom of manifesting yourself in a framework whose content is at the intersection between creation, interpretation, and coordination.

I always knew what I wanted from myself, who or what awaited me in a fabulous part of the world. A world that seems to be taken from the game League of Legends, reviving that extra glow of a décor of an impressive realism, inspired from an aspect of a surreal life, even if at times everything would turn against me.

In this case, my attitude corresponded to a player dropped into a battle arena, being someone else entirely from who I was initially, assuming the role of a "Summoner", unseen, who controls a "champion" with unique abilities in battle against a team made up of other players or champions. To emphasize the superiority of the faculty of recognizing a living, more alert, more evolved reality, which other people would hardly be willing to accept, means to trust a man closer to the universe who accepts the challenge to rise to the height of a legend worthy of a Creator of parallel worlds.

The hazard can be admitted as a cause of occurrence of a challenge from which looking behind, looking forward are deducted, leaving only the spell of appearances, that drunkenness of the first steps in a parallel world, the sleepwalking happiness of an epic carpe diem for which no explicit permission exists, nor justification, but only acceptance of a challenge.

Leadership: Does the experience you attribute to your superiority in handling the revealing side of the hazard open the horizon of a broader theme about the interactions between intellectuality and power?

It seemed that I was remote controlled by a powerful computer. Basically, I had to execute well-established orders of an inventive user who, by using his own experiences and perceptions, would break any rules and any limits. For how long could I have followed the instructions of this final-user? How could I spark his interest so that he gives me another axis of orientation in the "game" project?

Me and My User. Player and Gamer. Together we formed a consciousness, a haunting presence, indispensable to a development that it seemed I had forgotten. And I would like for those who do not have the answers to admit it. The interaction between intellectuality and power has as support for the act of creation itself that idea of the future that can lead to a way of knowing the reality favored by the encounter with art, with dreams, with the future, with the impossible, with another variant of your own being.

We have not met to save the world from the toils of a time that increases its rate of leakage asymptotically to a close deadline, towards that end of the world predicted by many enlightened spirits, but rather to penetrate, as if in a dream, one in the space of the other. Until, in the silence of the sweet awakening, everything proved to be an alternative to life.

Leadership: Have you started to reap the fruits of the boundless ambition to be a kind of replica of yourself that pushes you farther and farther towards an "acceptance of a challenge"?

Anyone who wants to develop their superiority of imagination over reality, appropriating that total amount of information given by the sum of perceptions they experience uniquely, basically intervenes in the free game of a hero in line with or in opposition to his creator.

Creation and interpretation are two landmarks of leadership, symmetrical to feelings and the passion that accompany involvement in a relationship, which turn the owner of an advanced thinking, from a revealer of an assessment of this world, a harbinger of new forms of knowledge.

Accepting a challenge stems from the fact that the reality you perceive as true only lasts as a limit that no one can overcome, one that you can no longer endure, you no longer accept without providing additional capacity to imagine yourself in another less ordinary posture, such as that of a hero with prophetic qualities and supernatural powers.

Leadership: Can you apply a rule such as: "I became part of a world in which the creator and the created are mistaken for one another" around a vision drawn from the effects of a fiction set out to make you feel like more than you are?

To take possession of an acquired good – such as a reasoning situated above the definitions of facts, something that gains meaning only if you can see a different version of reality by accessing a foreign source of orientation, means to relate to a gamer that orders things differently.

The Gamer is your replica. He is your superiority. You are the representative of his individuality in a fabulous décor, highlighting that extra totality missing from the outside world. He is the adventurer who in his roots discovers a different facet of the world, finding his sufficiency in the contact with what you are at a subtler level. He is the friend next to which you want to be, even if you know that it is highly likely for him to disappear at some point. You are a winner or a loser as much as he is willing to coordinate you in the context of this maximum level reached in a game full of challenges.

Superiority, which leadership accepts as a stringent necessity, first targets that transition from player to gamer, breaking any rules and any limits of an individual's composition, so that he can develop that truly exceptional faculty of determining himself in the relationship with the elements of a Created Existence.

The perception of the space in which you project yourself, due to the need of manifesting yourself in relation to a different plane of being, dominating all dimensions of an intrinsic reality, is substituted to a private initiative of supervision and management.

Leadership requires you to always keep in mind that someone is above you, shining through what you experience, but especially through what you chose to believe is happening to you.

Only so can equality between creation and its creator be obtained, between examination and discovery. In this case, we can conclude that leadership is a synergistic act.

Player And Gamer highlights that stability of a whole, that uniqueness of the experience of extending the freedom of manifestation in the framework whose content is at the intersection between creation, interpretation, and coordination.

Playtime

On May 01, 2016

Keep in mind the permission of uniting with something greater than yourself, which can provide you through fine agreements the motivation of preparing yourself for new trends of expression.

I felt that I had become the object of observation of a foreign entity, located thousands of light years away, which always surprised me with something pleasant, like in an endless enlightening dream, acting on my cerebral atmosphere, whispering to me through the combined effect of vibrations and obscure magnetic waves. Somehow, I was assuming a secret no one knew: "For you to become immortal and receive the power of God, becoming my equal, you need to let yourself be tuned with absolute precision."

I had to learn to control the rhythm of this unique collaboration, once I had entrusted myself to a return to right, to a 90-degree transformation, even if curiosity mixed with fear, if the heart accelerating its beats as if after a strong emotion, assiduously pushed me to ask myself unanswerable questions. The obstacle I had to deal with in the pure forms of learning about myself, from the utterance of the un-hidden, was a kind of resemblance between the repetition and accumulation of different determinations, insofar as integrating lifelong learning into adulthood was part of understanding a new depth of usefulness.

I was left with the strange idea that I am followed by the same flux of strict requirements regarding my future ministry to a form of answer inscribed in the sphere of a fantastic experimental, nuanced with magical elements, and at the same time realistic, between the vibrating sounds of an illusion with a happy-ending in the life preceding death, chosen by an incognito director in accordance with the present of a PlayTime.

Leadership: Can the way in which you perceive your limits vis-à-vis the depth of a reality that wants itself to be a truth of your being capture the resemblance between what characterizes you essentially and what surpasses you (but fill you with admiration)?

A new power flowed in me, a feeling of release and unbounded gratitude. I was fiercely enveloped by that feeling of High, caught in a captivating game of lights and shadows, in an allegro pace, faster than allegretto, but slower than presto, embarked on an alert musical journey, of an extraordinary fluency, which urged both to meditation and a good mood, to initiative and dynamism.

From writer Ion Moja I heard a loud and clear "Yes", receiving the most adequate source of inspiration, the most beautiful gift but also the greatest challenge. But the key to the whole situation, through its uniqueness, was eventually found by watchmaker Hans Schultz, working for a while month without pause: during the day inventing bells with musical gifts, and by night putting them to the test every hour at the head of his much too gentle wife, to draw the necessary conclusions regarding the accuracy of both tone and the effect produced on human beings taken by surprise.

Taking someone by surprise is the result of a superior consciousness, which, meanwhile, has become a sort of continuous change of states, on the rhythms of sweet melodious paces, with the help of improvisation additions, for which you try to find a plausible explanation. In this regard, philosophy provides a key to understanding how I perceived my being: "What surpasses a man is the very essence that he fails to escape, because the essence denotes the ability to express himself in a variety of means, but without implying that he is someone else."

Leadership: Can you increase the chances of a certain type of consequence of being someone else, addressing personal development from the perspective of a conscience appreciated through the fine tunes of a dynamic experience?

Your trajectory in the equation of leadership can be represented in contact with a superior consciousness, which facilitates the transition from a highly-transited road to a less traveled one, but more evolved. It is an adequacy of a music to a poetic idea, the beauty of divine utterance, something that inspires you through fine tunes and the effects of listening, related to a beyond from yourself. Any revealer of ideas, any man of creation has discovered that listening is an art in which there is beauty and great understanding.

Maestro Eugen Doga said that: "Music is a universal form of communication. The first thing God has made available was the flue through which he spoke to the world through musical means. The advantage of music is that we need no translation. Especially today when there are so many technical means, we can speak and it can be heard clearly even in space. Music, this spiritual support that penetrates directly into the heart of the listener, is a very powerful advantage of our times."

Leadership is like music, a dynamic experience, which you must first serve and then discover its charm ! It is a power which, in turn, serves you and in which you must recognize yourself.

You can increase the chances of a certain type of consequence over the authenticity of expressing what music is transmitting to you, freeing your creative energies, only if you shape your contribution to personal development from the perspective of a superior consciousness.

The superior consciousness, which is considered unreachable and unknowable, transmits a certain mood in the scene called the world, in a song called life. It represents that voice of reason that, by constantly assessing you, forced to consume your freedom, maximizes your chances of discovery yourself in the image of uniting with The Great Everything.

One of the superior needs of man is that of belonging to The Great Everything, along with intuition – trust in what you feel ! , representing a value through the fact that you allow to be corrected, guided, tuned with absolute precision, 100% customized and adapted to the evolution requiring dynamism and action, meditation and a good mood.

Leadership is considering, first of all, the agreement of uniting with something greater than yourself, in the absence of any theories, laws, superstitions, which can supply you through fine agreements with an objective stimulus, that motivation of preparing you for new trends of expression, through a different approach of music and the act of creation. Music is what you feel within, what raises you, creates you better, when you engage in traversing new experiences of knowledge.

Someone very well said: "music is a service to the people, a way for them to better know God, opening their souls through harmonies."

In philosophy, the ability to identify with someone else has as its core correspondent the most profound confrontation of the human being with the entire evolution of the universe that pertains to how you recognize a higher being by integrating yourself into the lyrics and chords of a music that makes you entertain.

PlayTime is the beginning of a self-discovery through a different perspective, due to the regularity and rhythmicity of a cosmic pendulum describing a route between two ends, forming a balance. The ability to hear the Voice of God and running towards it on the rhythms of a music experienced only through yourself, by connecting the world of creation with the real one. And the ability of reacting through isolation and detachment from any other background noise.

Pleading For A Saint

On January 11, 2012

Prove your moral superiority in those extreme situations, in which you cannot highlight your emotional qualities.

Almost no one escaped. The whole village was decimated. There were no words to express the horror and revolt from the soul of the eight members of the commando's team led by the Lieutenant Waters. The rebels had executed in cold blood almost all the locals.

Ellis 'Zee' Pettigrew, one of the team members, had met the eyes of a woman who had just been violated and mutilated. This one shook slowly her head, trying to chant something, and he felt as that terrible feeling of fear enters him. He kept the woman's looking for a few moments, but afterwards, it was his turn to look elsewhere. He did not want to deal with that mixture of pain that he read in her eyes, for he knew what it transmitted to him: death.

He was disturbed, and even a bit disgusted by the obvious coldness and indifference of her murderer. Another team member had immobilized this rebel who had almost killed her with a bestial brutality.

- You bastard ! Look what you did, miserable ! grasping his neck with both hands, and leaning his head to the woman's body.

Mercy, compassion, generosity - the specific virtues of a human could not fulfill the mission at that moment. Feeling overwhelmed by a terrible hatred - for reasons that became very clear, Zee took his hunting knife from the belt. He should not have to understand, but to act. His jowl was clenched around an impenetrable decision. The anger against this murderer, this "animal" could not be stifled by anything. He forced the knife deep inside the belly of the one; turning it slowly, moving round it down, then up, for its tip to pierce his stomach and intestines.

Leadership: Are you struggling with the tendency to give up positive feelings in an "the ends justify the means" context that lasts indefinitely?

A "generous" gesture: killing without mercy a murderer, an evil character. However, this gesture, a conscious and deliberated restraint of the desire for revenge that Zee had felt, has produced a transformation in his soul. This cruel gesture has troubled all his inner. For a moment, he lost all that was greatest, generous, and humanitarian in him. He lost the strength to be human, by removing himself from faith, through the supreme violation of the law: do not murder.

A piece of him - that piece, which claimed his moral strength, which filled his soul with life that kept integral his own emotional nature - died along with the one that he had killed.

Positive feelings are a return to the beginnings of your ethical development, because you once again become flexible in thinking and feeling, concerned with taking heed of the touch of the painful weapon called "life lesson", whose strength you had known a bit earlier, preparing at the same time to follow the fight against the thirst for glory.

If at some point you are confronted with a negative image, completely different from what you expected to see, then you must know that the way in which you use your predominant traits (compassion, forgiveness, the degree of self-control or sense of justice) reflects the spiritual gift you were endowed with: sensitivity and empathy.

As a leader, are you always applying the law, or you create your own law?

Each person has a moral duty that influences his existence and horizons. You cannot wash your hands like Pilate did with the blood of those killed, and the crime to remain unpunished. It remains a trace in your heart, a reminiscence of the past; you remain with the conscience loaded with condemnable crimes, blocking you to morally advance to what it is right.

Even so, who judged the guilty one? Who condemned him to death? Have been heard the depositions of the witnesses? Who were the jurors? Were they all agreed on the final verdict? And, finally, where were the judges that had to ensure the uniformity of interpretation and unitary application of the law through the prism of the human rights norms?

Ellis 'Zee' Pettigrew from the movie "Tears of the Sun (2003)" was the only judge, the only juror, he created the law, represented, and he had also applied it. The law of moral revenge.

Punishing the criminals it is the moral in a particular measure - but that does not turn you into a saint.

Leadership: Do you choose the guilt of not doing the right thing when "you must" can follow you all your life in the attempt of opposing the current?

You have no way to shine of glory; you have no way to raise your leadership on high pedestals when remorse produces in you a serious storm. For, you remain the slave of some narrow principles that have nothing in common with humanity and morality. You have to free yourself from any kind of guilt when it appears the first cloud, which darkens your conscience. Or, to find a good reason that would support your power and your moral value. You must fight against your own moral decay by all means.

Convictions and positive feelings are needed where many forget about them, or where they simply ignore them. In this case they are stuck without solution in the act of law, depreciating the conscience that defines their identity.

However, at immoral times, the probability that your judgment would remain properly fixed of those beliefs that are supporting the essence of your life will turn more and more towards zero.

In leadership, you must be strong and to defeat your own "death". You will be taken by surprise, you will be about to crack when you least expect it. For, sometimes you will be hit by the tendency to give up all your positive emotions, to replace them with the other negative ones. That it would lead to a cancellation of your personality, depriving yourself from all that is vital: love and faith in your neighbor, in relation to God, towards your own nature.

Before disapproving your own moral conduct (which consists of a complex and well-determined mixture between judgment and convictions) make an effort to be as objective as possible in evaluating your own moral development.

The revenge that saves you is a form of domination of that suffering that pushes you to overcome the measure of consciousness.

Pleading For A Saint designates that relentless effort to highlight your emotional qualities in difficult times - when you deviate from any ethical or moral principle, or as when you disconnect yourself from any emotional connection with the world around you.

All your deeds will be presented before a court - consciousness. In order to be declared "not guilty" and to heal your heart by any remorse and regrets, you will need to demonstrate the superiority of your consciousness in those extreme situations, in which you have not been able to highlight your emotional qualities.

Conclusion: Certainly, no one is a saint. No one is an impeccable being from ethical or moral point of view. However, you must conform yourself to a permanent process of self-education of your will, for not acting arbitrarily, or under the impulse of the moment. Furthermore, in any situation, no matter how much you are impressed by the reprehensible acts, you must prove moral probity.

Never forget that you are not a saint, and you will never be, and do not ever imagine that you are perfect, because God did not create duplicates.

Please Represent Me In A Way That Is Easy For The Eye To Understand

On April 29, 2023

A seemingly simple act of observation can become, through intensity and dedication, a true work of living art, capable of influencing the perception and emotions of those around.

Iasi, the beating heart of Romania, was the theater of a running competition last week. On July 07, 2024, in the middle of a view capable of realizing a join between the artistic image and the competitive spirit, the real champion was already proclaimed: my sister, Oana Fântânaru.

In art, it is not the medal that makes you a champion, but the running style you adopt in terms of expressiveness, grace and elegance of movement. In her case, it was not a matter of physical superiority, but rather a matter of impeccable technical mastery, a kind of Ethuraank Amophiseness Eknaenger , an opening to the artistic universe, a place where every step becomes an aesthetic movement unfolding in a ballet of refinement. Running pursues the non-verbal expression of elegance, emotions and why not, human thoughts and turmoil through body language.

The passion with which a person engages in an activity can transcend the immediate goal, becoming a true expression of their identity and resilience. Gracefully, through a kind of fluid movement, Oana ran with the leaping steps of a feline, with an ardor that transcended the simplistic framework of the sports competition, manifesting itself as a pure expression of the plasticity of movement, a true show of passion and tenacity from a deep respect for the aesthetics that makes an artist shine.

Leadership: Can your efforts to express your inner vision become a manifestation of the individuality of a memorable event, thanks to the power of art to communicate deeply human states?

My eyes followed the one artistic model that conquered every gaze. My thoughts flew to that unique thrill, that ecstasy of the creator who, in a fit of genius, gives birth and form to his inner vision. With every hurried step, with every breath of air caught between her lips, Oana painted her own epic of determination, of the courage to transcend physical limitations in exchange for an aesthetic vision enjoyed by artists.

Her art, deeply subjective and personal, an expression of the free spirit, springs from the depths of the being unfettered by rules or external expectations, embodying the essence of creative freedom. In running, aesthetics is not just a simple visual preference, but rather a manifestation of the discipline and harmony of the body in motion. It is certain that Oana was not running for laurels or for the gold medal. Her goal was to celebrate the power of beauty, to decipher and interpret as an artist motor coordination brought to the stage of exceptional skill.

No other runner has achieved the feat of embodying a work of art. The uniqueness of her running style complements the artist's talent for painting, being a vibrant expression of the harmony between movement and expression, each element accentuating the beauty of the other.

Leadership: Can the message of an artistic experience transform your perception of the limits of reality, thus offering a new vision of ineffable experiences?

We observed the spontaneous expressiveness of her emotional states, rarely seen, discreet, reflected in the refined and graceful movements of the body. With great joy, in the mysterious agreement between sight and vision, I understood that abandonment does not find a place in her soul. Certainly, Oana is a force of nature, an eternal tumult that defies any obstacle, following the natural path that arises from the perfect knowledge of the contours of the body seen from all its angles. Her mission in this competition was to reveal to the whole world the ineffable beauty, to give a voice to the cryptic message of an artistic experience based on knowing the outline of the figure, above any limitations imposed by reality.

The idea I am heading towards was expressed more easily by a character of Erich Maria Remarque, from the novel "The Arc of Triumph":

"It's easy to shake your head and say you have to keep your sensibility despite the endless variations of an ever-changing world. But damn, it's not that easy. Because sensibility is born out of struggle, at just as beauty is born from humility. Added to this is the unconfessed fear that when the time comes, you will look broken, too red, too tired to walk with the others. Isn't this the reason why you sink into oblivion anything that can get on your nerves, abolishing it, definitively and unconsciously, with irony, sarcasm and even counter-sentimentality, with the escape into another human being, as an alternative to another self?"

Leadership: Is it possible to see in art a way to escape into another "I", using the temporary refuge as a means to explore and share unseen aspects of one's identity?

When I was observing Oana, I was actually seeing myself. My escape into an alternative "me" served as a form of detachment necessary to manage intense emotions. Therefore, transitioning to an alternate identity can provide a temporary refuge from overwhelming emotions. Through a process of otherness, I managed to understand my sister's artistic personality better than anyone, because we both have one thing in common: the intense passion for art.

The master of the beautiful soul is the mirror of the harmonious body. Therefore, art can be a way to explore alternative identities, allowing the artist to experience and express emotions through the lens of other beings, if it resonates deeply with the perspective adopted.

Through her art, through her running style, Oana offered everyone a lesson in building a model of expressing sensitivity, making up the perfect harmony through the simultaneous interweaving of well-matched parts, forced to merge into a single accord or in more many. He invited us to witness the triumph of art, the victory of the human spirit over unpolished limitations. Sure, her running model represented a statement of faith painted in sweat and passion, the aesthetic way of being artistic, which was written directly on the streets and in the images of the city of Ia?i.

The key quality of leadership is expressed in the following statement: "the perspective must match the eye of the beholder."

Please represent me in a way that is easy for the eye to understand, so that every time you think of me as the hero of a great event, you feel a twinge of admiration. Art encourages escape into another "I", facilitating a deeper understanding and expression of various emotional states.

Poor Leadership Quality

Look beyond success to discover the path to inner balance.

Hernan Cortes remained governor of the land he had named New Spain, waiting for the king to elevate him to viceroyalty. He became extremely rich after the conquest of Mexico. The crown gave him gold and silver mines, cotton and sugar plantations, mills and land. He built a castle with towers at Cuernavaca and received the title of marquis. He liked to be called Don Hernando. His fame secured his marriage to Juana de Zuniga, a relative of the Duke of Bejar, one of the most influential people in Spain.

However, the scandals of the past marked the rest of his career. Full of restlessness, he devoted his whole life to the search for another Mexico and another Motecuhzoma. He squandered his wife's dowry in a useless exploration of the legendary Amazon. He spent his last years in Spain trying to solicit an audience with the king. He became a ridiculous and annoying old man, pulling on the sleeves of minor officials, complaining about the real or imaginary injustices that had been done to him.

Finally, after realizing that he would not receive the royal blessing, he decided to return to his beloved Mexico. He fell ill a few days before he set out on his journey, and died, alone and unhappy, at the age of sixty-two. Today, in Mexico, there is no statue of Cortes, no monument, no tomb. The curse of his first wife, Malinali Tenepal, followed him and his son beyond the grave: "I curse you Cortes, you, our child and Mexico."

Leadership: Do you control your tendency to attach value to deeds meant to remain in the depths of the world's memory, but which can be incriminated if they fall under the obligation to be a legal link with the course of the world?

The world will not stand still just because you have conquered a territory, or because you intend to conquer other territories. What matters is not the territory conquered, but rather what is happening in that territory. What attracts the world to a territory? Does it suggest a new approach to the course of the world, apart from a late expansion of an empire? Is territory an unfinished action that raises questions about the meanings of your behavior? Can the territory be transformed into a socio-economic whole, or into a continuous war?

Moreover, how can the individual transform his territory into a place of collective emancipation?

Hernan Cortes wanted to conquer new territories in an effort to assert his dominant personality, the spirit of leadership (of being invincible). But he did not have the vision to assert, to protect, to revitalize the cultural values of the society in which he lived. He saw the territory of Mexico as a piece of land from which wealth can be extracted, without taking into account the fact that the true wealth of a people lies in its values: equality for all, justice for all, freedom for all, raising life to the height of an ideal.

If the soul of a great man is the soul analysis of a people at some point, then Cortez lacked greatness because he failed to unite the glorious deed with the wise side of the self. In fact, Cortez was so conquered by glory and fame that he did not feel it fall into that self-forgetfulness, and the ethical form of regret manifested itself too late, more precisely when events began to set, when already he could no longer get out of that warm, final forgetfulness.

The leader's obligation to be a direct link with the course of the world is evidenced by the tense lucidity of the self to admit the imperfection of its being, being willing to take responsibility if not projected in time in the souls of those around him.

Poor Leadership Quality is seen in the way a man judges his self when glorious deeds outweigh his chances of being fit for that position, in terms of the relationships with the general conscience of the other people around him.

When man evaluates his chances of remaining at the forefront of people, he relates his personality to the general position of people towards the success of a goal that must not exceed the consciousness of national identity, the consciousness of belonging to a homogeneous cultural community.

Pray, Believe, Enter Into Eternal Life !

On February 24, 2014

Create for yourself a clear conscience of the self and of becoming, building your reality on the concepts of meaning and value of existence.

The man was on the point of dying in despair. Death was an abyss to him. As he stood trembling on its mournful brink, he recoiled with horror. He was not sufficiently ignorant to be absolutely indifferent. His condemnation, which had been a profound shock, had, in a manner, broken through, here and there, that wall which separates us from the mystery of things, and which we call life. He gazed incessantly beyond this world through these fatal breaches, and beheld only darkness. The Bishop made him see light.

He passed the entire day with him, forgetful of food and sleep, praying to God for the soul of the condemned man, and praying the condemned man for his own. He told him the best truths, which are also the most simple. He was father, brother, friend; he was bishop only to bless. He taught him everything, encouraged and consoled him.

On the following day, when they came to fetch the unhappy wretch, the Bishop was still there. He followed him. He mounted the tumbril with him, he mounted the scaffold with him. The sufferer, who had been so gloomy and cast down on the preceding day, was radiant. He felt that his soul was reconciled, and he hoped in God. The Bishop embraced him, and at the moment when the knife was about to fall, he said to him:

'God raises from the dead him whom man slays; he whom his brothers have rejected finds his Father once more. Pray, believe, enter into eternal life: the Father is there.' *

Leadership: Do you manifest a certain discretion in interpreting human value when it's destabilized, on the background of a maximum tolerance to those who fell in the dark of ignorance of God?

When we relate to faith, then the intellect and reason are simply dethroned when faced with the combinations provided by sensations and intense experiences. Man no longer defines himself through the prism of worldly conception, the state of humility being categorically considered a state of degradation, belittlement, and alteration of human dignity. Instinctively, you wonder what is happening in the mind of a tormented consciousness, and realize with astonishment that he is no longer a convinced follower of discovering the wonders of the world, but that he is a slave to a life devoid of meaning, discipline, perspective, faith.

A reality which maybe I never carefully followed, vibrating in front of the whole human existence, contrary to the formal schemes of approaching its elements, is the discretion which always accompanies souls – the tormented and sensitive ones who need attention and the strong ones who know how to cast away the fears and sufferings of those around.

The discretion gives a certain emotional state. We're talking about the discretion in showing your feelings in front of others, only in intimacy. The discretion to interpret human value when it destabilizes or shrinks, which doesn't take away the power of reason. The discretion to force you opinion, to support it in front of those who compromised their honor, integrity and credibility. The discretion to be a poet of the resurrection of the spirit and to live the mood of others' "poetry", putting yourself in their shoes. A subtlety in trying to understand the deep feelings of the human being, especially the dark sides. Not an emotional manipulation.

Love of one's neighbor is not only visible from what you give, but from how you give it, just as faith is not only deduced from the presence of God in the details of life, but also from repentance, from prayer, from preaching, from the heart's deeds.

Leadership who must be applied in all areas of life derives from the complexity of the moods that the human being thirsty for feelings and expressing itself goes through, but also from the hypotheses it assumes by virtue of, or to the detriment of its qualities. The man who embraces leadership must not be seen as a humble servant of God, nor as a confessor of faith in times of difficulty, but as a man whose word is calm and sincere, and who pleases you with what his soul receives only from a spiritual world when the story of this life is coming to an end.

Leadership: Is your personality focused on that consciousness of a detached witness that gradually reveals the existence of a profound reality from which you can see the evidence of an Eternal Presence?

Do you take into consideration the "consciousness" factor in the exercise of influence, adjacent to the sense of resignation? When you want to influence through spirituality, you must first insinuate man's nakedness, feel the bitter taste of life in an attempt for you yourself to remain unchanged by his suffering. It is not enough to pray to God and show His love for forgiveness of sins, but you have to consider the lasting character of the change you impose.

All these make the mission you need to fulfill, considering it the highest among all the ways of exerting leadership, focusing on man's content, and have deep valences. It is that mission to direct you on the unmarked trails on the surface of the swamp called "suffering", in relation to your thinking and man's senses, taking into consideration the factor "conscience" in the process of exerting influence.

The possibility to reach into man's sensitive soul with the forces of rational thinking and feelings, more or less decisively for the way in which you shape your conception about world and life, absolutely necessary in the process of self-knowledge and development, opens, for leadership, new perspectives of understanding and approaching reality. This reality, based on the concepts of meaning and value of existence, can be used for creating a clear conscience of self and for trying to answer the question: "Who and what am I?"

Reflecting some strong feelings inside human nature, in all their graduality, but especially the warmth you communicate to the soul of those you support, is bestowed with an outline of luminosity, much more significant if you follow the way in which man evolves.

The living comfort of spirituality is felt by the intensification and assumption of an Eternal Presence when the story of life derives from a sense of resignation.

Pray, Believe, Enter Into Eternal Life ! is a call for finding the reason of repentance as radical change of the way of living and thinking. Even as pray of the most restless spiritual tension, don't forget you owe it to yourself to elevate your conscience to a level of awareness that allows you to see yourself as you really are, in the eyes of those who support you and have access to your inner power.

Preservation Of Culture

Set up your own creative space that meets concrete existential requirements by distinguishing between "interior" and "exterior".

At the same time, the work for the film "Ivan" continues. In these monstrous days of war, director Sergei Eisenstein feels compelled to defend culture in parallel with the armed struggle against fascism. He is grieved by every new barbarism: the destruction of the incomparable medieval frescoes of Pskov and Novgorod, of the 18th century palaces and fountains of Leningrad, of the cathedrals near Moscow, of the Dnieper hydropower plant... He is terribly hurt by the sacrifice of human lives lost in the face of the German plague.

But at the same time, he thinks from the beginning of the days after the war, of the future of culture and art, which he is also called to provide by making any sacrifice to hasten his coming. The people of his nation are ready armed to the teeth with the experience of the past, and the torches in their hands, in the hands of those who wait for the light, must be clean and prepared for that moment when their art will begin to express the new word of life.

*However, his main task is to defend, preserve the culture. In August he completed his study of El Greco, wrote an English version of the study of Griffith and the history of montage in the various arts, and prepared an overview of the foreground idea throughout the history of the arts. **

Leadership: Did you intend to take an overview of the primary idea throughout the construction of an artistic image, as a way of dealing with the world by defining it in detail?

Whoever feels indebted to the whole world for defending culture, science or morality must prepare for that moment when his art will have to express the new word of life, that is, the renewal of the spirit of creativity that bears fruit in the direction of a visual essentialism and the intensification of a certain abstract qualities of the avant-garde of the present century. At the same time, we must understand that an indispensable side of human evolution is closely linked to a system of creations that meet concrete existential requirements.

The pleasure of the act of creation, being a better way of self-expression, but especially the complex act of self-examination by providing new points of view to the artistic craft, to the artistic current, to the artistic message, bring the practice of freedom of expression in the direction of a visual essentialism and the intensification of a certain abstract quality of art and its space of manifestation.

As for the work of creation, the "exterior" is what reflects reality, without distorting it, and the "interior" is what you experience in your reality through different artistic perspectives.

One can imagine man's affinity with the field of art only through the preservation of culture, that is, the action that the creative man performs towards progress, towards the sum of spiritual activities, towards human nature, towards the future of human thought.

And given that the objective world has an empirical aspect, it is important to evaluate as many creative ways as possible that work as a form of practical verification of a visual image, so that you have a comprehensive overview of life, before focusing on the idea of "the foreground of a realism that transcends the immediate" (and that can acquire allegorical valences).

Wikipedia tells the definition of culture very well: "Culture is a legacy that is transmitted through specific communication codes – such as gestures or words, writing and the arts, media (press, radio, television), interactive media (the telephone). Gestures, rituals, theoretical knowledge, abstract norms, religion are all transmitted in the same way. Culture can be acquired through various forms of subjective memory (reflexes, words, images) but also through objective memory (objects, landscapes, books, numbers, rules)."

Facing the world by defining it in detail means going to the heart of things and the connections between them, using the combination of your knowledge, beliefs, feelings and experiences to give life to an image that captures the meeting point between natural and ideal.

The Preservation Of Culture responds to the existence of useful and indispensable creations for technological and social progress, configured in value through the transition from reality to vision, from imagination to truthful image, from necessity to modernity.

Priests Are Obsolete, Science Is The New Religion

New perspectives on life and the afterlife can only be conceived from the meeting of science and spirituality, not from the isolation of one from the other.

As I said before, in Giza there are three pyramids of the kings, including the Great Pyramid , and all three have small passages and empty rooms. Khafre's pyramid still had its top covered by the layer of limestone that had once provided the three structures with a perfectly smooth white surface and he licked it . They knew , probably, that we have salt prisms! Using the measuring instruments , I calculated that the Great Pyramid , when it reached a precise point, had a height of one hundred and forty- six meters , or more than thirty meters than the pointed tower of Amiens cathedral , the tallest in France . The Egyptians used only 203 rows of masonry to achieve this amazing height ime. The inclination of its side was fifty - one degrees , as much as was necessary to make its height and one - half its circumference equal to T , as well as the Fibonacci sequence described by Jomard .

Despite this strange coincidence, the purpose of the pyramids still eludes me . As works of art , they were sublime. In terms of utility , they seem meaningless . In front of me were buildings so smooth when they were built that no one could stand on them, with corridors difficult for people to walk through , leading to rooms that they wish they had never been used , and mathematics code that seemed hidden to everyone except a specialist .

Monge said the whole thing probably had something to do with religion.

Leadership: Does the shift from a belief based on place and time to universal scientific laws show your progress towards an objective understanding of the world?

- Five thousand years from now, will people understand the reason behind the construction of the Notre-Dame cathedral?

- Be careful that the priests do not find out that you said this.

- Priests are obsolete, science is the new religion. For the ancient Egyptians, religion was their science and magic an attempt to control what could not be understood. Mankind has progressed from a past in which each tribe and nation had its own set of gods to one in which many nations worshiped a single god. However, there are many faiths, each of which considers the other to be heretical. Now science is no longer based on faith, but on reason and experiment, and it is no longer centered on a nation, a pope or a king, but on universal law. It doesn't matter if you are Chinese or German, if you speak Arabic or Spanish: science is one. That is why he will triumph and that is why the Church instinctively feared Galileo. But this structure behind us was built by a special people with special beliefs, and we may never discover their reasoning because it is based on religious mysticism that we cannot understand. Deciphering the hieroglyphs could help us.

Leadership: Does your science provide a common language to understand nature, beyond beliefs and ideologies, guiding you in your search for universal truth?

In the context of scientific advancement, the boundaries between old and new become increasingly transparent, and the exchange of ideas between old beliefs and new theories facilitates the emergence of a universal consciousness that embraces the recreation of the world in harmony with the universe itself. In an interconnected world, governed by reason and experiment, beliefs and ways of thinking are rewritten under the influence of universal principles, based on cause and effect, which promote equality between people as the essence of a synergistic life, such as accepting diversity, promoting tolerance and the formation of mutual respect, regardless of their national or linguistic origin.

I believe that this process can lead to the dilution of religious mysticism and the formation of a global perspective based on science, where creation becomes the main point of reference, but also to the recognition and valorization of social diversity, differences and individual skills.

Leadership: Are you exploring the possibility of a vision where the visual perception of religious symbols intertwines with scientific aspects, in a dialogue that transcends simple observation?

I could not disagree with this prediction -- I was , after all, a Franklin man -- and yet I had to I wonder why science , if it was universal , had not already swept everything before it . Why were people still religious ? Science was ingenious but cold , explanatory and , with all that, it does not give away answers to the biggest questions .

She answered the " how " but not the " why " and thus made people miss her . I suspected that the people of the future will really understand Notre - Dame, just as we now understand a Roman temple. And he revered and feared , probably in the same way . I told myself that the revolutionaries , in their rationalistic fervor , were losing sight of something, and what was missing was the heart or the soul . Did he have knowledge and place for something , or hope for the afterlife ?

Leadership: From the perspective of a visual and spatial understanding, what do you think the interaction between scientific rationalism and religious emotional experiences will look like in an age where balance is essential to receiving a big picture?

We thus understand that if for our contemporaries science and technology are to be agents of progress, they are called to restore in their quality of "progress" the harmonious functioning of a universe in which the hope and understanding of the human soul are not affected by existential dilemmas. Their role becomes that of inculcating the principle of universality into society and bringing the confused spirit of the fervent back to the middle path. However, the necessary condition for an effective relationship in the future, between science and the universe, is to first observe a fundamental similarity between what science can explain and what religious people receive as consolation.

Within this common similitude, the driving force necessary for change comes from the tension between the opposing principles of reason and worship, one of which operates and the other undergoes transformation. Further, the favorable condition for innovative activity, related to the expansion of knowledge of the world in the universe, is not the simple repetition of the known, but the mutual adaptation of old beliefs with new discoveries. New perspectives on life and the afterlife can only be conceived from the meeting of science and spirituality, not from the isolation of one from the other.

The scientist answers the 'how', but the spiritual search for the 'why' continues to fuel the human spirit."

Priests are obsolete, science is the new religion. Reflecting on the visibility and importance of the creations of the new world, science will have to embrace a spiritual dimension that also responds to the needs of the soul. Convinced that the future may bring a reconciliation, do you imagine how the symmetry between science and faith could achieve a harmony through stylistic cursive, where each explains the world in its own unique way?

The Journey to Eternity is an expression of human aspirations to transcend the limits of time and space, combining art, mathematics and spirituality.

Primus Inter Pares

On March 20, 2016

Maintain the production conditions of a referential thinking, touching up the ability of turning creative work into a commitment of strengthening the experience of learning high culture.

Eisenstein forbade his students to stop him in the hallway with questions asked privately: "I will solve all problems with the participation of everyone". His lessons were heated discussions, he would launch questions, the students all responded, discussed, disputed for different solutions, until the professor concluded. The noise of the discussion would then die out. The students had done another step towards thinking creatively.

In his programmatic statement, Eisenstein said clearly: The professor is no more than the primus inter pares – first among equals. The collective, and later on each of its individual members make their own way through the difficulties and torments of creative work, through the entire process of the creative formation, from the first slight glimmer of the theme, up to the decision if the buttons on the leather jacket of that last extra are fitting for the purposes of filming.

He demanded a full explanation in the thinking of his students:"Do not say "I think that". Until you don't know, I don't even want to hear it." He asked that all students become, above all, men of culture. To think with their own mind. His lessons were fascinating.

Leadership: Do you opt for the uninterrupted line of a solicitude achieved in a context of the type "Do not say you believe, first show that you know"?

The conditions for producing a referential thinking, touching up on the ability of turning creative work into a long-term moral duty, in a commitment of strengthening the experience of learning high culture, also refers to the differentiation of active and practical means, produced through a certain type of reaction. It is that reaction to the fascination a powerful psychological impact exerts that creates a context of the type "Do not say you believe, first show that you know."

The most prominent culture is the result of creative work, a habit of the mind to make its own way through the hardships and pains of an artful life full of change and pain, is a "think for yourself before consulting others" exposed to an impact assessment accompanying any measurement of performance.

Leadership is the interest you get from other people to achieve well-integrated performances in a vision (aesthetic) and in a gratitude towards the care that you manage to suggest a new style of approach to cultural ideals through the integration of individual knowledge in activities of creation. Leadership processes the aspiration of the initiated in a field towards the union with a scholarly form of knowledge, towards obtaining an expansion of the mechanisms of producing art and culture.

The most requested artist is a lesson of opening up to everything new to the cultural level by attracting as much as possible the interest of other art practitioners towards developing models for modernizing the style of designing a "Complete Work".

The first step taken in learning to think creatively, due to the ability of influx of information in consciousness, in spirit, but especially in the appraising mentality, by extending the tendency towards the union between idea and stylistic ideal, is usually also associated with the ambition to complete a common project, a customized concept or a process that empowers you.

This step is always situated on the prominent regions of the sphere of identity, especially that part of you that reminds you that you are important when you think primordially with your own mind, and what you do matters to you first and foremost. Men of culture think with their own mind. A total work is a product of one's own mind, of free minds, not a puppet of the minds of others.

And the second characteristic of this first, but important step, is that, in contrast to the impression the experience of thinking on your own leaves between aspiration and motivation, remains appreciable that artistic side of you that determines you to see things from the perspective of relating to an absolute model of logic and resourcefulness.

Any measure of performance should highlight the search for the landmarks of sustainability in the originality of the act of creation and the satisfaction of building an educational atmosphere of culture in the spirit of deep artistic communion.

Primus Inter Pares is the man who solves problems with the participation of everyone, but having better points of view than others and a much broader culture.

In leadership, the hardships and the torments of creative work are characterized by the accessibility of producing the consideration that you must be "the first among equals". From here deducing that there needs to be a certain continuity in the assimilation of this knowledge that conditions your ability to understand and correctly use the information you receive from others and amplify from yourself.

Prisoner In One's Own Creation

On November 17, 2020

The holy word is a thoughtful and controlled artistic act through which the approach to the presence of the Supreme Creator is achieved, directly or indirectly.

I asked the pen to write about me so that I could know myself better by knowing my limits, knowing that only in this way would the world of creation develop a spherical motion on the coordinates of an ontology of cosmic consciousness. In fact, it will be easier for creation to develop its objectivity, awareness of real limits, knowing that the pen is the world of a universal consciousness in rectilinear motion, especially if it writes in the sphere of a theoretical philosophy about the ontological coordinates of an authentic being.

The pen is powerful when it governs matter and leads it, through sanctification and enlightenment, in the direction of an image of the heavens detached from the interpretations of the experience of receiving the creations afferent to a timeless universe. And if the planets come under the domination of Saturn or Neptune, equally when they represent the figure of a being who seems to be waiting for the face of fate, it means that the pen will have a more important word to say about me.

These considerations must also be taken into account for the existence of a brush that connects things to the fixed stars, establishing the correspondence between the image of a saint and the nature of the 8 planets. If this sensitive instrument makes everything so beautiful on the easel canvas, with the experimental character of an attempt to probe the inside of the "science about being", it does so to attenuate the rivalry with the pen. The nature of the one who will be the strongest of them will gain the greatest significance in all the events of my life.

I say this because if I correlated writing with one of the fixed stars, corresponding to my nature, then the brush will be inscribed, like a true princess Andromeda, in the symbol of an energetic being who seeks its highest order in a mystical journey through time and parallel spaces.

Leadership: Can you elaborate a clear-artistic vision which should be based on the echoes left of an image that you cannot forget, even if you only see it once?

Therefore, I know myself better because the pen has been given the task of ruling in heaven, above all astral bodies, but especially because it is the master of all my virtues. I know myself better because the brush, belonging to the Celestial Light, spreads its colored rays over the planets of my infinite identity, lending me thousands of appearances according to the reality in which reason, intelligence and the infinite consciousness of the universe are mirrored.

And if my words represent natural elements that an alchemist selects to elaborate the entire content of the Great Work, knowing that parts of the world are attracted to each other by a resemblance to the soul of nature, then I need only utter an invocation of the earth to heaven as to be able to explain the true meaning of the world from the divine point of view. For now, the work is unfinished, but certainly when it is ready, it will be the most famous in the cultural-artistic field.

For, yes, my pen acts through the natural power given by the subtleties and motivations of writing included in the study of spiritual life, as a solvent of the consciousness of belonging to an Undivided Whole, just as the alchemist acts upon "Primordial Matter" in order to distinguish the soul from the body the essential of the non-essential, between "the work itself" and the "abstract phenomenon".

If you look closely, the pen's vision of things and of myself is a depiction of an extraordinary, precious, and rare moment when I make an astral projection of myself into another world to make the connection between the sacred and the poetic, between spirit and body.

Leadership: Can you load the image of a new dimension of your personality with details that maximize the effect of recognizing a new perspective of receiving reality constituted through the holy word?

Here, in this way, the natural elements can be attracted, as a prophetic call translated in the infinite prism of the saints, therefore of the consecrated artists: by the union between things, thoughts and phenomena, we are all touched by them at the level of knowledge through revelation. Or, the echo of the image that I can't forget, because it puts me at the center of an ancient artistic them: "The hand that moves the Stars", meets the obligatory condition of a spirit enlightened by sparkles of genius that has dedicated its entire existence to the universe called "Myself".

But the same elements can be rejected by the character of a guide of the crude gaze towards the least environmentally friendly part, towards the least visible part of the qualitative material, related to a substantial change of the distinct "voices in matter", difficult to transpose in a universal language. Or whose preliminary meanings have disappeared through disuse, maintenance, or neglect.

You have understood. The holy word is a thoughtful and controlled artistic act through which the approach to the presence of the Supreme Creator is achieved, directly or indirectly.

And it is not only the pen that connects the art of alchemy, the sky to the earth, the soul to matter. And the painter's brush can cast spells and charms, by calling the sun, the moon, the stars, the elements of nature to help hit in what it wants to accomplish, expressing itself through a magical language that gives life to a mutual dialogue between the visual image, the verbal or nonverbal part of things, and the leap into immediate reflection on every detail of the reduction to the essential. That is, reducing a color image to shades of a single color.

The key image of the artistic dimension of my personality can be identified with another version of Myself, the one I will be at another age, when the Creator of the Universe will call me to be one with Him.

My feelings and thoughts are not lost in the mists of time, but are translated morphologically into a completely different form, just as a painter's weapon always remains the color, especially if I consider a certain degree of comparison with what is called the "image-word".

Clearly, tenderly, without pretensions of exclusivity, I hope that my approach to art will be the visible and physical support of a memory that brings to all the common memory of a world once existing, but not in the field of a discussion about the meaning of the word "composition". I'm still looking for my inner meaning...

Prisoner In One's Own Creation is the attentive and meticulous artist, inclined to use the pen and the brush in order to produce a release from the handcuffs of thoughts that absorb the existence of a superior determination explained in terms of "similarity taken to a higher level".

Yes, I would like to be the Creator of the Universe, maybe I am, but I'm not sure I can stand the lucidity alone, the judgment I have submitted to.

Prisoner In The Desert Of Science

On November 11, 2013

Look to comprise the universe of science without expanding your human exploration perimeter beyond the inadmissible borderline.

The precision of the measurement of a perimeter depends on the methods and instruments used, which are chosen based on the desired precision and the time associated with it. But when it comes to man, it's hard to estimate, exploit and understand the "field"; it's a challenge for anyone who plunges into the lands of science, the measurement of character's angles is also needed because they modify throughout the stages of life.

Science is the impact of technology on life, reality and power. Thus, the researcher can use in order to support his experiments one of the following methods. The determinist method, which has a negative impact over functional status. Or the deep method which sensitizes up to the borderline or even beyond it, increasing the conscience's pulsation.

Doctor Frederick Chilton picks the middle way: conditioning the main study subject by isolating him of any contact with the exterior world. A subtle terror which bypasses the Chinese drop through its simplicity, causing that inner necessity to communicate every thought or feeling. Loneliness produces supreme suffering. And it is filled only through dialogue.

The greatest temptation of a scientist is to be considered a miracle of nature through his very own experience of intervening in the natural course of the world, fort this being capable of giving up anything or any being that is of no use to him.

Doctor Chilton wants to make new discoveries, to bring new details about the complexity of the human factor. Under the control of his immense passion to research the man's hidden corners, he submits Hannibal Lecter to the repeated attempt to outdo himself in a very narrow frame. He wants, maybe, to recreate human nature based on the spectacular result of measuring a non-determinist system. And emit new theories. But in order to bring to light scientific treasures, Chilton has to completely dedicate himself to his crazy temptation of destabilizing the primary structure of his patient.

As the great erudite Richard Bentley wanted to use "Principia" in order to prove divine intervention in the course of things, Dr. Chilton wants to use the knowledge he acquired from observing Hannibal Lecter in order to prove a new dimension of human nature, subject to the balance disruption between reason and emotion. Then, he is left only with getting rid of his "guinea pig".

Leadership: Do you explore your inner world under the motto "Stay Alive", adding the "True" value to the underlying condition of your representation on the sinuous route of building a strong character?

But Hannibal Lecter, the old lab rat, resistant to any venom, always reacts unpredictably. Nobody can experiment his weaknesses, he doesn't give up in front of any hostile treatment. Nobody can stick a plastic nail in the steel carcass of his brilliant mind, no matter how flexible it would be. And that because the plans stored in his mind with countless control instructions and advanced update commands are hardly changeable.

In the case of Hannibal no personality deviations can be registered. And the search functions "VLOOKUP", HLOOKUP and "MATCH", at the level of thoughts, emotions and experiences, as investigative methods and detailed observance, are hardly accessible to a researcher.

Much less in the case of Doctor Frederick Chilton. Because his exuberant desire, that would require hundreds of hours of researches, can't overcome the altitude of thousands of attempts to re-project the human being's thoughts that Hannibal Lecter has already reached.

The highest level of success for Hannibal, with respect to his persuasion ability, is like an inaccessible mountain for most mountain climbers. And this Great Eyry that only very few psychologists can reach is, to say so, Doctor Chilton's inaccessible. This uncomfortable mountain climber, with no ropes, is completely neglected by the conqueror of the highest peaks.

There is a limit in the precision with which any measurement is made, according to the operator's skill. Especially when the latter misses the creation drive of the genius who, because of self-knowledge and deep experience doesn't need to isolate a foreign mind in order to comprise the universe of science.

Leadership: Do you experience professional fulfillment on more advanced "human subjects", especially when you are at the forefront of a phenomenon that is not direct, but mediated by a view over the "whole"?

The effect of using function and authority on an individual, especially on his extraordinary potential to provide new useful conclusive evidence, that are pertinent to the cause you serve (reaching perfection in leadership), is not consistent throughout its trajectory to the target during the entire evolutionary cycle.

Trying to develop a new way of thinking, exploring the human factor as a huge challenge, won't guarantee you a way out of the labyrinth of contradictions in which you will surely get lost.

Do you intend to use the knowledge you acquired from observing man, which is subject only to his own authority, in order to prove a new dimension of human nature? If yes, then firstly take into account "the unpredictable", the inaccurate map of the way in which he reacts.

Raw matter, the primordial substance of your whole research activity, Man, can produce an excess of conclusions which prove themselves hard to assimilate. Or he can create certain ambiguities which place you in an area of uncertainty. So, look to comprise the universe of science without expanding your human exploration perimeter beyond the admissible borderline.

Because it might be that in the wish to achieve professional fulfillment, making experiments on "human subjects" with a complicated structure as experience and model of thinking to get stuck in a routine of analysis and information grinding. An unforeseen dynamic of expansion towards some horizons as alluring as they are obscure and deceiving.

A view over the "whole" is formed by the temptation to conquer the highest peaks of science in terms of a psychological intervention on man in an attempt to turn him into a passive instrument in the hands of an Almighty God.

Prisoner In The Desert Of Science is what a leader becomes in his desire to reach special performances digs his toes in the dissection of the "human factor" taken as individual entity. Thus loosing sight of the "human factor" as collective entity. Subsequently, instead of minimizing the risk of unwanted effects, he remains captive of a research that carries him further away from the initial purpose.

Prometheus Bound

Learn to make the leap towards excellence, without submitting yourself to a much too strong tension of revelation.

I was in conflict with myself, an inflexible law of life that I could not make a fool out of. I didn't want to accept the fact that it can't be possible to live in a utopian world. My world, interconnected at a subtle level with my mind and my ability to observe, granting me a new and exciting way of exploring the mystery of what I truly was. A world made out of many distinct, but functionally interconnected systems, through an ambiguous surge of potential energy, during some transitional processes. Yet, they lead to indirect loss.

A man covered by a veritable collection of thoughts and questions, shaped by a tumultuous waterfall of complicated rules, that has a strong flow and produces tamed energy, needs only a momentarily impulse in order to create a whole world of own rules. It was the attempt to reversal a permanent process under construction, a broad spread of the always doubted imagination, a conducting wire that triples its length to the absurd.

Continual, I was aiming with my huge will over the whole the attempt to enjoy my own "ego pride" in a small paradise, in my particular world. Pouring, something in me unleashed all its fury, all its thirst for ruthlessness, for that aggressively-deep craving to possess knowledge, that fanatic ambition that finds details to be a particular sign, an isolated phenomenon.

Leadership: Does the work you relate to favor a meeting with a Creator of reality expressing his vision in the space of a relationship with the intention to be understood beyond the continuous practice of knowledge?

The man who searches for meaning is an artist of deduction that starts from a general premise to reach, in most cases, a particular conclusion. I was touched by a moment of maximum intensity, a coagulation of stimuli that triggered an adverse reaction, bringing to light less expected answers, the deepest fears and uncertainties. Who was I?

I got my appetite back for this beautiful madness called "creation". I shaped my masterpiece with that intensity of an electric current that crosses a circuit, going over the maximum admitted value, doubling the risk of self-destruction. Somehow, I felt that I had to make myself understood beyond the continuous practice of knowledge, through an image and that's it, a picture of the satisfaction of seeing myself accomplished on a creative, artistic plane, an image of a meaningful being fixed in a reality that is both openness and complex plurality.

The ability to create is the chance to evolve through imagination to a knowledge that preaches an experience made to completely shake what once was and to allow the restart of something else. Doubtful, without having certain logic, I tried to make the distinction between two types of entities: A and B in a one-on-one relation. I had to see beyond the wall that reached higher and higher along with the level of knowledge and ability. I treated everything with the slightly arrogant contempt of a philosopher's apprentice.

Leadership: Does the revelation that you can get through your creation have the merit of subjecting to the review to the role of an artist of a moment of lucidity in which everything is favorable to the emergence of an original art?

From the material he had at hand, clay, Prometheus, without listening to the Olympian gods, created the first inanimate and unconscious man, and then stole the divine fire to give life to his creation.

I worked harder with the clay of the reality I was shaping according to the levels of a careful observation of people and his existential psychology, without conforming to any norm, any pattern, and any current. But as Kant said: "Have courage to use your own understanding".

I researched and reached a revelation: Eureka ! But I had to protect the secrets I claimed to be able to reveal. At any cost, assiduous, I had to obtain that positive reaction, I had to find out what exactly did that passage from essence to existence, through substance, meant; which could give meaning to my efforts of giving life to my own creation.

An original art connects what comes to light with the thing from which something comes to light, being the point of demarcation between what you think, what you say and what you do in a context of priority changes.

My body was touched by a thrill of enthusiasm, a wave of hesitation, moments of great intensity. Sometimes I felt like I could gladly give up my work, if that meant to risk not reaching any performance record. I know it was stupid, and that it meant to amputate that side of me, which can feel, argue and accumulate new stimuli, intensifying each stage of my evolution. Could I have left aside years and years of torment and hard work, of sleepless nights?

The role of fuses in an electric panel is that of interrupting the circuit when the intensity of the electric flow is well beyond the maximum admitted value.

Similarly, my role was that of an apprentice of my own Ego, of main respondent of my own transformation, with the task of installing the connection cables between my creation and my evolution – that could warrant my internal and professional freedom, but without exposing my potential to the major risk of being "torn", of losing its essence and value. I had to make the leap towards excellence without submitting myself to a much too strong tension.

My priority was not to finally experience a smart creation, but to turn the creation into a direction to follow towards my majestic detachment from the phenomenon of addiction to being like others.

Leadership: Can you improve your ability to forge an unrivaled work without subjecting it to the risk of self-destruction?

You find yourself in a permanent construction and reconstruction process. A broad spread of the always doubted imagination, a conducting wire that triples its length to the absurd, the bad luck of a perfect evolution and its sources can represent some abstract reference points, that can't bring something extra to your necessary, existential truth, your greatest deficiencies.

The consequence? You'll often reach moments of high tension, triggering an adverse reaction, bringing to light less likely answers, your deepest fears and uncertainties. Who are you, truly?

This is the essence of wisdom in the fight between you and leadership: the ability to shape your masterpiece without submitting it to the risk of self-destruction. You have to see beyond the wall that rises higher together with your knowledge and ability level. What lies beyond this wall? What lies beyond the appetite for this beautiful madness called "creation"?

The courage to use your wisdom, your own understanding. Moreover, your capacity to manage the balance between gain and loss, between good and shallow functionality.

Research and you will reach revelation without being dominated by an imaginary, much too puzzling reality. Be the apprentice of your own Ego. Of that Ego that doesn't suppress itself willingly in contact with the strong stimuli of evolution through enhancing knowledge.

Learn to make the leap towards excellence without submitting yourself to much too strong tensions. Otherwise, you risk becoming a "Prometheus Bound"; the suffering your courage caused you goes beyond the normal limits dictated by your will to overachieve, it will make you deeply regret. A moment of wandering towards absolute, for which you'll pay with horrible tortures.

Leadership is the revelation of a new identity that you mustn't necessarily consider as the starting point of a great creation of culture, but a variant of the self that shines through what you manage to trigger in terms of experiences, feelings, or emotions.

Prometheus Bound symbolizes the continuous transformation, determined by the attempt to delight your own "ego pride" in a small paradise, in your private world. That superior Ego, which strives very hard and relentlessly to turn you into someone else, removing you from yourself, making you feel you've reached too "high" in relation with the susceptibility level of your leadership potential.

Are you aware of the heights you can fly to?

How Do You Promote The Image Of Your Company?

On April 03, 2009

Start exploring your brand image, experimenting with a new challenge called "the beginning of a new world" or "the end of an old world".

Honolulu, where almost every man longs to go on holiday. If you were never there, you do not know what you have lost. It is Paradise on Earth, or at least that is what you will hear from those who have been there or who, in turn, have heard about this place. But how did Honolulu managed to become such a famous resort and so frequented by tourists from all over the world?

In a strange way, Honolulu does what all the stars in the world and companies that respect themselves do: it knows how to sell its image. And it does it well through radio, television and cinema. Commercials and advertisements that never cease to appear everywhere show dream places, such as beaches with white, fine sand, palm trees with beautiful flowers of different shapes and colors, hotels with swimming pools, restaurants, bars, pool bars, cafes etc., all maintained with great care. Heck, I have almost convinced you to spend your summer holiday in Honolulu, isn't that right?

Leadership: Can you capture the most appealing image of a whole that has received additional authentication from a different interpretation of its content?

Is not easy to develop a company and take it to on the crest of the wave, and therefore it cannot achieve success overnight. It takes a lot of hard work, perseverance, patience and sometimes a lot of money, but is worth all the effort. But sacrifices and work don't represent the great impediment, but the fact that you must cope with internal and external market and maintain yourself at the highest level.

Maintaining your company at the highest level is like waiting for the start of a marathon race. Until you hear the crack of the gun, in that moment of waiting, you take a look at the other competitors, trying to assess their abilities and limitations. You compare yourself with them and try to guess whether you are superior to them or not. But this very brief moment of personal counsel can turn into a fiasco. For you could annihilate your self-confidence, your positive attitude could diminish. And during the race, you will not be able to give your best.

It is here that stands out what we call performance. In order to carry forward your company, you must be a performer who never annihilates his self-confidence when measuring forces with others, when he is challenged his power to accept the final result, whatever it may be.

This is not just about marketing, but that strategic thinking, combined with the emotional plan; it's about the leadership model used and the situations where you are tempted to adopt an alternative style.

To capture the most appealing image of a whole that has received additional authentication from a different interpretation of its content, it is in fact to foresee the quality and facilities of an area of interest (tourism, entertainment, culture, product development, etc.) that does not need recurrent interventions to make it accessible for all pockets.

Your leadership must be very spontaneous, as well as comprehensive, not at all foggy nor directed only to minor details, for your victory is the spontaneous and exact reflection of the inner image that you create during your process of evolution. Everything starts from the answer you give to the question:"Who are you, in fact?"

Do you cancel your self-confidence when you measure forces with others? Do you create a positive image of you, trying to reach the top position? How does your performance measure and what factors may impede your evolution? Are you a winner or a loser?

Leadership: Can you gain the recognition of an existing area of interest through the double effect of a reference value obtained by increasing the reputation of the promoted image over similar offers?

Offering high quality services and products, at competitive prices, to address a particular target, is only the first step you should do when you start the race. To be victorious, a company needs to know how to sell its image both at home and abroad. The better known, the stronger its brand, the higher its ranking on the market and the more profitable it becomes. A product or service is more stable on the financial market as more famous is the company's brand.

Naturally, the intention of any manager is to lead his company to the highest level, on a leadership position on the market in a given segment of activity, if possible. His company must maintain a very good relationship with customers, in order to promote a very favorable image. A very simple and effective way in this respect is to always resort to mass media and Internet, in order to popularize its services and products on the market and, at the same time, to remain permanently in the minds of as many people as possible.

The strength of a company does not reside only in the quality services it offers to customers, but also in the image it creates and permanently sells everywhere. For example, in Iasi, there are dozens of companies that perform professional services of Xerox copies, binding and typing. They all offer the same exceptional quality of services at a very low price, but only one of them holds the largest market share, and that is because it invests heavily in advertising and marketing campaigns. Wherever you go, you see a banner with the company's logo. Permanent local radio and television stations advertise them. That is what we call effective marketing !

You can increase the reputation of your image promoted to similar offers on the market through a great history of the goal and the experience gained in the field, but also by a visual way of defining the features of a phenomenon of the type of accuracy to expectations, entitled "beyond everything you have experienced so far."

Leadership means building a brand that inspires the target through the imaginary value of the image and actively promoting it in an event that changes history, imprinting a brand-new direction: The New World.

Conclusion: A company cannot reach a high level of development if it does not draw attention, if it does not know how to attract customers and make them loyal. That is why it is so important to create a strong image. Therefore, if you want your company to prosper, you must be as inventive as possible and involve yourself more in promoting its image.

The Proof Of The Greatness Of Leadership

On April 11, 2010

Find the connection point between what you are and what defines you, so that your leadership allows for an optimal highlight of the role you play in the lives of others.

Yesterday I read an article about a teacher who was awarded by King Juan Carlos of Spain. He was awarded the distinction for promoting the Spanish language, culture and civilization in Romania. And the Spanish Ambassador to Bucharest, Estanislao de Grandes Pascual, who organized the award ceremony at the opening of the 8th edition of the Spanish-language National School Theater Festival, said:

"Georgeta Vanțiu's whole life was, in fact, a battle for the promotion of the Spanish language and culture. In 1986, the communist authorities intended to give up the Spanish language in the curricula. This did not happen, thanks to the decision with which Mrs. Vanțiu supported programs, signed protests, and advocated, no matter what humiliations that would entail, to keep the subject in the education system.At the time, she was part of a cell of professionals enamored with Spanish culture, some of which are either no longer among us, or do not live in Romania any longer."

Leadership: Are you willing to go all out, strongly believing in your ability to initiate change and maintain it in difficult situations, without falling into contexts dominated by secondary aspects of the world you choose to believe in?

The keys to progress in leadership are: the courage not to become a prisoner of the system, the ability to initiate and maintain change in difficult situations, the ability to be flexible and work in diverse environments, the ability to distinguish fantasy from reality.

There is only one way to reject tomorrow: to not have it experienced in the souls of others, in harmony with them. In order for your ascent to occur quickly, you must take the first step worthy of consideration by other people: to give due importance to the role you assume, to combine it perfectly with that of the leader, anchoring it in the scenario of a new reality. You will have a colossal success only if you show solidarity, only if you manage to offer a truly innovative interpretation through a role full of substance, full of passion and energy.

Mrs. Georgeta Vanțiu showed an effective leadership meant to bring value – through passion, through enthusiasm, through her attempt and success to constantly maintain people's interest in a subject that was not accepted in the education system by the communist regime. She has shown, by exerting strength of character, that she is tailor-made for a role of great importance. I would say that she was a leader by her firm determination not to give up her initiative, by her skill and perfection in coming into contact with people – demonstrating a great ability to understand the importance of the human factor in the development of a society.

As a result, her well-performed role, which has had a major influence on thousands and even tens of thousands of people, was not devoid of praise from the "public" who are grateful for her beautiful performance. The distinction offered to her for the promotion of the Spanish language, culture and civilization in Romania, was not only an opportunity to recognize her leadership qualities, it was also proof of her own greatness.

Leadership: Does the moment you choose to make a change depend on the sacrifice you are willing to make to accept that you are in the phase of refusing a decision that marks the moment of assuming the restriction of your own freedom?

Your personality must be defined as that of a man made for strong and complex roles, where there is no possibility to deviate from the decisions made. Leadership should not be like a circus show where people laugh out loud. But an authentic, real, serious one, full of emotions and feelings, adapted to your own vision – a show in which what seems impossible becomes possible.

Does the foundation of your leadership have a solid foundation? What beliefs does your leadership rely on? Is it based on the belief that other people's needs are a top priority? Is it based on the belief that you can work with them to change what is not working well, on the belief that you need to fill in the gaps in their professional lives?

What are the ways to your progress in leadership? Are you making progress in implementing those measures in your action plan that are best suited to people's needs and aspirations (and which can have the potential to drive their professional development)? Are you making progress in improving your interaction with them? Are you making progress in providing people with access to a greater diversity of resources that will facilitate their success?

How do you show that you fully understand the sublime meaning of your mission?

Every leader, like Mrs. Georgeta Vanțiu, needs time to climb the leadership ladder, a lot of things need to be done. But the most important thing is the mission you take on. Do you know how to demonstrate your greatness through your mission? Does your mission involve sacrifices? Does it narrow your horizons? Can the mission lead you to a professionalism in which you can respond in any situation? How does your mission help you reach a higher level? What's the one wrong thing you didn't notice? Does the mission help you to establish good relationships with other people?

Remember: If you do something and lose people's trust, your relationship with them can be severed in the blink of an eye.

The point of connection between what you are and what defines you is actually a way of looking at yourself as in a realistic mirror that reverses (from high to low) the way to identify with the hero you want to turn into.

The Proof Of Greatness In Leadership is the very power to face the danger of losing your freedom, in the event of the introduction of an action (based on common law) that may lead to a change in the way you redirect a potentially tragic outcome. To do this, you must allow yourself to voluntarily select how to deal with extreme situations.

Protect Your Company's Image

On March 19, 2009

Add a touch of vitality to your leadership, making sure that its constituent elements are achieved and maintained at the highest quality.

Once again, they made a lucky hit

Some robbers managed to deceive the vigilance of surveillance and alarm systems and to rob a bank. They managed to steal almost 300.000 LEI from the safe. All newspapers and TV stations speedily commented this incident, and police apparently did not track down the culprits.

When such an unsolved case appears on the front page of newspapers, the police's image has to suffer. How can there be organized crime, since the police are always on duty and fulfill their duties with great perseverance and care? "We will do our best", the police chiefs say, but unfortunately, you cannot really see tangible results. This is why the police are always criticized and blamed to be an ineffective institution.

Is your leadership a "succedaneum"?

Succedaneum, in medical language, is defined as a pharmaceutical product relatively efficient in terms of a specific disease, but which is not the most convenient to be prescribed. In other words, in default of the ideal pharmaceutical product, a "drug" is prescribed that presents less confidence – succedaneum.

It is necessary for us to be aware of this alternative, too: that of the managerial "succedaneums". As long as a company works erratically and does not get satisfactory results, there is no performance among its leadership. The problem is that hierarchy of its qualities and defects, more or less definite, and the order of their importance that managers forget to establish – so that they can implement effective measures for the final results to be as good as possible.

Just as a potter shapes the figure, molding the clay with confident gestures, stopping to finish every detail – so do you must harmoniously include in your leadership those policies that will not remain with "debts", making sure that its constitutive elements (integrity, competence, resistance to corruption, tenacity and efficiency) are fully achieved and maintained at the highest quality level. These elements emphasize the value and spontaneity of your leadership.

The image that your leadership determines is about configuring the perspective of what you want to hear about yourself without opposing a controversy created around what it produces in your absence.

A debt-free policy is a reflection of the balanced state of the institution or company you run, is your intention to convey a certain conception to emphasize the creation of value – that will generate confidence and solidarity.

Do you systematically follow the way that the constitutive elements of your leadership present themselves? Are you consistent in defending the principles that allow you to promote the value of the institution you run? Or are you a weak manager, who relentlessly explains what goes wrong with the work, ensuring everyone it is not his fault?

Are integrity, competence, resistance to corruption, tenacity and efficiency the constitutive elements of your leadership?

Leadership: Is the area of your experience of accountability distinguished by a different framing of the deed that will always follow you?

In pursuit of the sensational or sometimes showing partial or distorted facts, newspapers and televisions do nothing but stain the image of certain institutions and organizations. Correct or not, true or false, people who see the news draw the conclusions and, little by little, they begin to lose confidence in the effectiveness of such institutions and companies.

We all judge things on the surface, by the way facts in mass media are presented to us, without knowing the reality itself. A company or institution constantly bombarded with criticism and words of reproach will not leave a very good impression and we will certainly avoid it.

Something must be done, but what? If managers care about the reputation and the image of the company they run, they must pay more attention to the services they promote and how they involve themselves in solving problems. That out of respect for customers who confide in them and always call their services.

Leadership is the stateliness given to you by the fact that you are able to accept the compromise between the ideal of serving a higher cause and the context you create for yourself to not be left with the accusatory traces of your deeds.

There is an old saying that says: "The fish gets rotten from the head down". The manager undoubtedly is to blame for the failure of an institution, who did not involve himself in time in solving the problems, who was not skillful enough to start a team of top professional, to effectively intervene in difficult situations and who was not able to take the necessary measures in advance. All these have resulted in an unappreciative public image, which had certainly led to failure. Nothing happens by chance, any cause has an effect and every effect has its cause.

A successful image attracts success. An institution or company should really be able to complete its mission and create itself a successful image. But a successful image does not appear by itself, but it is built over time, with effort from all employees.

Conclusion: an institution or a company that wants to be respected must promote an image as good as possible, meaning to prove that they deserve the trust of those relying on their services, by effectiveness and readiness.

Returning to the beginning of this article, Romanian police will be able to create a better image for themselves if they will win the fight against criminals and will focus their efforts on crime prevention. But for that, they must change their action methods, so that they protect more effectively the interests and needs of citizens and be able to solve problems in the shortest time.

How do we know if an institution or a company is successful? By their image.

Prove That You Are An Efficient Leader

On March 31, 2009

Enlighten your way towards excellence, without allowing the "ball" to get out from your area of responsibility.

Three people with a mask on, who had specialized equipment got through in a bank and managed to take two hundred thousand leys. The surveillance cameras surprised the moment when these three people hit the jackpot, but because they were wearing masks they were not identified.

The chief of police was determined to take immediate measures. He convoked all police officers and told them on a firm tone: "Justice has to say its word. I want these burglars to be caught immediately and to respond in front of the law. Until the end of the week this case will be solved. Get to work ! "

Leadership: Is there a need for a substantive review of the current results criteria that reflect a wider view of your impact in the area of the tangible?

How do you capitalize your leadership potential? Do you assume the responsibility of being a model of efficiency for the art of leading? Do you have another model to follow besides your own person? How do you react to what happens in your area of responsibility? Are you doing things right when you lead the others? Are you focusing only on results?

Just as human did not create computers for mediocre tasks, so your talent to be a practical person, to surprise and to change the negative side of things is not restricted by any rules or conditions. The tangible in leadership refers to the special circumstances you have to meet in choosing certain information and ignoring others, organizing them in some form of response to requests from the authority you represent in formulating new directions for implementing a course of action.

The criteria for the producing of results that reflect a broader vision of your impact in the area of the tangible are data of uniqueness, level of risk, reactions to events, the form of a response to the demands of a thorny situation, the destination you propose through direct channels or bypasses and the demands of the maximum obligations you claim from others.

Leadership: Do the results they got at the test called "justice must have its say" show that the fairness and transparency of your activities are the forms of response to an irrepressible human need: "the need to be someone else"?

Responsible attitude is the only possible approach. Once you have identified a problem, you must constitute and a belief system, through which to reject any attempt to avoid it, you must establish a strict delimitation of areas which you must treat through a prompt intervention, and which would intensify the performance of your efficiency.

If you are a football fan, then you probably know that all the balls from the gate's area belong to the goalkeeper. In leadership, the balls from your gaming area represents the values and beliefs that you have formed throughout life and that lead you towards excellence, but only with the obligatory condition to reflect the truth, to be based on integrity and honesty.

The fact that the chief of police really wanted to catch the criminals by the end of the week mobilized all officers to move quickly and to be more efficient. This is the kind of approach which people who are truly competent adopt and once they propose something, no one and nothing can stop them from achieving their goals. This is the type of approach that are adopting truly competent people who, once they have set an objective, no one and nothing can stop them to achieve it. And their courageous spirit draws the attention of everyone who is embraced of a powerful solidarity, unity, and who hurries to help without looking to receive praise and reward.

In a city that wants to be promoted there has to be no organized crime and can't be tolerated such actions like vandalism, burglaries, thefts in the street, sometimes at high hours with the whole world watching. The chief of police knew very well that overlooking or not taking the immediate measures of caching the lawbreakers can mean not only loosing his reputation, but also his job. In simple terms, who doesn't do his work, who doesn't get involved for real in solving the problems risk to make hurt himself.

The need to be someone else corresponds to the goals of the performance that you are addressing in view of a vision that has the right to appreciate the social importance of your work by identifying the minuses and pluses of some situations that are difficult to predict.

Are you treating problems before they became too big? It is clear that in the absence of some specialists who investigate the cases of robbery, things will move hard. The entire activity of finding, identification and catch fast the lawbreakers need a lot of work, skills, team spirit and initiative spirit. It's indeed hard, but not impossible; this is what detective Columbus would say. So, a little more optimism wouldn't spoil !

A police chief, who keeps the reputation of the institution he leads, must ensure that criminals will be caught in a short time, so they wouldn't encourage the other murderer's intentions. Why was so many banks and ATM robbed in the last period? It is clear that the thieves noticed quickly the inefficiency of police and saw in this a big advantage which they knew how to profit from. A weak point for someone creates an opportunity for others, or who is attentive notices immediate Arhile's heel.

The old saying "Who is in a hurry, quickly get tired" it's not valid in certain domains or areas of activity where the rules change or they are not respected. As a leader you have to be capable to take the initiative to solve the problems before they become too big and to make sure that the objectives you proposed are accomplished in a short time. In consequence, only if you will act with a lot of seriousness and you will find quick solutions to the most complex problems, you will have to win and you will be praised.

Enlighten your way towards excellence, without allowing the "ball" to get out from your area of responsibility.

An effective leader is not like a soccer player who dribbles many opponents while sprinting and covers the whole field to score. But rather he is like a goalkeeper who has to defend the shots of other players, keeping you in the game even when the game does not go as planned.

P.S. I hope the police will solve faster the difficult cases and will be a step forward ahead of the criminals and not the opposite. But everything depends on those who lead this institution. Are they efficient leaders?

Psychological Stimuli And The Balance Of Existence

Authentic creation springs from an all-encompassing passion that transcends the boundaries of a single sphere and spills over into all of existence.

Lucian Blaga remarked that "Don Juan does not have a thousand small passions , but one virtual passion " . And, as if in a dialogue with this idea, Eisenstein notes: "Why should we admit Donjuanism only in love? Of course, they exist much more in all fields? And first of all precisely in those where things are related to such problems like success, appreciation, victories, just as clearly as in the field of love arenas.

The meditations from this period make the director Serghei Eisenstein recognize the psychological and emotional stimuli of his development, the exact path of the road he followed. Eisenstein tries, in an excruciating struggle to understand himself, to take stock of his existence. The life that slipped through his fingers, through which he walked like Peer Gynt through the swirl of dry leaves - his unfulfilled thoughts. And, without a doubt, the balance sheet, which includes many essential victories, reopens the pain of the many tragedies that he experienced and is experiencing even now, through the ban of "Ivan". And this time he tries to defeat death through irony.

Leadership: How do complex reactions in your brain affect the perception of "instances" in your creation, in a deep exposition of your own experiences?

Instances of a creation can be given by the characters, themes, or symbols that the director introduces into the narrative. They have the role of ensuring a continuous flow of stimuli at the level of the viewers' perception, maintaining their attention and emotion during the entire cinematic experience.

For this reason, the physiology of emotions involves a series of complex reactions regarding the characters in a film. They reflect the way director Eisenstein notes Don Juan's passion, not as a thousand little passions, but as one virtual passion. Basically, emotions are generated by chemical and electrical interactions in the brain, similar to the psychological and emotional stimuli that influenced the director Eisenstein in his development. Emotional reactions can have a significant impact on overall health, influencing not only success and appreciation in a particular field, but also victories and problems faced.

Just as prolonged stress can lead to health problems like hypertension, Eisenstein reflects on his life, taking stock of his existence like Peer Gynt. Understanding how unfulfilled emotions and thoughts affect the body can help develop more effective strategies for managing stress and improving mental and physical health. Aware of this, the director Eisenstein tries to heal his soul wounds caused by tragedies and prohibitions, using irony to face the symbolic death of his creations, as in the case of the film 'Ivan'."

The impulse that animates the creator's energy comes from a deep desire to transform dreams and emotions into tangible reality, thus generating works of art that transcend time and space.

Psychological stimuli and the balance of existence are linked by a single idea: the search for meaning in every lived experience. For this reason, art becomes an essential tool in exploring and understanding the depths of human existence, offering us insights and revealing hidden meanings in our most intimate and meaningful moments.

Absolute Devotion

On August 19, 2010

Focus your soul antennas to others, so that they attach more to you.

In the movie "The Mummy – Tomb Of The Dragon Emperor (2008)", Evelyn and Rick O'Connell spouses are entrusted with an important mission: to go to China and to return "The Eye Of Sangri La" to the Shanghai Museum, where, according to the legend, it shows the way to The Pond of Eternal Life.

They perform their mission, managing to deliver to the museum that rare collection piece, but there, they were suddenly surrounded by General Yang and his people. He wanted to revive the Emperor Qin Shi Huang and his Terracotta Army at any cost.

Leadership: Can you discover yourself as an absolute value in the way you live your faith in the case of an inner motivation for the call to overcome any limitations?

General Yang, with an authority that leaves no room for compromise, summons Evelyn to read the inscription which was engraved on the "Eye of Shangri La". If she had refused, her husband would have been killed.

Her entire body shook of sighs at the thought that she will lose forever the one who has always been beside her. She could not turn her back to a man so dear to her. But, deep down her soul, she felt a terrible fear, was haunted by a dark premonition that death watched them both closely. The situation they were in brought to her mind a terrible abyss of possibilities. Her soul was on the verge of despair.

She looked weary-hearted at Rick, as if she wanted to say: "My soul and my body are entirely yours. I will never leave you." The expression of her eyes was disturbing, like the look of a mother who sees her child seized by a serious illness. She was a loving wife, a human being with an intense spiritual life. No, she couldn't be so selfish with the one that was her companion and her best protector.

Rick startled when he saw Evelyn willingly throwing herself in front of the gun pointed at him. This perspective terrified him. He felt a tug at his heart strings, but he was equally worried. He still kept a serious expression his face, as their lives hanged by a thread.

Evelyn stood in front of the general, with a humble attitude. She was determined to read the inscription, from a sense of fear. Rick just stood there thinking for a moment, then, hiding his concern, showing a confident mine, told her on an affectionate tone: "No, Evelyn, do not do that. They will kill me anyway."

She knew her husband's voice timbre better than anyone – she knew he didn't really want to say that. But she couldn't take into account another possibility, but to read the inscription, with all the dread of that was to follow.

Everything she could make for him could be considered already done, including the personal sacrifice.

Devotion is the way to show yourself as being superior in the face of end-points – revealed as life lessons that harmonize the causes and effects derived from an inescapable situation.

She proved her absolute devotion to her husband. Rick and Evelyn had every reason to be anxious. General Yang treated them with superiority and with coolness, and didn't hesitate to give voice to contempt in the hardest way and in the most offensive terms. They could die or live, only if Evelyn read the inscription – but nothing was certain.

Everything was clear as crystal; Rick could not doubt the loyalty of Evelyn, which would have never lost affection for him. But, reading the inscription, she lit a flame in his soul. Without a doubt, such a person deserves an eternal gratitude, deserves to be rewarded for her devotion.

Leadership: Does your way of being an extraordinary man reside in the joy of recognizing yourself as the victor of a struggle with yourself in which your heart leaves its mark on the character of the person next to you?

If you devote your heart and soul to a person, she will answer with the same feeling. To be received deep inside people's hearts, you must show your absolute devotion to them, increasing their feeling of safety and trust about you. As people feel directly your degree of commitment and its nature – commitment that you take it to them only out of duty or fear of losing your position or commitment based on love and shared values. And if you don't prove to meet their expectations, you will be abandoned.

Your job, as a leader, is to be always there, next to people, among them, to support and help them in difficult moments. People see in you their salvation. There isn't enough for you to be their guide in everything, by giving to them clear orders and instructions in order to accomplish the tasks they were entrusted with. You must have an iron will, but a good soul, as well, to assure them of your friendship for them to be always grateful to you. So, you must treat them with kindness and understanding, to take care of them as if they were your own children, your own family. This will further tighten the connection between you and them. And together, you will become a greater force.

Conclusion: Working with people is the most difficult thing. This "material" called human is fragile, and therefore you must have a special care for how you behave with him. You must show ability to ensure cohesion of a group, to manage to turn a crowd of people in a real team.

Focus your soul antennas to others, so that they attach more to you. People devote their heart and soul to you only if you are devoted to them.

The leader's most powerful attribute is that he leaves his mark on the sharing of the emotions of others in order to differentiate between them and themselves.

Charisma

On April 27, 2009

People will admire and follow you if you fit their ideal.

It's possible that the last attempt to prove the whole world that it's possible to get to the destination you proposed through your own strength, to be successful. I think that deserves all the respect the man who makes himself remarked and proves with this occasion to everybody that, yes, it is possible to achieve your goals, to fulfil your dreams if you put heart in what you do, if you work with seriousness and sense of responsibility, and if, from the very beginning, you take the commitment that you will not give up at what you proposed no matter how hard the way will be in a certain moment and how impossible will seem to pass through.

By the end the reward for the effort you made will be appropriate, you will start to see the results, you will feel like you're just one step away from the end of the race, winning the big trophy. Almost instantaneous you will become surrounded by different people, simple or stylish, younger or older, who wish to become like you, some heroes, some winners, some examples worthy to follow by everyone.

Leadership: Do you take what you are when you get a result that influences the decisions you made in the past, beyond the appearance of an objective reality?

If you watched the third part of the movie "Rocky", then you certainly know what I mean. Rocky, played by the actor Sylvester Stallone, is preparing for the game against the arrogant Clubber Lang, for the title of champion. Just like before any important game, Rocky, very ambitious and determined to fulfil his dream with any price, starts his long, intense and extremely exhausting practices. Pushups, pullups, first in one hand then two hands, jumping rope, lifting weights and not least jogging.

Rocky was running on the empty streets from the poor neighbourhoods, places he was very familiar with. In a certain moment, one day, Rocky comes to attract after him hundreds or maybe thousands of fans who started running with him, and at the end of the race he is hugged and everyone starts to cheer up having the feeling that they are also winners.

Charisma is the way to see yourself through the eyes of others and to discover how they appreciate you from the immediate vicinity of an exit from the defeated position.

What are the chances to become an ideal leader? The chances are minimal if you fail to lead people in one direction in their favor, if not inspire confidence they need to succeed in everything they have proposed, if you don't make them enthusiastic and you don't transmit them a vision full of hope, clear and optimistic on a long-term. In a word, to become a good leader first you have to win people by your side, to determine them to follow you by pleasure, as they followed Rocky.

This means to have charisma, to attract people by your side by transmitting them the enthusiasm they need to achieve their goals. Through his determined attitude, his persistence and ambition, Rocky inspired people courage and confidence in their future, managing to win them on his side.

Everybody loves winners and take them as models worthy to follow because only they inspire them to make great things, because they motivate them to continue to follow the direction of their dreams and never give up in front of difficulties of life.

Leadership: Is the way in which you accelerate your transformation based on the extremes of a moment at the center of the next moment?

The moment you make the spell of complete transformation and you get to the top is actually the center of the next moment, when you no longer forget where you go and the motivational lessons are no longer working. You become a name that is confused with the notion of the world, not with the notion of "one."

With certainty people will admire and will follow the one who fits their ideal, the one who help them grow in faith, which help them to develop their positive attitudes, their qualities and talents. This is why is so important to be full of charisma – always have a positive attitude, to convince those around you that you have a strong personality and to prove that you are worthy enough for them to follow you. Absolutely everyone will love you if you give them the courage and the push they need in uncertain times, if you encourage them to believe in success and if you help them act and think like winners.

Charisma is a quality that makes people feel and look like winners. All those people who decided to run with Rocky saw themselves, at least for a moment, winners. The spirit of competition, the wish to win, of becoming the best, got hold of their entire being, mobilizing each of them to give everything. A charismatic leader motivates people to move forward with more ambition and dedication.

Winning the "great trophy" is the result of a leadership whose stake is the pride of feeling special by the passion and determination that you have proven to dream and build a realizable ideal.

P.S. Wake in people's attitude and energetic spirit of a winner ! Support them and cheer them up when needed. Encourage them to stand up when they are down and they will love you for this.

This means to have charisma: to charm people, to make them love you and follow you with pleasure.

Creativity

On January 08, 2009

Be open to a new way of thinking and basically to a new way of seeing things, to assure the optimum development of your leadership.

Imagine for one moment that you are sent to follow some special courses of secret agents at a school for espionage. Here you can learn first of all how you can discover if you are followed. At the end of the first semester, instead of a written exam, you are sent in Budapest, dressed just like the locals. Your mission consists in arriving at a certain hour at the fountain in downtown, surrounded by a beautiful park also escaping trackbacks, role that is given to another colleague of yours that you don't know.

Question: Do you think that you will succeed rid of the follower and will arrive at the fountain?

Even if your answer is: "Yes, I will succeed", be convinced that you will not. Why? Because it is not easy at all and, because nobody has to promote this test from the first attempt. This is the first lesson you have to learn in every spying school: "If you are not vigilant and perceptive, if you are not creative and you don't prove that you have imagination in critical moments, you will never accomplish the mission. Actually you are a dead man."

Therefore, in order to promote this test the second or the third time, you have to:

Leadership: Is the anticipation of a situation that you build in your mind when you expect a result directly proportional to the perspective of a logic from which the steps to solve a riddle must emerge?

I am convinced that you don't want to become a spy and to put your life in danger, isn't it? But it is very useful for you to think as a spy when solutions near at hand do not harmonize, to be willing to consider any idea, especially those seemingly ridiculous, and to never limit yourself to only one viewpoint. As a leader, it is imperative to develop a way of thinking different from the others and to learn how to anticipate all risks.

One thing is certain: if you want to achieve all your goals, and especially to become an efficient leader, you have to be creative in the domain you act. The truth is that you won't be able to accomplish any mission, complicated work task, important project or anything else you want to do and, also, you won't be able to find valid and fast solutions to solve problems that you will surely face in the future if you're not creative and perseverant enough. It takes effort and imagination to overcome all barriers that may prevent you from achieving your goals.

But just like a spy, you have to learn to stay sharp, to be attentive. Having a high level job in a company it's not as safe as it was in the past. Managers are looking for very competent people – capable to inspire the others, in theme with the news, determined and creative. In the present, technology develops very fast, changing is very risky and if you don't act when it is time and in the right manner, you risk to lose the position you have and to be replaced.

Leadership: Do you amplify your intention of being the result of deciphering some puzzles in everything that happens to you during the tendency to maximize the importance you give to leaving a boundless labyrinth?

And if you are a manager, it is very important to find innovative ways to overcome all obstacles that may occur, to learn to handle crisis situations, to know how to proceed when you wake up surrounded by all kinds of problems, which they are more complex, more strange, more pressing, so that you quickly get entirely rid of them. Will you really succeed getting rid of them, and reach the objectives set? You will promote the test of skills and acumen, or you will fail?

Please note that, no matter how much you work, how much you wish to make things work and how many sacrifices you will make, if you don't have the spirit of initiative and are not creative in the domain you act, you will never be able to get on top. To succeed in leadership you must be willing to follow without reserve the path of imagination and creativity.

And if you will not take risks, if you will not have enough presence of mind, a strong sense of creativity and great persuasion skills, you will not be able to manage crisis situations. Therefore, you will not be able to climb in the hierarchy.

The biggest risk you are subjected to in trying to show your vigilance is to keep yourself motivated by a way out of a labyrinth whose meaning eludes you.

Leaders are extremely talented in the domain they work. They know how to combine new ideas with old ideas, how to make connections between different things, how to make associations between opposite aspects or apparently incompatible of things. Leaders are always attentive at details, they analyze any kind of way of solving the problems and adopt rejected ideas or apparently without any mean.

If you want to become a perfect leader you need passion for what you do, persistence and especially creativity. How can you become creative? Through exercise. Try to find everyday solutions to the problems you have. Generating ideas, creativity and innovative spirit have to be close to the pulse of any successful organization.

The way you perceive yourself according to the requirements of a mission with no return is a labyrinth whose architect and prisoner you will keep on being for a long time if you fail to find the "exit" that sends you to the next level.

Faith

On December 27, 2009

Overcome your limitations if you want to take the leap to the next level.

Often people who know their limits and weaknesses stay in one place, depressed and disappointed, ready to take a step back from any hardship life lays in their way. They don't have enough physical power and moral strength, they are afraid to react and therefore, instead of defying their fear, of trying to become more confident and more courageous, they accept their faith (whatever it is) and withdraw into their world.

I hope my words will not sound bad and threatening for those persons who don't like change, but prefer monotony, who don't take control over their lives, over their own decisions and who are not convinced that they will succeed to achieve their goals if they mobilize.

It is not a novelty what once was saying the writer Burke Hegdes: "Heaven helps only the people who take action." Faith means action. Means moving, doing something in order to fulfil your dreams, knowing that God will always be by your side and will guide your every step. Probably you remember that joke with the guy that prays God to help him win the lottery. And after an entire life lost with prayers, God says: "John, buy at least a ticket." Means, I will help you, but make at least a small effort.

The reality is unfortunately much crueler, when we think to the fact that some people don't make any effort to achieve their goals. Probably there is a mute battle in the soul of these disorientated people, too controversial battle between good and evil, but which represents only an unnatural attempt of justifying their own incapability, i.e. the lack of faith.

I'll try to give you below a good example illustrating the magical power of faith, hoping that you will listen to me until the end.

Leadership: Are you aware of your permanent connection with "All That You Are" in a dynamic of the potential to deform a reality, knowing very well that the truth is elsewhere?

Considered one of the best movies of 1997, "Gattaca" falls into the category of motivational movies, which draws the public attention on the fact that nothing is impossible. And other movies can enter this category: "A Knight Tale", "Fighter in the Wind" not to mention "Neverending Story". Why are they called motivational?

For one reason, they stimulate us to take action. Namely, they make us to aspire to more, keep us plugged in, causing us to take a positive attitude, better orient us in choosing the paths to follow and to act with more impetus towards achieving the proposed goals. Personally I harbor a tremendous admiration for this kind of movies, and I don't think I'm the only one.

Vincent Freeman is one of the last people born naturally, not in the genetic laboratories. (The action of the movie takes place somewhere in the not too distant future). Since his birth, the specialists said that he will die at the age of 30 years old. Myopic and sickly, Vincent had no chance to make any career in a dynamic and professional company. But, since he was little, he had a single passion, planets, and his dream was to go in space. Even after he turns 17, his biggest dream was to go into space. He tried to get employed at some companies, but nobody hired him because he didn't have a "clean profile".

Faith means to turn yourself into the glory of a shining torch when the limits of your own condition are clearly negotiated from the beginning by a full authority that restricts your manifestation in the world.

Vincent then realized that he needed "more than a landing to get into space". So he resorted to extreme measures. He had to outdo himself if he wanted to make the leap to a higher level. He had to do something more for himself. He had to confront his limits.

Through the help of a specialist in such cases, he managed to get hired in Gattaca as a navigator, which implied a lot of sacrifices. Every day he had to remove all his dead skin and his body hair to limit any suspicion; he put contact lens, change his identity with an ex-performance athlete (but who had all the characteristics of a "valid" person), not to mention the changing of fingerprints or increase in foot surgery. Finally, Vincent succeeds in accomplishing his dream.

Leadership: Are you prepared to discover the meaning of a life full of substance, constantly following a fiction that can turn you into the mirror of reality in a way that is more faithful to advancing to a higher level of evolution?

But a scene from the end of the movie I will never forget, and this is where I wanted to get. Between Vincent and his brother Anton (who had a clean profile) takes place a last swimming contest. Since they were little they were contesting, and who abandoned first and was returning to shore was considered defeated. It's not necessary to remind who were the healthier, the strongest and the apt between them.

But this time, Vincent won. Anton, who could barely stay at the surface of the water, asks Vincent: "How do you do it? How did you make all of these?" Like how could you, an invalid, to accomplish the impossible?

The fiction that turns you into the mirror of reality is a dream that deserves to be experienced fully, with the risk of sinking into a hole of despair and perdition.

Even if they were far from the shore, Vincent stops swimming and answers his brother: "Do you wanna know how I did it? Do you really want to know? Look how I did it, Anton: I never saved anything for the swim back."

Leadership: Does the image that you make of yourself refer to a condition of "IF..., THEN", judging everything you do following the urge "To become someone, you have to start by being nothing" ?

"I never saved anything for the swim back" is an affirmation that I hope will remain in the mind of the future leaders. As this is true faith, to not doubt any second of yourself and once you proposed to achieve a certain aim never saved anything for the "swim back".

"Straight ahead" is the motto of strong people who have the faith that they will be able to move the mountains. Are you sure that you can achieve your goals?

People, unable to make things move in their favour, wait to get the best from life suddenly, without making anything. Unfortunately, all of these unworthy expectations which are deep rooted in their "dysfunctional minds" at changing never fulfil. It's not a surprise that the undecided attitude of these people gained a bad name which, in the opinion of some people, guarantees the failure of any kind of action.

Leadership is mirroring in a dream that is higher than you, stretching across a race in which you have to set the fastest lap.

What should happen so that these individuals change their way of thinking and approach to life?

More faith, this is probably the best answer to this question. Faith kindles that powerful flame, that intense and determined desire of victory which had shown all the great leaders. Without faith, the fire inside us will die at the first obstacle that we meet and it's not a surprise that no matter how much we would try to get over it, we won't. We'll even sink into the swamp of helplessness.

Probably Honore de Balzac was not wrong when he said: "To become somebody, you must start by being nothin g".

But I would add, you must have strong faith that one day, you will get where you have proposed, and this can be achieved only through action. What matters is your will to take action, having faith that you will succeed in everything you undertake. Overcome your limitations if you want to take the leap to the next level.

Faith is the measure of the sacrifice you are able to make to reach an as absurd goal as a fiction that only you can invent.

Greatness Of Soul

On October 17, 2010

In order to enjoy people's prestige and gratitude, it isn't enough to be good, you must be great.

In 1920, after the end of the war, the situation of prisoners around the world was more and more difficult, their fate was desperate. In ruined countries, typhus and starvation killed more and more people. The International Red Cross couldn't grant so much aid. Only the joint efforts of nations could save them.

The secretary of the League of Nations from that period, the experienced diplomat Noel Baker was firmly convinced that only one man was able to save the situation, a man who enjoyed the prestige and general gratitude for his organizational skills, energy, talent, but especially for the greatness of his soul. Entirely responsible for such high requirements was none other than the preeminent explorer and scientist Fridforf Nansen, who was known worldwide for his courage, honesty, generosity and magnanimity of soul which he had displayed many times.

- No ! Nansen responded. Soon I will turn 60; it's time for me to begin a peaceful life. The mission you entrust me will take a few years. It means that, during this time, I will have to quit my scientific work, give up the hope of a life with the family... Why dedicate my life to an issue that is foreign to me and which others seek to get rid of?

Leadership: Does the construction and evolution of your personality rely on the role you play in regulating the distinction between how to fulfill your purpose and the power to express your beliefs?

But a man with a big heart can't remain indifferent to the sufferings of others. Noel Baker insisted:

- The people's faith about to extinguished should be supported in the great family of peoples ... the league is the symbol of salvation. People's faith should be strengthened in this organization - an instrument of peace and mutual understanding. Humanity in suffering turns its eyes full of hope to you, Fridforf Nansen.

Convinced by the emphatic words of the diplomat and animated by the truth he expressed, Nansen agreed to take the helm of humanity in his hands. Dedication and enthusiasm for the good of humanity forced him to abandon his studies on marine and peace of mind that only his family can provide. Once again he had to fight to save people and humanity.

The truth that restarts your purpose in life is guided by the motto: "Are you good, are you merciful, are you great?"

The greatness of a leader doesn't mean personal happiness, but the happiness he shares with others. Not money, not fame, not power, but his good deeds deserve general appreciation. Putting himself in the service of humanity when the situation was very difficult, when nobody had the courage to take responsibility, when, in those moments of despair, everyone waited for help, but everything seemed without hope, and making everything he could to straighten things to a normal path, fighting lies, backbiting, intrigues and injustice which were coming down on millions of innocent people, Nansen was worthy of general gratitude.

Thanks to Nansen and only because of his actions and insistence, donations were finally gathered from people of all nationalities, from various social ranks, which were distributed with rigor and justice to hungry people. Never in all history had a man aroused such a strong echo in people's hearts. Surprising, isn't it, how much a man whose kindness knows no borders do can do. To enjoy people's prestige and gratitude it is not enough to be good, you must be great.

Leadership: Does the greatness of being someone mean finding answers to existential questions in accordance with the desire to create the expectation of a miracle on your part or on behalf of someone else?

Get down deep in your heart and analyze it. I tell you with pride, future leader that people will need you as long as they will live. Analyze the past and the present, try to guess the future, try to listen to your heart and see whether you're able to serve with dedication, with no hard feelings, cupidity or hesitation on those who really need your help. Only one second is enough to change doubt in the most unshakable certainty. If your heart does not refresh before any sense of union with others, it means that you don't feel anything alive in you; which means that you're not "great".

Nansen was a symbol of humanism. You can be the same if you do not stay indifferent to other people's fate. But if you're like one of those hypocrites who do nothing, but wait anxiously for others to show their gratitude and respect for him by the most ceremonious reverences. If you're one of those people who count their cards of "glorification", without taking into consideration the principles of human solidarity. If you're one of those who don't cherish and don't struggle to cultivate human values, like good, justice, altruism, honesty and, finally, if you're one of those who rest on the laurels of an unfair success, due to others, there's no doubt that people will begin to show their disapproval of you, for your deep disappointment. People will not entertain beautiful thoughts and hopes, but fear or disgust, and you will eventually lose in a deep oblivion...

Self-esteem is an ability acquired by working with one's own soul in the context of a general tendency to prefer some situations to others.

Conclusion: To enjoy the prestige and persistent appreciation of the people you should get involved wholeheartedly in achieving their needs and expectations. Sometimes, it takes only the power of word, which sometimes convinces faster than any other method.

P.S. Just as violence of "mind" externalizes through violent acts - the greatness of soul manifests by the power of persuasion of words, in order to achieve acts full of humanitarianism.

Inner Integrity

Acknowledge and protect your most inspiring virtues, in order to ensure the full and outright evolution of your positive ego.

Everything in Kevin Lomax's life changed after he was recruited by the most powerful law firm in the world, "Milton, Chadwick Waters". Despite the fact that his mother was not agree, he accepted to provide his services of a professional lawyer to this company headed by none other than John Milton, a very powerful man with a very strange personality, which has aroused some suspicion since their first meeting.

If you saw the movie "The Devil's Advocate (1997)", perhaps you remember the end. Milton proposes to Kevin to take over his company, promising that he will have everything in the world, but with a single price - to sell his soul. But Kevin was hiding virtues that Milton did not believe that he has them.

Examining the depth of his soul, studying carefully his conscience, feeling that he might commit the worst sin, Kevin, instead of receiving enthusiastically the proposal from Milton, instead of enjoying the honor of being at his company's management, refuses the offer. He cannot approve what is required, he cannot put his entire "being" on one card, but he finds himself forced - tragically disagree - to reject the generous offer and to keep the soul clean.

Here's a really beautiful act, indeed, I would say more, really great, worthy of a man with a special inner virtue.

Leadership: Do you encountered problems accessing the content of your own profile that benefits the hint of perception of good and evil from the perspective of an awareness-raising experience?

The movie "The Devil's Advocate" is a metaphor that brings out well the fundamental factors that define the "personality" of the individual, especially the leaders one. Before deciding what type of organization is right for you, you should have a clear idea of who you are as a person. For, the more you will find yourself above in the top of the elite people, the more you will be subjected to all sorts of trials that you'll be able to overcome only by responsibility, honesty, truth, justice, only through a full inner integrity.

Nothing should tempt and remove you from your true Ego. In leadership, but also in everyday life, your moral consistency is of utmost importance - whether you act according to your conscience. Every moment of your life is influenced by what you are, of the way you feel and think, of the way you relate to your own weaknesses and limitations. You must be as aware of your inspiring virtues and to protect them, to ensure the full and complete development of your positive ego.

You can successfully pass the litmus test of temptations and tests that afflict you, unless you are united with your most sincere feelings and your personality, only if you obey those good rules that you choose, the rules that will not allow you to fall prey to negative influences. Learn to stop yourself before pulling the trigger.

Leadership activates when your consciousness reflects in the confrontation between good and evil and materializes in assuming a loyalty commitment to the value you have when you are given the chance to change something fundamental in your life.

Only if you fully assume the parable of a judgment built on the principle of confrontation between good and evil, you can achieve the full measure of your own capacities to deal with situations you have never experienced before.

As a leader, your greatest duty is to analyze in depth the beliefs that underlie on your own values. Sketch yourself a philosophy to be based on your inner integrity, respect for yourself, and your dedication to the principles that guides you. Everything will collapse if the things that you do, and that represents you, are moving away from your true spiritual roots.

Leadership: Do you welcome the idea of being a life lesson for tomorrow, finding that single reason to refrain from committing the sin called "self-oblivion"?

Imagine that one day you receive a letter from an unknown person. The letter sparks you the most vividly interest because it tells about a treasure. But, in the same time it has a secret that makes you think about you, or in connection to the person that wrote to you. It is impossible that those mysterious words, yet meaningful, do not bother your mind.

The letter ends with the following request: "I left a treasure in your care. Always watch over it, and you will have no problem. Deign, please, my dear friend, to appreciate my sign full of affection and always remember me..."

You want to fold the letter and put it somewhere away. But, however, you feel the need to read it and re-read it again because it tells about you and about a treasure. And above all because someone care and still care with all his soul for you.

Learn to take into account the voice of intuition and trust it. To forget about yourself is to burn the letter without keeping track of what exists within you.

Confirming your quality of being great means to allow for the identification of your own character deficiencies to be remedied by restoring the situation prior to committing a deed and redefining your condition as a supervisor of the treasure called "pure soul".

Inner integrity is like a letter that you feel the need to read and to constantly re-read it. It is an attribute that you must not ever forget it, is the only quality that validates your values. It tells you what you are inside, gives you the impetus to connect to your own ego and to your beliefs that coordinates you in taking important decisions. If it does not mean anything to you, it means you're neglecting your personality.

And, however I repeat to you again, future leader: Be cautious. Always direct your actions following sound principles and put more emphasis on your best virtues to live quietly, without any feeling of guilt. You have hidden a treasure in you - inner integrity - that can switch you to logic and a wise and healthy wisdom. All your wealth and your good depend on what it is in yourself and what happens there.

Being an effective leader is to maintain your vigilance awake, finding that middle ground that moderates excesses in favor of wisdom, between what is happening and how you react to what happens.

It was quite right the one who said that we are actors on the stage of life. We often interpret roles which, strangely, do not coincide with what we are actually. We are like actors that to play well a role, need to forget themselves, and to enter the "skin" of the character that they embody.

Inner integrity refers to who you really are, not to what you want from people to see in you. One is to be yourself and act according to what you feel inside, another is to be someone other than who you are and cover with a layer of veneer your inner self. You cannot ignore the truth about you. You cannot display the integrity that is forever at odds with your true inner. Remember Kevin Lomax, in the end he had to give up the false integrity and to return to the standards dictated by his own conscience.

I agree with the one who said that "integrity is not a switch that you close it or open it, depending on the circumstances that are convenient for you and from that you can benefit." The inner integrity belongs by what you are when you face your own self. Are you true to your own self?

Conclusion: People are divided into two categories: people and not people, says an old adage. It is up to you which category you belong. The smoother and better path is when your ego does not conflict with what you are required. Therefore, you must always maintain your inner integrity and protect your interior virtues of having a peaceful and bright future, in perfect agreement with what you feel and what you are.

Direct your attention more to who you really are.

Insight Power

On April 07, 2011

Seek to penetrate into the thoughts of others in order to decipher their character.

Many drawings were conceived by the master in his modest painting workshop. Daily, I glanced at them trying not only to nourish myself with new colored ideas, but to understand better what is necessary to know, at least the essential elements of his art. The master was a man with an insatiable ambition which knew very well how to work, what techniques and what combinations should be used to confer his paintings a great power of emotion.

- It is not enough to be an artist to make art, you must become a good psychologist, he told me with a compelling and pleasant voice.

Then he showed me an old portrait of Rembrandt and added:

- Look closely at this portrait. Try to see it from 400 different angles. If you fail, then you will never understand art. And you'll never be a great artist.

Leadership: Do you try to substantially modify the way of perceiving content that is full of values by refusing to understand what messages you want to convey?

Natural considerations from such a penetrating spirit. But the thought that I must perceive a picture in 400 ways annihilated my desire to have an initiative no matter as small.

Afterwards the master told me the secret. The only way to see a portrait of a multitude of angles is to focus your attention on the image of that character and try to penetrate his mind, in his world of thoughts in order to decipher his character. Your thinking should not stop to penetrate what it is happening inside the model. In order to see a portrait of several angles you must first get a better depth image.

For example, in that portrait of Rembrandt, if on his face I read maturity, decisiveness, but also certain sadness, then the image was of the lonely man who knows he is not loved by anyone.

The real art of leadership is to explore the depths of the human world in the situation given by the measure of a mature artistic intelligence.

You're pretty good when it comes to penetrate the inner world of those around you? If you want to be an effective leader you need to influence people. And the only way to influence them is to understand the mysteries of the depths of their soul, to understand their concepts, emotional needs, meaning that they give to life, to understand their aspirations, to understand their sensitivities and preferences, and then to stimulate the positive side of their temperament.

Just as a painter is able to assimilate innovations that appear in the painting, to assimilate them and creatively apply to express a new vision - so you have to assimilate as much information from the inner world of the people around you, to investigate and to understand their way of thinking, and then to try displaying your own ideology.

Leadership: Can you find the essence that defines people by the integrative nature of a thought process whose rule of thumb is to break the pattern of response to certain external stimuli?

The famous philosopher Soren Kierkegaard said with competence: "What every man is hiding in the privacy of his mental being is much richer than what may be seen from the outside, so the true man it is rather the one in itself, which does not manifest, while the one that is let known to us is mere a conventional creature."

As a leader, if you can analyze people's feelings in these situations and to understand the deepest and the most delicate operating mechanism of everyone's mind, and if you are able to make some adjustments, then your path to success in leadership is absolute. Try to study people with the same subtlety in observation, with the same acumen that a painter proves when studying nature.

You will not be able to influence people if you fail to make adjustments in their process of thinking and to impose your own view. What is shocking is that there are many leaders who still believe strongly that the power of influence is only about charisma and personality. Wrong. Leadership is also a psychological game whereby you must find the most hidden intentions and realities of the people, and then to conquer them entirely.

Someone made the following statement: "The character is the sum of the moral and mental qualities of an individual." I think nothing is more true. Human nature that surrounds you is essential, and it belongs to their thinking process.

To change people's perceptions you will have to understand their process of thinking. The inability to see them clearly, to understand their inner world will diminish considerably your influence.

Can the essence that defines you be the subject of a superior artistic study whose impact needs to be conceptually grounded?

Conclusion: The power of insight is essential for a leader. Only knowing the people's psychology you can manage to influence and mobilize them, thus having good collaborators and supporters on the way to performance and victory.

Inspiration

Open the channels of communication with others, providing evidence that your values and belief system is working properly.

A strong personality, with firm ambitions, a fighter driven by the desire to obtain remarkable results, a man who ceaselessly imposed itself in the challenges and tests life was the Italian origin navigator Christopher Columbus. This man, full of life, always rushed on the road of discoveries, living all the passionate emotions of a navigator. All of the great four travels he made all over the world enriched the geographic knowledge of the time with numerous islands, such as Tortugas, Martinica, Dominica, Maria Galante, Guadalupe, Montserrat, Santa Maria, Santa Cruz, Puerto Rico, Jamaica, the coasts of Honduras, the Mulata islands, the Darien gulf.

But what was the most helpful for the great navigator, what helped him overcome all the obstacles he had to face over the years was not only perseverance, but inspiration, as well. For always, a man motivated by high ideals, who tries to overcome his limits and live up to his claims cannot succeed only by being ambitious, determined and cunning. He needs another quality, far superior to all others. He must have intuition, he must be full of inspiration, ingenuity, inventiveness, creativity, in order to solve the problems he facing and overcome life's watershed moments.

Leadership: How do you highlight your experience as a result of an authentication error in the sense of maximum resistance to the dependency on the authority you designate?

The French writer Jules Verne tells in his book „Christopher Columbus" about an important event in the life of the illustrious navigator. Christopher Columbus was accused of injustice and cruelty towards the officers that he had sent home. They had really insinuated that he was trying to become independent of the king. Influenced by these unworthy statements, the Admiral, who wanted to keep his reputation and had a bold character, set out for Spain, wanting to justify himself as quickly as possible.

On June 12, 1496, Columbus entered the harbor of Cadiz in Spain, but this second return of his didn't enjoy the sympathy of the crowds at all. Instead of being enthusiastic about his arrival, the people regarded him with disgrace and hatred. Even his company men were against him, they were disappointed that they didn't bring with them the riches that he promised to find.

Only momentary inspiration saved Columbus from an early failure. He had to find a way to support his innocence, providing evidence that his values and convictions are the best. So, in order to prove his opponents that he was right, he argued with them hammer and tongs at the kings' court, using against them the weapon of irony. He proposed to them to make it so that an egg could stand in balance on one end. They didn't succeed. The, Columbus cracked the egg at one end and placed the egg on that side.

- You didn't think of this solution, he said to them. Well, everything is about thinking.

Inspiration means to unleash your creative power in the prospect of a difficult world that turns simple things into complicated things, from clear ideas to confusing ideas.

Inspiration is like an orchestra conductor – guiding you to be sure things are done properly, gives guidance in real time and act when things get out of control. Inspiration is your teammate to help you make decisions in the most delicate issues. It has a positive impact on the attitude and confidence you approach every situation.

Just as a conductor brings different tools to provide a novel interpretation - so the inspiration focus all your ideas, thoughts and emotions all in one place, printing you a pulse of action. Inspiration is the creative inner force that directs your attention and thoughts to the best possible solutions, offers better alternative than the traditional problem solving approach.

Inspiration helped Columbus to quickly find a way to be the winner in this dispute, instigating all his rivals to believe in him. Inspiration dictated him to do what was necessary, and say what he had to say. Inspiration suddenly provided him in his consciousness the salvaging solution. Inspiration and will guide you towards effective communication with beneficial results.

Leadership is an unprecedented interpretation of the effects of a journey that should lead to your dependence on how you value yourself in the extremes of an unprecedented situation.

To effectively communicate your ideas to the people, especially to your opponents, and to change their beliefs, you need an inspiration of the moment, of that magical spark to enter their soul and to win their sympathy. If you cannot change people's thinking around, surprising him with a different point of view, you will never win them on your side.

Paraphrasing the writer Richard Cohen, being a leader is just like sitting on a rocking boat. You will eventually slip. You will start grabbing all sorts of things. You will fall. But there's always the challenge to stand up and try to continue.

Columbus understood the grave consequences that will arise if he doesn't prove his innocence, but he knew that he can control the situation. He answered the challenge that his opponents launched. The first thing he made was to think of whom he could change their opinions. And he succeeded. He found an innovating way to confront the cruel reality. Inspiration never left him because he was an open man, full of imagination, a cultivated and wise enough man.

Leadership: Is the whole image that you project through the power of the mind in full agreement with the image that you consume by multiplying the weight of your own decisions?

In my book, The master's touch" I mentioned the following thing: "As a leader, you must think of a strategy with the aid of which you can win people over on your side, to make them to follow you voluntarily, even if, at first, they lack confidence in you and they are suspicious." And the best strategy in this regard is to prove your skill in establishing, improving and maintaining relationships by using your inspiration and imagination, just like Columbus did.

As a leader, you must always seek new ways to make things work in your benefit and others, you must act promptly and efficiently, showing them that you are a man of future, meaning competent and intelligent.

Inspiration is that quality which can help the leader get out of the hardest situations, it is the one which comes from years of hard work and practice and, many times, it can prove to be the life buoy for one who is close to drowning.

And the character that makes a man worthy of being in the lead, based on the degree to which he approaches more or less the achievement of major goals is constantly remodeling after the following rule:

If there is at least one chance to be right about an information, it means that you are able to recognize the impact of an unexpected discovery on human relationships.

Intuition And Sharp Vision

On February 24, 2010

Control your thoughts, will and actions, placing them in an order which takes into account the impact it can have on your destiny.

Two exceptional leaders, cunning and capable, considered followers of progress were James Cook and Fernando Magellan. Travellers by destiny, by instinct, they both quarried, they both wandered, searched the world in a time when it had not yet been totally discovered. They both stood out hard, but forever, on the world stage. They both have shown, each in his own way that an idea, to have value and survive, must necessarily turn into action. But, at the same time, they both made the same fatal mistake, which decided their destiny, although they surely would have deserved a better fate, a longer life.

They both put their necks under the knife, in the true sense of the word. Confident in their capacity to succeed in everything they had planned, having made a multitude of successful expeditions, they went forward with enthusiasm to unknown islands, but without taking into consideration the threats coming from the natives. They were both killed savagely, one on the Sandwich Island and the other on the Mactan Island, each of them in lamentable fights with the natives, useless and disastrous fights they could have easily avoided.

Leadership: Are you the leader up to the end of the experience of living in a real-life environment augmented by the pressure of your own limits?

Their deaths, unforeseen and useless, clearly happened because of their lack of vision. Each of them neglected completely the most important characteristics of a leader: prudence and perspective vision. Magellan thought of the threat just as little as Cook did, and they both lost their lives in just as insignificant events. Both were killed by isolated indigenous peoples protesting against the inhuman acts to which their tribes had been subjected.

They had won over the elements of nature, they had gone through storms and they knew how to dominate people, but in the end, they were knocked down by a ridiculous "human bug" just when they least expected, immediately after they had fulfilled their objectives. Even though they were warned countless times not take on actions which, by their nature, would not be of major importance, the two leaders fell knowingly, like some suicides, into the face of death.

For those who do not possesses the will and whose pride always pushes him forward, without having any sharp vision on the various upcoming events, is not meant to reach the end of the race and enjoy everything the accomplished in his journey. Vision is crucial, and not just for setting objectives. It puts you on guard, prepares you for what lies ahead, identifying the mistakes which can prove to be fatal and keeping you away from them.

Being a true leader means seeing what is possible to happen within a limit of quantification of debt to the rationale of one's own deeds of power, representing the equivalent of the obligation to pay moral damages.

A true leader detects the problems before they occur. By adjusting, correcting and preventing the worsening of things, doing everything head on, he ensures that everything will stand out well. And people will follow and support him for the healthy reason contained by his ideas. Let's remember that the leader works as an example for those he leads. What he does, the people around him also try to do. His aims become their aims. His vision becomes their vision, as well. Wherever he goes, and they are moving, in the direction of the best or the wrong, to success or failure. Vision is an image or a concept of the future, which, surely lies at the basis of the leader's plans and actions and which inspires and motivates its followers.

Both Magellan and Cook, unfortunately, hadn't been prepared for what it laid ahead. They were more prepared for the action itself, but not for its consequences. Acting under the urge of the moment, trying to impose their own will, focusing all their powers only for reaching their personal aims, they had failed. They lacked intuition and vision, which should have warned them about consequences. If they had been open-minded, more calculated, if they had been able to clearly see the situation in which there were, their lives would have had a different outcome.

Leadership: Do you effectively manage the impetus to evolve in accepting a high-performance and high-profile commitment, taking into account the process of delimiting the effects of moral damage?

Intuition and sharp vision are the system which guides you in life, not letting you astray from the right path. At the same time, they are the key elements of leadership. Without them, you cannot lead. Without them you cannot achieve your goals. Without them, you cannot reach the end of your journey. Almost certainly, intuition and sharp vision are the only ones which can help you see what might happen in the near and distant future, ensuring a greater consistency in thinking and giving you more possessed your own decisions.

If you don't focus on the future, you won't be able to correct or to prevent the worsening of things and you will probably wander like a sleepwalker. And, as a leader, you cannot afford to "see with your feet" as walking in darkness or not knowing when to stop.

The impulse of taking action and to evolve in order to achieve specific objectives, will take you on a long road, which you won't go until the end if you lack the ability to see "the trees before the forest". You need a sharp vision in order to fulfill your goals.

Leadership is the impetus of magnification that you must restrict from pleasures or whims, ultimately small, which lead you to the extreme and to pain.

If you are put on great deeds, you must be ready to control your impulses too, to abstain yourself from acting eagerly and do something reckless, which could knock over your plans. Direct your attention to the future, identify all obstacles before they appear, overcome them with great care and finish the projects you devoted yourself to heart and soul.

Control your thoughts, will and actions, placing them in an order which takes into account the impact it can have on you. Be confident in your ability to succeed in everything you set out to do, without forcing the limits that you yourself have set.

As a preventative means against the leap towards the immeasurable, it is advisable to consume only dreams and visions that do not exceed the well-guarded perimeter of your maneuvering possibilities in the most unexpected circumstances.

Leadership means recognizing your limits when circumstances require you to be more than you are capable of being.

Perseverance

On December 22, 2008

Continue to stay true to your beliefs and ideas to penetrate beyond the limits that others impose on you.

As a poor boy that has no friends, no toys, but has the Aladdin's lamp, Fernando Magellan has a thought, a great thought that he wants to see it being achieved at any cost. He wants to launch forth into seeking the strait that connects the Atlantic Ocean with the Pacific Ocean, a strait that even the most experienced navigators, such as Vespucci, Columbus, Cortez, Cabot or Juan Diaz de Solis couldn't find. What were the odds for him to find it, a crippled man, no longer in his youth, as poor as a church mouse, a solitary man with no family, friends or a place of his own?

According to his calculations, for such a journey, he needed three large ships, an experienced and well-trained crew and, most importantly, enough bread for at least six months. But where could he find the support he needed in order to carry forward with his necessities, if not from king Manoel?

Leadership: Can you be superior to the one you were yesterday by exploring the area of encompassing a self-image that synchronizes with the ideal of representing the virtue of believing in yourself?

For almost two years, Magellan tried to get a sponsorship, but no door from the countless doors leading to the king's audience room was opened for him. How cruel pain can feel a man when he sees himself constantly being drawn away from his great dream. But not Magellan, since he was a stubborn and tenacious man. All these hurtful rejections, even pungent I would say that he had to face out, had armed his decision even more. A man like himself cannot control his heartbeats. Once he set his mind to accomplishing a goal, he tries his best to achieve it.

Thirsty for his passionate interest, Magellan finally manages to find a sponsor in the person of the famous ship owner Christopher de Haro, a rich man who considered the action commercially promising. Finally ! Finally, after two years of running about left and right, trying to get a sponsorship from one or other, the chance arose. After years of honest, serious and straggling fray, not being able to find anyone whom to discuss with his weird and intricate plans, finally there was someone offering to help. But the hard part was far from being over.

Leadership: Is the meaning that you give to your journey due to an open attitude towards an endless search?

In front of a massive mission, only a particularly persevering man can impose himself. Tasks, struggles, responsibilities, they all fell upon Magellan. So much trouble, so much pain and such a struggle with the officers and traders in those five months before his long awaited departure, so many sleepless nights, such an anxiety ! It's a true touchstone to deal with almost everything on your own just because you lack a reliable friend beside you. Anyone would have been in Magelan's place would certainly have abandoned his dreams.

On 20 September 1519, Magelan, once again controlling all goods and cargo, after he inspected the supplies, after he made sure that everything was ready that no sail, rope or screw was missing (this meticulous he was in order to succeed), Magellan piped away, and the fleet left the shore in search of the "el paso".

One year of endless searches followed. A year in which the crew rebelled against Magellan because of starvation, fatigue, and especially because the strait Magellan pretended to know the location of was nowhere to be found. But everybody bows down resignedly before a persevering man. Magellan succeeded in controlling his crew and, after having drifted for a long time, he finally succeeded in finding the strait.

Leadership: Do you stimulate your motivation to engage in the process of Brand activation in the midst of a triumph that produces an unavoidable consequence?

The brand is the source of a promise made in genuine form, which introduces an action to obtain an offer. The leader's brand is the way in which he is perceived and seen in the minds of those with whom he interacts, through the role and the actions he assumes in an unpredictable temporal horizon.

Magellan did not live to enjoy his success than a moment; since he was killed in an unhappy confrontation with the natives, on his road to home. But he proved that a man, no matter how poor, crippled or solitary, can achieve what the most famous and brave cannot achieve. He proved that a man can keep under his command an entire crew and any opposition. This is one true leader's fabric. If you are enough persistent and determined in your decisions and actions, you'll be able to reach any goal, no matter how impossible it seems to fulfill.

A leader made from a harder wood. He faced the cold, fatigue, hunger, and all unimaginable deprivation, rejection after rejection, years on end, but in spite all that, Magellan went further and further. Here's what it means to be persistent, this is what it means to commit enthusiastically to a noble goal and to get up from the anonymity of your existence.

In the face of all obstacles you can emerge triumphant if you are persistent and persevere with confidence in your steps. You cannot become a great leader if, filled with fear, you draw back from the storm waves. You can never reach your goals if you don't always go forward, if you're not always attached to the mission you've undertaken, if you don't follow up your ideas and if you don't have the courage to face any difficult situation.

Perseverance is what you promise to give to posterity in the struggle between yourself and the world around you, gaining your winning status through the epochal discovery at the end of a long journey that represents your name.

Conclusion: "Fight, search and never give up, but continue to be persevering" here's a motto for any leader who actually wants to achieve his goal. Continue to stay true to your beliefs and ideas to penetrate beyond the limits that others impose on you.

Power Of Persuasion

Communicate to people your point of view in such an effective manner so that they will be convinced of its justness.

At least for the gymnast Dan Millman, all his life was limited to those 20 seconds in front of the referees that could give him the gold. A very good score did not please him; he wanted by all means the first place. But his dream was still far from becoming reality. He was not ready for the big trial. Ten months ago, he got seriously injured. Doctors were skeptical about him, and if they have not seen in him strong evidence to indicate that he is strong enough to compete then, they would not allowed him to participate in Olympics.

His coach was also very skeptical. Nobody gave big chances to Millman. Not even he himself was not sure chance of his success, although dogged by nature, relapsed seriously into training.

Leadership: Do you feel that you can be above yourself in the circumstances of a sensible resemblance between the content of the experiences you have experienced and the profile of a pattern of reason that determines your will on the grounds of its occurrence?

The ability to establish relationships highlights all your qualities. If you watched the movie "The Peaceful Warrior (2006)" then surely you remember the story. In Millman's life everything was changed after he met a mysterious stranger named Socrates (represented by the actor Nick Nolte). They began to meet more often. Among them has formed a good friendship. Socrates taught and trained him daily the things which in turn he had learned from his own experience of life. And thus was able to change him.

With a subtlety worthy of a great psychologist, Socrates seized deep into the Millman's psyche, suggesting and the ways to avoid falling into that mental state of limitation. One of the most valuable advices that he gave to him is worthy of note:

"I want you to cease in believing what others say and start to believe in you. Throw out the thrash, Dan. The thrash is anything that stands between you and the only thing that matters, the present moment. You'll be amazed at what you can do and how well you can do if you focus on the present moment. Only if you really concentrate on this, you can change the future."

Leadership means to determine a great extension of the experiences that you experience by summing the value you bear for those inferior to you.

As to influence people, you must first have a common view with them. Can you, even for a moment, to play the role of Socrates? Can you convince at least a single person around you to make things of it is not sure that can do?

To influence people you must be able to "get" first into their thoughts, to guess what's really going on inside them, then to awaken in them a new awareness, to provide a new understanding of things. And finding a common point of view is the first link which facilitates your access to them.

Just as the power of emotion to a painting is primarily due to the artist's spiritual vibration transmitted to the viewer - so the power of conviction of a leader is due to his access to other people, demonstrating all his full availability and willingness to support them emotionally and psychologically and to capture them by his side.

Leadership: Will the content of your character serve a higher purpose, beyond the process of supporting some revelations that you become addicted to in the penetration of spiritual things?

People need to feel on themselves the truth you express. Socrates said to Millman that people are afraid of what it is inside them. This was the first step toward a deeper understanding of things. It was the midway point, brief, but necessary for transition to the real stage, the most important of Millman's life - the stage where he can grow again, in which he can recover his lost confidence and demonstrate a greater commitment to his purpose.

Ultimately, Millman has finally convinced of the depth of Socrates's wisdom, putting into practice all his tips. He learned to focus his attention on his own abilities, rather than listen to others around him who gave him not too much chance of success. And finally he won the gold.

Your effectiveness as a leader is influenced by your ability to impose to others your view in such an effective manner so that they will be convinced of its justness. If people do not feel on themselves the truth you convey, then sooner or later they will leave you.

In leadership, it matters how you see yourself both from the perspective of reviewing attitudes towards understanding the essence of a reality, an experience, a thought, a feeling, and accepting their terms. And from the perspective of the significance they attribute to learning and motivation experiences.

Conclusion: A good leader must possess that power of persuasion with which to establish a common view with the people that he leads and to convince them that they are actually the basis of the present changes for a better future.

Resonance

Skill of a leader becomes a mirror reflecting his relations with other people.

Since I ever first stepped in the master's workshop I have tried to be closer to him, to his philosophy, of his skillfully made works, hoping to find the most precious secrets of his art. He was the most spiritual man, the most educated as possible that I was ever given to know him.

For many years I stood near the master, during which, I put a lot of heart in what I did, and listening to his valuable guidance without which it would have been difficult to understand the art, I learned basic skills in technical drawing and painting, and I learned the most important values that have guided my life.

The really important thing is that, over time I adapted to the mentality of the master - I did not expect this. I realized later that I had many things in common with him in thought and feeling, talent, the passion and creativity, even if I was pushed by the great ambition to realize more beautiful paintings than him. We got to synchronize in thinking, in ideas, to harmonize even our views on what we intend to do - the topics we choose and to the color palette that we would apply, even in movements and in absolutely beautiful improvisation we had come to synchronize each other.

What can say ! I took almost everything from him –everything that lacked at me: the talent and the technique of work – I have not lacked for art attraction, but without those two ingredients I would not ever get to performance. I have got somehow emulated the style of his painting - still keeping an appreciable dose of originality. But somehow, what he did, I made instantly by myself - mixing colors in the same way, I sketched the drawing simultaneously with the same starting point on the canvas, while passing to the pencil drawing in the oil and finishing painting about the same time.

Leadership: Is the way in which you express your identity and ideals fully in line with the values of an experience transfer that guarantees an increased adaptability to the requirements of the greatness of being yourself?

Synergy arises when you connect with the right people.

Once you gain the trust of the people with whom you work also increases your enjoyment of being in charge and also your chances of success in achieving your intended purpose. Once they will take from you the guiding light, giving enormous power - qualities, concepts, beliefs, habits, respectively seeing your inner voice - will be motivated to work better, especially in your presence. They will have the feeling that they are free to express any feelings openly, free to express their talents, free to honestly and openly express their perceptions regarding certain things, free to express their pros and cons - being listened and encouraged. In this way they will always remain focused on main things, to those that really matter to you and for them.

The action of more people oriented in the same direction is called synergy. If you manage to connect with people personally, they will begin to synchronize with you in desires and aspirations; they will borrow from you and your attitude, your psychology, and will embrace your manner of working. They will get to be complementary with you - like those reflectors that synchronize so that when some left, others turn.

Leadership: Do you honor your obligation to be accessible by trusting the message of your own greatness from which you have to acknowledge the positive meaning of "limited training offers" as parts of a unitary whole?

A law of physics says: "For two bodies that are in the same state of motion perception of one over another is influenced by time." Great progresses of people occur especially in the leader's presence, in time, and only if they will be in full compliance with their goals and aspirations, only if they will share the sense of unity - taking a part of his personality. Perception of the leader as an effective individual, intelligent, with great practical qualities, with special spiritual virtues, facilitates the process of communicating with people, establishing that harmony so necessary in a team.

Only if you are like the people around you in as many aspects, only if you're always on the same wavelength with them you will enjoy the relationship you have with them. Therefore, as a leader, your job is to do everything possible to lend them some of your spirit and energy of your will, so that they will never be in disagreement with you or with your "work". Remember that to be successful in leadership you need to have in common with people the same way of seeing things and the same scale of values, what it is valuable and important for you and for them.

Leadership requires you to rise to a higher level in the consciousness of forming a unitary whole and to overcome your belonging to this whole.

Resonance is that quality of the leader resulting in the report with others. It means to be able to transmit your "vibrations" to your entire team, so that there is a synergy of actions and an effective collaboration. This resonance is the result of the leader's ability to intuit a special kind of working relationships within the team, of effective collaboration, etc. And this cunning of a leader is like a mirror reflecting his relationships with others.

Responsibility

On December 17, 2008

Permanently assess your potential depending on the nature of duties you have and by the consequences that you must assume.

When a man reaches a very high position inevitably gets caught in the crossroads of several responsibilities, obligations and pressures, and in case of a failure it is the first to give an account that has not prevented the appearance of it. Always a leader must take full responsibility for any decision and action he takes, for the way he does his duty, for the results he obtains, for any problems and any mistakes.

Leadership: Do you perceive yourself as a nucleus of the set of interactions between your representative profile and the version of an operating error when you continue to evolve to your greatest potential?

Imagine for a moment that you are the captain of a cruise ship and you find yourself in a sea voyage. You're on deck and admire the view. It is quiet - a nice quiet, full of intimacy. And suddenly, in the silence you hear this noise, caused by collision with an iceberg. You feel like everything is shaking around you and you barely manage to catch the railing. All passengers are hustling, trampling to find a lifeline or to occupy a place in one of the lifeboats. As you have no time to lose, you order them to descend all the other sailors and boats to help all passengers to board.

But you're the last to leave ship. And you know that most of your debt is to make absolutely sure that all passengers are safe. Therefore, we need to hurry to check each car part to convince you that there are no somehow misled or injured passengers. You are sure that the ship could sink at any moment and that you could not escape alive, however you assume the risk. You got no choice. You know very well that if one passenger dies, only you are guilty of this tragedy. You and only you are solely responsible for what happens to the crew that you had been chosen to lead.

Leaders do not ever give back to the difficulties, yet more, they say that it is precisely in these difficult moments they act with more interest. They know what to do in emergency situations, know what risks are exposed, but intervene promptly and effectively when it comes to human lives. You're one of them?

Leadership: Does taking control imply accepting the idea that what you are and what you can become is the result of accepting a reality that you can come face to face to but cannot escape from?

You choose to be: Captain or passenger?

It is always fascinating to hear telling about a man that, although it is placed in an extremely complicated situation, he is acting with very much aplomb and confidence to deal it. Such a man finds enough energy when it comes to show interest in someone who needed it. Furthermore, his positive attitude passes on to others the courage to act in the same spirit with him to solve problems. He is captain, the only able to move things, the only one who knows the best what to do in emergency situations and who seek to better meet the obligations posed by its major role, and the only one who has the moral strength to assume the responsibility in case of disaster.

On the other hand, being a passenger is much easier. Why? For that passengers must not assume any responsibility. In fact, their only concern is to have more fun with friends, while the captain shall ensure every moment, with a keen eye on their safety. Furthermore, the passengers are not obliged to take quick and difficult decisions, are not forced to stay awake each night, are not obliged to assume responsibility for any failure to fulfill their duties.

Leadership: Is the ability to evaluate yourself in a rescuer's image directly or inversely proportional to how you prepare yourself to remove the momentum you have from various events?

Why does not anyone become the captain of a ship? Because not everyone has the courage to take responsibility in front of a possible failure. Because not everyone is able to face out the arduous tasks accrue to them. Because not everyone has the leadership skill. The lack of accountability is the reality that many refuse to see it.

Perhaps you have developed suitable leadership skills for the position you occupy, but if you're not sufficiently motivated to act with greater intent to benefit others in difficult situations, or if you are above all selfish and self-centered, then you cannot establish relationships with others and will never know the success.

Just as a painter proves able to use brightly the difficult themes of colours, and to recompose in his drawings the world viewed via colour way - so you have to prove yourself able to better play the role that you exercise, to respect the commitments you have assumed when you were appointed in the leading position, to impose for yourself some rules from which you will not ever deviate, and to blend all your principles, values and criteria that guide you to give a better yield in the activities that you carry out.

The ability of a leader to properly assess him is vital, is his greatest strength. Therefore, be objective. Look better within yourself; see if you are right for the respective job and if you get up in the real professionals. Permanently assess your potential depending on the nature of the duties you have and by the consequences that you must assume, to see if you are worthy to rise to the challenges imposed by the position you occupy.

Being a good ship captain means gathering the necessary points for a triumph that marked the ascendant route of the entire crew during the storm.

Spiritual Greatness

On December 23, 2010

Learn to observe and intelligently modify people's perceptions so that they can overcome more easily the difficult times of their lives.

It followed an almost complete moment of silence, interrupted only by the background noise of the helicopter and its sharp vibration. They looked at each other, between them floating a deep sense of empathy. The wounded soldier, freshly released from the Vietnamese camp, tried to communicate his impression to Colonel Cal Rhodes and tell him a kind and maybe sincere word:

- I'm very glad to see you... Your son, Frank, got very ill. I tried to help him...but...he died.

Upon hearing the crushing news, which he didn't want to believe possible, Colonel Cal Rhodes was seized from top to bottom by a tremor of pain. His grief was so great that it burned into his soul like a hot iron.

Leadership: Does your life experience coincide with the experience of turning the clock of hardship "forward" or "back"?

The soldier looked intensely into the Colonel's eyes, with a look that dispersed a deep emotion. He sadly nodded approbation. His eyes, filled with an overwhelming innocence, seemed to ask for mercy and forgiveness. Then, gathering all his courage and all the power of his heart, he told him with that immense sadness which he kept deep inside his heart:

- Your son saved my life that day... he saved my life...

Cal Rhodes seemed to have wanted to say something, but there was no point. He left his thought unfinished, unable to express his deep emotions of disappointment and suffering. The feeling of desolation suddenly invaded him. His entire world seemed to have crashed. He felt as if nothing made sense anymore. He burst into tears. He felt like a man who got out from a fairy-like illuminated room and suddenly found himself in a total darkness, from which he could not escape.

The importance of the magnificence of a memorable moment lies in the experience of being involved in it, not in the end result that it can guarantee.

Someone once said that weakness and strength always go hand in hand – The weakness of the lost vitality and the strength of the lost power. And what makes a man strong is his power to go further, choosing other goals and ideals in life that will turn the balance in his favor.

The end of the movie "Uncommon Valor" (1983) is particularly touching.

On the airport, when returning in the country, all the soldiers from the Laos camp were expected and embraced with great joy and tears in their eyes by their relatives. Cal Rhodes was expected only by his wife. She pressed his hands to her breast and kissed him fondly. She was glad to see him again and proud of him being able to save at least those prisoners, and if their son wouldn't have fallen sick and died long before the rescue mission was initiated, perhaps he also would have been saved.

And her joy did wonders – she changed the Colonel's mood. Suddenly, all those strong and harmful emotions that he felt with all his heart and conscience – shock, anger and sadness – disappeared. They hugged with much love, kindness and joy in front of everybody. Their life was starting again, receiving a new meaning.

Helen Rhodes knew how to change intelligently the perception of her husband so as to overcome more easily that difficult moment in his life. She proved a high spiritual greatness.

The quality of your leadership is closely related to the mood you transmit to other people, even when you feel discouraged.

Someone who is in a difficult situation feels good only if a great man is by his side. Pure joy can rise only when his state of mind are in harmony with the other person's mood. Helen managed to change his husband mood because she had a great power of influence on him.

Sadness and bitterness can be overcome only if you have the certainty that someone, an honest person, full of hope and trust, can give joy back to you that special joy that comes from somewhere deep inside and makes it last. Nothing helps more in changing your mood that the certainty that somebody loves you. The innate optimism cannot deny a real suffering. Only a person with a great power to influence can remove your negative emotions, an empathetic person who truly understands your feelings.

To assume the decision to move forward involves strongly turning the key of your existential circumstances towards the past as if having the feeling that you are breaking the key.

Spiritual greatness has an overwhelming importance in human life, and therefore I didn't want to miss the opportunity to talk about this quality. As the spiritual greatness is the key element behind a character and a good and beautiful soul. It shows that overall vivacity of people – their inner need to manifest their emotions, to perceive those of others and then to change them. It's the definite proof that, deep within your soul, there is that huge grain of humanity, that spark that makes you different from other people and that makes you radiate pure hope and joy around you.

Just as ether fills the space between Heaven and Earth - so the spiritual greatness of the leader fills the gap between people's sadness and happiness, providing continuity in their lives. The corner stone of a leader's success is undoubtedly the most brilliant of his qualities: the spiritual greatness.

Conclusion: Spiritual greatness is the power that must always accompany you, especially in those situations, when you feel that everything is lost. It is the power of the soul that gives momentum to take the life from the beginning whenever you fall into the gap of despair.

A strong and tenacious character can overcome all alone critical situations, but the existence of a soul with him to support him and trust him, is that will propel and determine him to continue easier his way in the world.

Spiritual Sensitivity

On April 09, 2011

Look at the people with the eyes of your soul for your influence to be positive.

A wealthy merchant, but with a poor soul. That was the multimillionaire Edward Lewis, whose only concern was to make high-level business - to buy properties in bankruptcy and then to sell them at a much higher price. Very clever, refined, knowledgeable of the latest market trends, fully familiar with the intricate subtleties of the law and, above all, fond of power. But the situation was troubling his soul.

Although his business kept getting better, he seemed to sink more and more in sadness. But, arrived to Hollywood, he encounters Vivian Ward, a prostitute who still was different from all others of her kidney. She was very cute and had a great soul. For this reason, he hired her as a lady companion. The best decision of his life.

If you watched the movie "Pretty Woman" then you know the rest of the story. In that seven days they stand together, Vivian manages to instill in the Edward's soul a deep sense of calm and tranquility, prompting him to focus on the good aspects of his life, inoculating him that insatiable desire to love and to let be loved. From a cold man with no romantic manifestations, obsessed only of business and money, Edward Lewis is changing into another character, a sort of modern Prince Charming.

Leadership: Can you put an end to the conflict between what is seen and what is hidden, starting with the change of view that you address to yourself beyond the consciousness that conjugates the verb "the feel"?

What was the core generator of the Edward Lewis change?

Vivian marked Edward's career path, impelling him to resume his life, to believe again in love and to fight to maintain it. As a true lady, she knew how to enforce his feelings to the point that he did not have other way than to be fully devoted to her. So she illumined his way to understanding the true purpose of life, permanently removing him from the harmful effects caused by his profitable business, but unrighteous. He opened a new file in his life, clean, fairy, which has improved his state of mind.

The change occurred when Edward stopped to see people with the eyes that he saw the surrounding things. Vivian entered the scene of his life and offered quality to his transformation determining him to see people with the eyes of his soul.

Leadership: Does the image that you project in the world reconcile with the soul you place in the midst of the importance of your own examination?

Your state of mind expresses the way you behave and see the others. The way you see people, the way you perceive them determines your success or your failure in leadership. Look at the people with the eyes of your soul for your influence to be positive. But how do you deal with yourself in front of everybody?

Leadership primarily involves your relationship with others. And if your image is not in harmony with your soul, you will not ever be able to approach people. They will feel your coldness and will become more reluctant about you. They would categorize you as an insensitive man, unaware of their needs and problems, and will follow you without joy, or worse, will leave you.

The image that you associate with the idea of the soul, not only does not alienate one another, but on the contrary, they constantly lend each other a hand to rely on each other in a continuous synergy. They are like two flowers that, in order to create value, must preserve their precious essence not in an impenetrable mystery, but in a charming, often subtle way. As on the outside, so within.

To distinguish the image created by reason from the image created by the soul, we have the right to say that it is of great significance for the process of remembrance of the personality facet that you present and which you master best. The duality of the two images is not, in any case, a merit of the consciousness of opening up to the world, because the way they intertwine and feed each other depends on the force of your intention to enter the game of maturity and attraction.

Leadership is the self-image you suggest to the need to feel the eternal comfort of a sweet gratitude.

Spiritual sensitivity is the key to a better communication with others, but primarily towards a better understanding of privacy. It marks your positive attitude in life, determines you to seek and to focus on what it is right and not on what it is wrong. Also, it indicates that you are a wonderful person with a rich spiritual life. Who would not follow such a person?

People will never feel connected to you if you lack the spiritual sensitivity. To establish relationships with others you must have a certain presence and a dignity worthy of attention and a role model - that of a great man with high moral values and with a great soul.

Can you turn yourself in such a person?

Conclusion: Often people are evaluated not only with the mind, but also with the soul. A leader who looks at the people and with the "eyes of the soul" with certainty will have a positive influence on them.

Spontaneity

On May 19, 2010

Increase your capacity for decision and action, for your leadership to gain more ground.

Only a man endowed with leadership skills, led by a powerful will which animates a well-planned strategy can consolidate his success by imposing his supremacy in front of his enemies. Only a man with a tremendous self-confidence, who has the courage to probing the unknown and to soar into the unforeseen dangers, can become invincible.

Such a man, never defeated by fatigue, never overwhelmed by fear, and who never give up to his beliefs, is ready to make any sacrifices in order to reach his goal. The importance of the stake animates him so hardly that he would be able to respond to any challenges, to take any risks with an uncommon tenacity. But what really characterizes such a man driven by a strong desire for success, almost pathological, is the fact that he acts quickly when he gets the opportunity to propel in a high position.

Leadership: Do you expect someone to validate your value without generating the feeling you expect to have after you reach your goals?

The power is gained at night.

Immediately after king Tutankhamen died, falling on the stairs, a messenger riding a horse left the palace, took the road to North, to Akhmim, galloping tantivy, in order to inform Ay of what happened. The simple title of vizier never satisfied old Ay, this ruthless heart, hungry for power, which is believed to have killed the king Semekhere and that would have kidnapped the queen Meritaton. So as soon as he received the news, through a sudden intuition, Ay, an active and ambitious character all the way, sent for three horses from the stables, the fastest and most resistive horses, then, without hesitating, he fearlessly rode his horse for ten hours, during night, with no moon, and went to the late king's palace.

Ay had to get there with all costs before his rival, general Horemheb that was a true fighter and strategist, with an extraordinary fortitude and an extremely pronounced sense of duty. More than surely, Horemheb, very likely that he was immediately notified of the death of King, would have commanded his troops, once he got to Thebes, to prevent Ay to enter the city.

But, although he was almost 60 years old, Ay, a former commander of the fight chariots, hadn't forgotten anything from the riding trainings. Thus, at dawn, he got to the palace in Thebes. The purpose of his visit was clear: to prepare to succeed Tutankhamen.

Leadership: Do you validate what you are prepared to sacrifice at a certain moment, focusing solely on the idea that you will make an enormous and significant leap across the steep descent of the road to fulfilling the chance of visibility in world history?

But not even now Ay cannot wait any longer. Every minute counted. He had to remove Horemheb from the royal council at any cost, in order to take away from him any power of decision. Thus, using his craftiness, acting like a complete actor, he succeeds in quickly winning over the queen Ankhensepamon on his side since she got the power after her husband died, by making her to believe that the great danger threatening the kingdom is coming from Horemheb, who yearned for the crown and if they get it would destroy the dynastic succession order.

Ankhensepamon, sensing that general Horemheb would have never bother to take her as his wife, as he was a part of the royal family, quickly summons the royal council, where, with the agreement of the other members, she names Ay as regent – for the best interest of the kingdom. The scribe drafts the document, and then he enforces it with the royal seal and the seals of the council members.

Leadership: Can you highlight the experience of being unique by using a dose of the unexpected placed in an area of maximum visibility of the obtained results?

In 24 hours, the world changed its axis. The same day at noon, general Horemheb made his entrance. Escorted by four officers, he steadily entered the Great Hall, generating wonder and fear in the clerks. Of course, he didn't know anything about the meeting which had finished a few hours earlier. And he, like Ay, immediately asked to meet the royal council, which he was a part of, to be summoned.

But alas ! He is notified that the meeting has already ended and that he is no longer member of the council. The council had decided, with the agreement of all its members, the immediate appointment of his Highness, Ay, as regent of the kingdom.

So, how is that possible? the general wondered to himself, whom he could not believe what happened. Overnight everything crashes. Only then, at that moment of great importance, when everything was lost, he remembered the piece of advice hie counselor one gave him a long time ago: the power is conquered by night. His rival's nigh time chase proved to be faster than his.

Being spontaneous means going over that steep mountain that everyone else underestimates. Being spontaneous is to quickly take the best decisions to your advantage and act quickly to ensure your success.

Ay succeeded in lifting all the barriers possible in order to cut his rival's path, not because he was wiser or braver than him, but because he judged the situation very quickly, turning it on all sides, and acted immediately to ensure his success. One of the fundamental characteristics of complete leaders is the quickness with which they act adequately when the situation asks for it, without lingering, without wasting any second.

Although he was at a smaller distance from the kingdom than Ay, general Horemheb lost the greatest opportunity of his life because instead of gathering all his forces and quickly acting, he lost himself in all sorts of schemes and maneuvers for the next day. The lack of spontaneity, the slowness of his actions was the cause of his failure.

A complete leader, motivated by his aspirations, driven by an enormous hunger to achieve their goals, always proves, in any kinds of circumstances, a quick ability of analysis, synthesis and for a quick response. One who lacks these qualities cannot prove strength and wisdom, but weakness, indecision and hesitation.

Spontaneity is meant to create the conditions for the full utilization of your receptivity potential to the demands formulated by a single chance of finding your greatness in a single passing day.

The one who is not driven to jump as may times as necessary in the vortex of the most difficult tasks, the one who is not consumed by an unmeasured will to do everything in his powers to reach his aims, does not have the qualities of a leader and will never be a winner. The experience of being unique during an unexpected action is tied more to the active, enterprising, adventurous, vivid, fast-moving characters that make quick decisions and seek to turn them immediately into deeds.

A leader who wastes too much time with preparing maneuvers, instead of being spontaneous and knowing how to surprise, may lose a battle. If he doesn't act quickly when he has a favorable occasion, he will be defeated by someone else, more ambitious and faster. Who is not fast enough to push the power button, emboldening himself, surprisingly bursts with a crazy impetus upon the desired target.

For a leader, spontaneity and promptness of action are essential in order not to fall from the race and not to be outdone by others, maybe less better, but faster than he is, who know how to take advantage of every opportunity in order to assert themselves.

But one must also take into account the fact that whoever acts without a previous careful and competent analysis of risks may also fail.

In leadership, everything depends on how your image is related to a victory designed to achieve a tactical objective as part of a long-term vision that really affects history in a practical and concrete way.

How you respond to the challenges that can place you in a situation of vulnerability, starting from the gravity of the circumstances and the moment you are in, can make you a hero, an impenetrable character, or, conversely, an unscrupulous opportunist who violates any humanity and justice.

Desire For Self-Improvement

You cannot mobilize the energies of other people and to arouse an intense passion for their work, if you yourself are not driven by the desire to achieve increasingly better results.

No veritable artist can live without creating. A single glance at the face of a man, either a child or an adult, can hold out for him the inspiration he needs in order to design a new painting. A mysterious force lies inside him, a creative power that never dies. For, he is never satisfied with less, with his accomplishments up to the present time, but he ardently struggles to improve himself and create something unprecedented. He struggles to exceed himself, to get better and better, so that he would stretch his own limits. His will to accomplish prodigy is so powerful that he threw himself at work with great passion, each time with more intensity, with that indescribable joy that only people inspired by the desire to achieve the impossible know it.

A true artist is always giving himself up to the deluge of the heart, that life-giving deluge. From every walk he takes, he returns with a theme he hastens to draw on paper. He is attracted by the beauty of things, in general. The flickering of fluttering leaves, chequered shades, the light, the swings of an unbalanced bicycle wheel, a drop of dew on a rose petal, a necklace around a neck, the delicate flight of a butterfly, the sadness of a statue, the shape of a wooden bench. Downright, the artist aches for quality and diversity.

He marks, with a magical velocity, all the ideas as they appear, one after another, no matter how resembling they might seem. But he later tries to find them another meaning. A completely different, unique, unimaginable meaning. Like, for example, a blend between stones and flowers. Or between sky and birds. Or between a human face and the ferocity of a wild creature. Delirious with his creation, he always tries to give things a personal complexion, to convey a message in every painting. A message that means something else every time and touches the blind side of the viewer.

Leadership: Do you value that part of art that exists in the process of artistic creation, by virtue of an interpretation of the essential moments that have marked the deepening of one's own vocation?

A true artist keeps on self-improving. He knows that the only way to rise above the others is to keep on refining himself. To push his talent even further. To gain more "brightness", more power, more confidence in his potential. That's why he never loses the audacity of trying new things, to see the world from another perspective. Ideas rush from everywhere.

New shapes blend, new colors interpenetrate. He discovers new techniques. The mysterious joy that lies inside him, to create, to find a new and special exposition to his ideas, nourishes his passion and provokes him to push his limits. He never stops from searching. Driven by that inner hope for ideal, specific to all masters, he daily puts his hand on brush and paints. Sometimes without cessation. Hours on end. For his inspiration emerges only when working.

What makes a leader to be exceptional is that huge desire, such as that of an artist, of the self-improvement, to always be better. A leader would never succeed in maintaining his position if he doesn't struggle with a lot of sacrifice, if he doesn't try, day after day, to progress and improve himself. For, who does not try to be more involved in achieving the goals of his career, into his personal and professional development, the one who doesn't always struggle to become even more creative, efficacious and useful in his actions, will be tempted to give up.

Leadership means going beyond the limits of acceptable contour values, generating a concept of exploiting the accumulation of artistic expressions.

Nowadays, the one who aims to obtain great results simply can't afford to remain on a low level of performance. And he who aims to lead by the book must straight away prove he's a far better professional than all those whom they lead.

The contour values of your own importance, such as performance, principality, critical thinking, and ethics, are given by the way you present yourself to others and by what language you use – an artistic, creative language that emphasizes human emotion and cultural expression. The definition of the artistic expression can be extracted from the dictionary: it is the synthetic unit of the external manifestation of thought and feelings through words, gestures, colors, lines, sounds.

Companies need leaders who are willing to overcome their own limits. Therefore, a leader who aims to determine his subordinates to get better and better results in order for the company to bloom, must be driven by the desire of obtaining bigger and bigger performances. And, because he represents a role model for the rest, he mustn't be half bad in his attempts. In the conventions he turns to account, the rules he establishes, the decisions he resolves, the choices he makes.

Leadership: Do you raise your personal example to the rank of virtue which consists of the power and the courage to endure the permanent connection with "Everything You Are" in the midst of a creative experience approved under the reference value?

How could a leader to mobilize the energies of other people and to excite an intense passion for their work if he doesn't get himself driven by the desire to score better and better results? How could a leader incite, provoke, inspire and encourage people to improve themselves if he by himself, isn't very well prepared and very well aware with all the novelties of his domain?

Only through personal example, through the interest he manifests for his own person, his professionalism and his loyalty for the company or his employer, he will succeed to ascend in the hierarchy and maintain his position. So, first of all, a leader must educate himself in order to become what he claims to be: a very good professional. And a good professional knows that the only way to achieve high performances is to permanently evolve and self-overcome.

The reference value of a quality man is subtracted from the final value of the investment made in artistic representations that exceed the expectations of others.

The art you take in trying to make a masterpiece derives from interest in a passion whose intensity can give birth to a legend of perfection in a brand-new world.

Conclusion: Performance cannot be achieved without the desire of self-improvement. Performance can be gained only through work, creativity, perseverance and continuous improvement. It's essential for us to think it can be done and there's always place for more and to act to this effect. Self-complacency leads to stagnation and self-limitation that not only don't inure to anybody's benefit, but even at the expense of all.

The Ego's Penetration Force

On April 04, 2011

The more you know about people, the better you will be prepared to understand them.

In the book "Every patient tells a story", Lisa Sanders highlights a very important aspect. Namely, that in medicine often what seems to be is what is not and does not seem to be !

Crystal Lessing was barely twenty years old. She was sound as a bell all her life. But in the day when she went to the dental office to remove her wisdom tooth, included in the bone, fell ill. She was tired. She had pain. Fever. Her health deteriorates so much that had to be admitted to emergency in intensive care at the great academic medical center on Long Island. She was pasty-faced. She seemed very weak. Her heart beat faster and faster. She was breathing faster than normal, despite the oxygen that was pumped into her nose. Kidneys did not work.

But no one knew the true cause of disease. The doctors have seen her, and nursed her with great seriousness and attention. But it was not clear to them whether the mystery of her illness would be resolved in time to save her life. Her medical sheet was filled with numbers which proved how sick she was. There were many anomalies.

Leadership: Do you label the experience of being aware of people's behavioral manifestations as a way of thinking that allows you to look at yourself from the angle of a particular sensibility?

Dr. Steven Walerstein, Head of Pharmacology of the hospital was called by emergency. But he did something else than the all other doctors have done. He hasn't read the girl's medical records. As he did not want to be influenced by the thinking of those who already saw her. Too often, in these difficult cases something was passed or misinterpreted.

Instead, he went to the patient's bed and presented himself to her and her mother, and asked the girl to tell the whole story all over again. When first the pain has occurred, what she exactly felt and in what place, etc. He had to put things together alone. After the reported events, doctor allowed himself to look into her record. He had to find an answer otherwise the girl would have died within days.

Walerstein stopped a moment to seek in her medical record a kind of thickly print in the chaos of figures and analysis. And then have noticed that the team that cared for the girl had not considered looking for a specific diagnostic analysis. This information was simply taken aside. He went immediately to the hospital library to check his intuition. Yes ! He was right. The girl suffered from Wilson's disease.

The tests for the respective disease were done again to the girl and indeed the results confirmed the Walerstein's suspicion. She was immediately transferred by helicopter to New York; finally she received an organ and survived.

Leadership: Are you looking to get into the minds of people to decipher their emotional states even when you are not prepared to understand the limits to which the consequences of your own observational errors occur?

If you want to know how works the leadership, then you need to know how "are working" people, what are their emotional states: their experiences, their attitudes, feelings and their thoughts. Just as a doctor thoroughly examines the patient's problem to make a correct diagnosis - so you must study the behavior and attitudes of the people, and analyze what happens in their mind and soul that you can anchor them to your side. You must prove that subtlety in the observation that penetration force of the human ego.

You show a growing interest for what feel people around you? Leadership failure is due to a multitude of false steps accumulated over time and lack of safety in the establishment of an objective and fair "diagnostic". Learn to take into account and other aspects than the ones you usually see, and especially, learn to listen to them.

The more you know about people, the better you will be prepared to understand them.

Leadership: Are you trying to get the whole story of a man at risk of establishing a diagnosis of involution that contrasts with the evolution of your own consciousness?

People are not all equally. Each is a distinct personality, a particularly "ego". You cannot just look at them and understand. To be able to influence them you need to listen to their "story" - and to try to infer what they can get excited, what motivates them, what are their aspirations and their failures, to understand how work their minds, which is the fuel that puts in motion the engine of their state of mind. And to make them understand how they can fully participate in their own "healing" following the steps you indicate.

Just as a physician must have a sound base of knowledge and a large enough experience to know how to interpret what patients say - so you have to have that penetration force into the inner world of others, in the mysteries of their universe, in their ego, in their conscience and to intuit what goes wrong. You cannot increase their other's value if you do not understand their value system. Remember that good diagnoses lead to better targeted therapies, with great chances of cure.

As a leader you must know how to listen, not only to ask questions and get answers. Just as a doctor listens to the patient so they can put things together, and finally to establish the correct diagnosis - so you should listen to people, to put emphasis on patience in time, to give them much attention, and freedom to express their reasons for not "working" properly.

Leadership is the place for intuitive thinking in a context of accepting the truths that are hard to understand. It is to anticipate the consequences of your own reactions to the challenging experiences of life by interpreting and appreciating the attentive attitude of other people.

Conclusion: A great leader must hold the art of listening to what people say. Knowing how to interpret objectively and impartially what you listen, giving you the opportunity to penetrate the depths of the ego, and learning the most about these egos you will be ready to understand them and will be able to act effectively.

Emotional Force

Activate those inner forces through which to find the right path to the people's hearts.

Rick and Evelyn reached the oasis in the Ahm Shere desert, near the temple of Abu Simbel. They had to find their son at any cost and rescue him from the hands of the high priest Imhotep and his faithful servants. Only two of them, together with Jonathan and Ardeth Bay – the chieftain of a group of desert warriors, would have had almost no chances against the dozens of soldiers serving Imhotep.

Rightly thinking that they were fighting against more than one hundred well-armed men, knowing that the chances of victory were not on their side, Rick slowly got closer to his wife Evelyn. A good man, a warmhearted man, an adventurous explorer dedicated to his job, was then in her face, but pretty hopeless for the first time. Aware that Evelyn, already tired by the terrible emotions she had gone through, had fear in her heart, talked to her with a great warmth of heart, calmly, with a voice full of dignity, but in pain.

All fears and concerns had got ahold of their souls, sensing the danger just like before a terrible storm. Rick hesitated a little, as if it were hard for him to tell her that it could be their last moment together. Instead of telling her directly how much he loves her, how much she meant for him, how passionately he adored her, he gave her some last pieces of advice about how to shoot with the rifle, as he knew her free and assured character.

Leadership: Do you imagine the reality you are building through a message that invites you to verify a state of mind in which the unique essences of inner worlds intertwine?

Evelyn nodded approvingly at Rick's pieces of advice. With her eyes focused on him, she listened open-hearted the warm and emotional words coming from his lips. She felt a thrill pierce. A thought of hope burst for a moment in her soul. The power of this thought had accentuated so hardly that she almost cried. Rick kissed her tenderly, a kiss that almost meant "Goodbye ", and then, without a word, he disappeared in the oasis.

This entire moment turned into an inside force for Evelyn. With a tight heart, but deeply moved by her husband's gesture, she took the gun firmly in her hand and, driven by the impetus of the women seeking the true happiness in the man she loved, she prepared for battle.

If you watched the movie "The Mummy Returns (2001)", you surely remember that Evelyn fought bravely, risking her life, succeeding in saving her son and husband.

The great power of a leader radiates from his being when the reality he experiences and expresses highlights the form in which he is revealed as a content of affection.

For the first time, the great power radiating from Rick's being got revealed – a power that shook seduced and dominated souls. For the first time, it manifested in himself the magical force that could mobilize somebody to be more ambitious. Who knows, if Rick hadn't taken Evelyn's interior pulse and hadn't lifted Evelyn's level of adrenaline, inciting that inner fierceness specific to a fearless warrior who fought to the death, maybe she would have become hopeless and wouldn't have given proof of that magnificent courage.

A true leader transforms the lives of everyone who is around him, appealing more to emotion than to reason. In fact, this is what his great power consisted in. Everywhere, unceasing, the super-energy of his being awakens in other people an unsuspected tension, excessively intense, in the form of attraction. The souls, bound in his spell power, are suddenly overtaken by a terrible devotion, listening blindly to his will.

A life full of trials, through the lessons learned from the experience of fascinating happenings, is the magical story in which two lives separated in time, but united in spirit intertwine.

It may be that people whom you lead to go through times of fear or doubt and, not having a tough interior, to decrease their interest for obtaining performances. It may also be possible to lose all their impetus and, instead of succeeding, to fail. In such moments, when their situation gets harder, your job, as a leader, is to give them strength, to make them feel strong and confident. You must take their inner pulse and start that emotion in them, that strange feeling in their heart that reveals their true value, their entire potential. If you succeed in doing that, it means that you have a huge emotional force.

Trying to lead a group of people not animated by any kind of enthusiasm is just as taking over the command of a battalion that didn't get over physical training. In order for people to try and reach their potential and accomplish something visible you must stimulate their ambition, making use of their emotions and feelings, not just reason. People can't become hyperactive if you don't convey that energy to succeed and, especially, if you judge them superficially. Rick helped Evelyn to channel her impetus by his emotional force, not by the "bandwidth"of thought.

Leadership is presented as the pillar of resistance when you are animated by the ambition of constantly assuming the responsibility of being yourself in a world that reflects the values you believe in.

Conclusion: Great leaders have that art of getting into people's souls, establishing connections which underlie at the basis of their manipulation, with the aim of activating those inner mobilizing forces with the aid by which them can overcome the critical moments that sometimes occur.

P.S. The team's ability to get over obstacles depends on the leader's emotional force.

Lucidity And The Depth Of Reasoning

On March 04, 2011

Direct your leadership to virtue by showing you more concerned about the unseen side of human personality.

I mentioned in "Greatness of soul" that for a leader to enjoy the prestige and persistent appreciation of the people, he must have a big heart and involve himself with all his dedication and competence in meeting their expectations. But there is also a gray part in this situation.

The most important part of leadership it requires to know the people you lead, but especially to figure out the differences between them and their qualities. As a leader, you must own that power to capture the essential part of the people, their true natures, their characters – which is the column supporting the actions, ideas, skills and initiatives that they have. In this regard, the mind should serve to elucidate their true intentions and feelings, namely their true ability to adapt to your leadership.

Judging with great carefulness, wisdom and maturity all issues of concern to those around you in the light of your own values and perceptions about what is good and right, comparing their interests, aspirations, preferences and desires with your own principles and ideas, you will manage to achieve outstanding performances.

Leadership: Do you know to see with your mind's eye the truth beyond yourself, accepting it as an unseen part of who you really are?

Some time ago, I read an interesting thing about the romanian painter, Nicolae Grigorescu. Someone asked him how should be painted a portrait, and he answered first:

"Before beginning a portrait, look carefully, especially at the hands of the model. There are hands that don't resemble the figure. You can't do anything about it. There are hands who think, good, loving hands, which seem to caress the things they touch, but there are also wicked hands, which discontentedly perceive the world. I have seen very sad hands at an actor who only played comic roles. His hands couldn't lie... Everything has a more expressive side of it – the mystery of life lies within."

The leader has a hierarchy of values determined by a careful and objective thinking, which often constitutes one of his greatest strengths. To have a receptive mind, to know how to grasp the truth and to see the essence of the people, the way they think, whether they are or aren't affectionate and cooperative, trustworthy, and whether they agree with what you say and with your principles – this is what you need to give continuity to your leadership.

Give more depth to your reasoning in order to recognize the good people and cast off the wicked ones. Just as everything has a hidden side - so everyone has an unseen side – and there lies the mystery of their characters that you must discover, and then decide whether to accept it or not in your soul.

Leadership: Do you assume the experience of being aware of the depth of an invincible pain caused by the manifestation of the temptation you feel towards those you belong to?

I think that revealing for understanding the issues that I want to emphasize here is the story of Timon of Athens by William Shakespeare. You remember, of course that noble of Athens named Timon, whose generosity was unlimited. His endless wealth didn't even get to fill the coffers well, and he poured it much faster, giving it to all sorts of people, regardless of their status. His house was open to all sorts of people, and because of his open and wasteful nature, all hangers-on turned profit from him.

Finally, the reward was equal to the favors he granted. As he didn't foresee his misadventures and didn't avoid them because he didn't take heed to the warnings he received from his honest servant, Flavius, because he wasn't a wise man, who evaluated the facts because he didn't have an inquiring mind to capture the features of those around him, Timon wasted all his wealth, reached a desperate state, and people became indifferent to him.

I think the moral of the story is the following: the road from Paradise to Hell is paved with good intentions, but also with darkened minds. If you want your leadership to last in time, you must penetrate in people's minds and feelings and resist any temptations, pressures and influences on their part.

The quality of a rational man is achieved when you prepare your mind and soul to work together in favor of a world that does not even deserve the palm of an impulse to awaken it from drunkenness.

Lucidity and the depth of reasoning are qualities that give an added value to your leadership. To know how to see with your mind's eye, not only with your heart and soul, to seize the truth, the objective reality, to know how to see beyond appearances, to manage to decipher the mysteries of other's people character – all of them are the result of a very subtle and deep observation that you need to do.

A leader who obeys his heart, acting in the interest of others, on behalf of their feelings, thoughts and wishes, is covered with glory and full of praise. Consequently, being proud of himself, he will continue to show himself amiable to everyone. But there's also the reverse. Whoever proves to be excessively amiable to people's needs and does not hinder the urge to befriend them, will be perceived as a weak man. Proving to be too generous, he will become a victim.

Your leadership must denote a deep and healthy judgment. Be a profound observer of the human soul, identify people's moral qualities and see if they match your nature and principles.

Discernment is the sensation of alienation you feel about your own experiences when you manage to adopt those values that generate an expanded consciousness.

Are you enlivened by values such as principality, critical and ethical thinking, rational assumption of risks, or the courage to learn from your own experiences?

Conclusion: As a leader, you must have an objective thinking and show as much lucidity in evaluating people, both professionally, as well as in terms of their personality, aspirations, and especially it is useful to know the negative and hidden aspects of their nature.

These "hidden flaws" unknown or tolerated, will crumble, especially in critical situations, everything you built together with the rest of your work fellows, turning success into failure. Just as the story goes that you must choose the wheat from the cockle - so you, as a leader, must select your work fellows... by removing the "cockle".

The Unyielding Will To Overpower

On January 14, 2010

Whenever you lower your standards, you will become vulnerable, and whenever you will find another better than you, with a stronger will, you will lose.

The one who has a great purpose and has the courage to launch out into the foamy waves and uncertain of hardships and life-tests, the one who, inspired by a high-aimed dream, bars all his ways to retreat and pitches, to the utmost of his power, into the unknown and unforeseeable, the one who, reasoned by the taste of victory, is well-grounded to take the bull by the horns and fight to the last breath that one will succeed with all his attempts. What defines a successful leader is that he always succeeds, with much proficiency and implacability, to surmount all perils, challenges and sorrows.

Through time, only a handful of people succeeded in distinguishing themselves among others, accomplishing what seemed impossible to realize. Fernando Magellan proved, for all generations to come that an idea, if carried on the wings of genius, is revealed to be, eventually, stronger than each and every element of nature. Genghis Khan proved that a simple shepherd who doesn't know how to write and read can outbalance in military skills the armies of the greatest kingdoms and that, at the same time, he is able to initiate a body of laws for fifty nations. Asoka, the first great ruler of India, proved that men can gain far more mealy-mouthed than giving orders. And Napoleon Bonaparte enforced the idea that, the one who establishes high goals for himself and is led by noble ideals can overcome his humble condition. And the examples may continue.

People with a will and an extraordinary toughness are able to transform into reality what for many is just an illusion. Their actions often surpass all the expectations. More than likely, their most important quality which they manifest in any circumstances and at any time is the firm will to defeat in the face of any challenges to overcome any hindrance and to triumph. Full of energy, fearless and led by an iron will, they manage to cover the ground from failure to success.

Leadership: Are you afraid to imagine the future of your relationship with the option that lives in your heart and increase its beats through a remote view that captures the peak moment of your strength of character?

You must have an amazing perseverance and a fearless willingness in order to rush, as Magellan did, into an expedition in which the chances of success are very small. You got to have an astounding courage, when you rush in a battle and sometimes fight even in the front line, like Napoleon Bonaparte or Genghis Khan. The journey towards the achievement of the "impossible" is, indeed, very hard and spiny. It is crowded, at every step, with challenges and dangers, full of hard luck, flat denials, delay, heavy croppers and failure. That's why only few people rush into walking that road. Only the truly brave, with a strong will to achieve their goals, will be able to "mark".

The path to glory lies only before those who are convinced that they can achieve what no one else can, who have the courage to start on a journey where the fair chance of success is minimum. Those slightly ambitions or shuffling, who are afraid to jump into the unknown and to assume risks, shall not struggle along such a journey, full of dangers and sore trials, where there's either no return journey, or there is only one, that's very hard to find. The great aims can be attained only by those having a brave will for achieving the victory, by those energetic, courageous, unyielding and tenacious.

A whole army driven by one will, that of their leader, can accomplish the impossible. Revealing a firm will, volition in his actions and courage without limits, Hannibal scored crushing victories against the Roman armies. He always respected the oath he made to his father when he was nine: "I swear that I'll hate the Romans as long as I live".

Leadership: Is there any further processing of some authentic reasons for finding a way to trample the path of others, specifically designed to make your relationship with what becomes the final image easier necessary?

Hannibal knew, better than anyone, that lack of will is the biggest drawback for a true warrior. Only a tenacious leader, who knows no fear of anyone or anything and who possesses a strong patience, is able to encourage and embolden his warriors and win consecutive victories. he was a stupendous warrior, victorious in all his duels, used to initiate every attack. He used to always be the first of the equestrians and foot soldiers. He initiated the battle and returned last from the battlefield. No wonder that all Carthaginians worshiped him and his army's fame has spread worldwide.

A man with a strong will can only be defeated by another one with an even stronger will. Hannibal was a feared conqueror. He frightened Rome, which, for many years, was in a permanent state of shock. But, eventually, he was defeated by Scipio "the African" who had the strength to stand up against him and to fiercely oppose him. Just as Hannibal's only aim was to kneel down Rome, Scipio's only purpose was to defeat Hannibal. And, ever yet, when two great wills meet, just one gets to be the winner: the most unyielding and fearless, the most powerful one.

To measure your leadership, ask yourself if the balance between the requirements of the soul and the requirements of your level of motivation helps the final outcome of the struggle where the winner is your transition to a broken destiny.

Trust

Show people you are on their side and they will give you their trust.

On October 6, 1769, on the New Zealand shores was anchoring the famous captain James Cook. He had information that the natives of those parts are not exactly peaceful, but rather warriors and provocateurs. From the experience gained over the years, Cook knew that to avoid a conflict he had to turn the natives into very good friends, especially since he could not stay too long on that island and his crew badly needed supplies and rest.

Being aware that they must act quickly to avoid any instant attack, as stepping ashore Cook ordered to capture three natives, which he had made prisoners. But this captivity has proven to be a big celebration for them because they were served with many dishes and many gifts were made to them. After a few hours they have been "liberated". Seeing the gifts received by the three natives, the other natives hiding in the nearby forests give up their hostile attitude and agreed to consent with the Europeans".

In this way Captain Cook managed to avoid many incidents in his travels on the sea, and so explains why he remained in the memory of millions of people as one of the most skilled sailors in the world history.

Leadership: Does your triumph tend to increase its volume at every step in the sense of a concordance between your contribution to the shaping of your destiny and the idea of giving others access to the values of a new world?

Nothing is more important in leadership than your ability to understand human values and strengthen their trust in you. Identifying some things you have in common with them and achieving a better communication with them is the first condition to be met in order to establish relations of friendship and cooperation. If you want to be more influential, learn to develop and maintain healthy relationships with others, by giving as more credibility. To be trustworthy and fair in dealing with others is the most important characteristics of credibility.

People will trust only someone who will invest in their development. Captain Cook had no choice, but to win the trust of local people. How? Adopting a sociable and friendly attitude. Manifesting his intention to establish relations. Seeking a common ground for cooperation. By giving gifts, or items of the „new world" that they surely will love. His gesture of solidarity created among local people a variety of local pride. The easiest thing that you can build relationships is to awaken in people a sense of gratitude.

In order to establish connections you must focus on giving rather than receiving. If you are selfish you will not be able to create synergies, similarities and common points of interest to facilitate an effective collaboration. Remember, that just as on oil painting the light issues from colour - so in leadership, your influence issues from your ability to relate to others.

Leadership is the place where you end up when things are done as you like, assuming the whole image you transmit through a sense of gratitude.

Suspicion leads most people to stay away in a kind of unknown individuals who do not grow among them the sense of security and trust. The leader who makes too many plans for the future without taking into account the interests of others, risks to remain alone in time, isolated from the rest of the world. And therefore would not be called a leader.

The place to start is represented by the needs and wishes of people. Orient yourself to them, acting in their behalf to open the door of establishing and maintaining an effective link between you and them. Communicate to them that you want to offer something valuable for them to see that you care about them. To develop and maintain people's confidence in you, make them understand that you focus on what they want. If they do not realize that you're on their side, then they will not be willing to start a cooperation with you.

To realize your triumph is to understand what is happening to you from the point of view of your evolution, seeking the basis of an absolutely unique perspective on your situation at the forefront of a glory that everyone expects from you to reinvent. Leaders do not lie on the laurels of a glory that they have attained at some point but rather continue to evolve to their greatest potential.

Trust is the authority you give to yourself by virtue of a glory that does not mean wealth or power, but rather a test of ambition to surpass yourself.

Quid Pro Quo

On February 06, 2011

Go beyond the limits of your leadership, finding that thing that defines life in the most positive ways.

The movie "Leon - The Professional". Briefly, as I stated in the previous articles, the movie presents the remarkable relationship between a professional killer - Leon and Mathilda, a girl who remained orphan. Due to the time spent together, between them it was created a strong connection based on trust and honesty.

At one point, Mathilda, told to Leon with an indignant voice:

- Leon, we do not do anything than work. You should take a break. Let's play a game. A nice game.

The girl's words left Leon a little bit confused. It was a change that definitely he was not used with. A professional killer as him, in principle he cannot descend to such an entertainment. But since he cherished a lot Mathilda, he accepted.

Leadership: Can you surpass the limits of your profession by supporting the idea of a change of roles between what places value on you and what isolates you?

Their game consisted in an exchange of roles. It was easy to confuse Leon with John Wayne or Clint Eastwood. Inwardly, watching the performance of Leon, Mathilda said to herself: "It's hard to believe that this man is a killer, it's hard to believe he's so cruel." Indeed, Leon was so funny by playing his new role, was so delightful to be around him. Only Mathilda knew both sides of him and loved him anyway. He was a very dear friend. They talked, laughed and danced.

That game removed from Leon's mind, at least for a short time, his black thoughts, removed the sadness that he had in his heart and the bitter taste of loneliness and self-forgetfulness of his soul. So he ignored the thought that it said that a real professional, a real killer, should always be realistic and not get a bit of fantasy in his life. He surpassed for a while the limits of his profession, and this was a really uplifting thing for him, to the silence his soul, for his happiness.

Are you looking to discover in all that is limited those human proportions that do not suffocate life?

True science of leadership, which is not limited to increasing motivation, it means to discover in everything that seems limited those human proportions that do not suffocate life and do not vary depending on that true illusion of emptying oneself in which man lives.

These proportions are closely related to the dimension of your action on moral value judgments that lead to a healthy conduct with the size of the constraints that limit the number of alternatives of preventing frivolous deeds, discovering and resolving resentment of any form, an overuse of empathy and of the feeling of guilt that burden the mind and soul.

To survive and thrive in your organization, you must be a real professional. That means to dedicate wholeheartedly to your work, your career, and to not deviate from the rules that you impose by your own, or that are required.

What about your personal life? Joy, happiness of life, when will you find them? The respect to your own life, to yourself, toward your inner feelings that comprise your entire being and give you a positive feeling – will you ever really enjoy them?

Leadership: Are you in agreement with what you have to do, choosing the continuity of a formula to agree on the price you have to pay to endure a new understanding of life?

First of all, retrieve yourself. To get to live that feeling that "you are alive" which only the contact with the world can give you, you must return to that attitude full of warmth, full of spirit, full of calm, acceptance and full of joy.

At the beginning of the story "The Little Prince" the French writer Antoine de Saint-Exupery had made a statement: "All grown-ups were children first, but few remember it."

Somewhere in the mysterious depths of your heart, don't you feel sometimes that you'd like to play another role? One less tiring, and why not, even less realistic?

Smile. Have fun more often. Sure you need a break, a relaxing of the mind. Go beyond the limits of your leadership, finding that thing that defines life in the most positive ways.

Is your leadership assured by the element that should be the catalyst of change in a version of life that, even if it does not go on, looks as if it does?

Did you know that the thing that kills people infected with cholera bacteria (Vibrio cholerae) is dehydration? They regurgitate and defecate until dying. Only one thing keeps them enough in life that can eliminate that bacterium: a solution composed of water, salt and sugar. But fresh water is the primarily healing element.

The quality leadership can be considered a healing element, only if "revives" you, only if allows you to combine the activities of business with your personal life, only if permits you be a happy man from all points of view. Tranquility and peace of mind are the elements that can be subjected to a powerful catalyst called "strong personality", but not tormented by tensions and excesses.

As leader of only one thing can keep you enough happy and fulfilled: maintaining friendly relations with other people.

In the life as a leader you must always give something for something. Quid Pro Quo. You have to give a little from both of them: you must give proof of professionalism as well as empathy toward the others. Ability to adapt to the life of the others depends on how you express your own life.

Your happiness as a leader will be given by the quality of the relationships that you will establish with others.

The moral feelings that make it possible to appreciate the facts are the beginning of the image that your power of admissibility builds upon the actions of promoting the mentality responsible for the perception of inner trials and the behaviors they induce.

Conclusion: In leadership, in any position of responsibility, but also in ordinary cases, the work should be alternated with the periods of relaxation, with recreational hobbies and preferably with social activities. There are many examples of leaders who have excelled in other areas: for example: Bill Clinton was an excellent saxophone player; Vladimir Putin is a good pianist and a very good athlete, etc. For relaxation, has always been indicated active recreation where-through certain parts of the brain "are resting" while other areas that are left to stand idle for a long time are being enabled.

Quo Vadis

Strongly sustain your vision, without printing a rapid pace of development that prevents the proper orientation of human adaptation to the future.

There are only three big questions which people, from one generation to another, regardless of their social status, have put pretty often, and the answer to which is still unknown. Where do we come from? Why are we here? Where are we going to? From these three questions, the most important, the most widely circulated in the last period of time, is without doubt, Where are we going to?

However, I'm intrigued by another question: are we prepared to get to the place where we are being waited for?

Imagine for a moment that there would be only one man, endowed with a special vision, unique in its way, who would have the ability, mental power and the technology necessary to lead our steps and control our future. Would we follow his ideas and beliefs without hesitation? Would we accept from him to lead our destinies to progress, having the certainty that he is our only path to happiness? Alternatively, would we prevent him from fulfilling his vision, which overcomes the limits of current human imagination?

How useful are sometimes stories in finding answers. "The Clipper of the Clouds" by Jules Verne handles this subject in detail. The action takes place somewhere in the late 18th century. It is important to mention the fact that, at that time, the aerostats (hot-air-balloons) where the only means of air transportation.

Leadership: Do the steps of making your perspective of seeing things available to the people facilitate a division between what is necessary and what we are afraid of?

Robur, a 40 years-old engineer, who was not afraid of anyone or anything, succeeds in creating a perfect aircraft that defied the laws of mechanics, and that can fly around the world, passing through the layers of the atmosphere. Even so, such a revolutionary invention was considered impossible by the contracted minds of the scientists of those times, who proved to be disbelieving and even suspicious.

So, in order to prove everyone how far progress can go, that the future belongs only to flying machines, and that his aircraft is real and functional, Robur kidnapped two of the most influential people in America, Uncle Prudent and Phil Evans, the president and secretary of the Weldon Institute, took them aboard and went with them on a long journey.

Although the two of them were convinced during the few months of flight that the aircraft is real, much more stable than any balloon, much faster, much capacious, more comfortable, they still did not want to recognize the performances of this flying machine. Moreover, they insisted that the real flying machine is the balloon, and the future belongs only to it.

At the end of the story, Robur addressed before the citizens of the United States, who gathered in large numbers in order to assist at the inauguration of the newest balloon model Go Ahead, after he previously proved that his aircraft, the Albatross, is far more performing.

- Citizens of the United States, my experiment is finished; but my advice to those present is to be premature in nothing, not even in progress. It is evolution and not revolution that we should seek. In a word, we must not be before our time.... Nations are not yet fit for union. I go, then; and I take my secret with me. But it will not be lost to humanity. It will belong to you the day you are educated enough to profit by it and wise enough not to abuse it. Citizens of the United States, Good-bye !

Leadership is the quality of telling people what they want to hear so that they would all take the blame for not sharpening their understanding and thinking.

Can you impose people by force to accept your ideas, no matter how innovative they may be?

Robur's invention should have been glorious, a perfect triumph. It would have been the change that would have led people to progress and development. Unfortunately, no vision, even materialized, can be put to practice as long as the level of training and standard of the society does not accept it. Robur's vision, no matter how well argued had it been, by various ways, as it is real, was not accepted by the people with a level of knowledge inferior to his.

For this reason, in the end, he chooses to leave, taking with him the secret of his invention, without taking even one critical look behind, to the ungrateful people, being aware that he cannot make them to embrace the change, to understand things that they don't want to know, to explain them, even if they don't want to, a secret that they stubbornly refuse to have it revealed to them.

Science cannot go ahead the general level of training of the people, and Robur was basically a genius of engineering, a high spirit and, at the same time, pervasive, who dared to remove the veil of the present, he convinced himself of this great truth when he tried to support and argue his theory.

What a sad a role would he have played if he had tried to change the people's old way of thinking. He had insisted on supporting his points of view, keeping his illusions about people, that they will still be eager to understand science in many years from then on, technology – the certain reserve of the future; he would risk being considered a madman or, even worse, an impostor.

Leadership: Can you reach the highest beliefs and goals if the education level of those around is inferior to your level of knowledge?

When you know that there are people who don't agree with you, you cannot have success. It is useless to devote yourself to a calling which involves you totally, to the deepest levels of your being, in the actions that you carry on, the projects you develop and conduct, if those around you do not share your passion and prefer to live in a comfortable patience of time. First, it is necessary for people to have the power to change them, and to be able to choose a new perspective, to have the capacity to mobilize and look towards a new, wider, and a more ambitious horizon.

A large part of your work can be dedicated to trying to help people to evolve, to recognize the change. However, definitely, you will not have great chances of being accepted as their leader, even if you explain to them, even if you show them, and give them guidance, even if you reveal your grand vision to them, as long as their level of general knowledge is below your limit. Instead of your ideas rejoicing their hearts with happiness, they might get a feeling of repulsion and, instead of being admired for your laudable initiatives, for your noble intentions, you might be denigrated.

The gnoseological advancement of a man of the future belongs to the content of differing beliefs on how the world works, stored in a great cause for sometimes not worth fighting.

No leader, no matter how progressive and visionary he would be, no matter how many abilities he would have, cannot reach his objective if the level of training of those around him is inferior to his evolution level. If there is no wider general vision of those he leads and, of course, if he lacks individual motivations and a proper organizational climate, oriented towards progress, innovation and competition.

A leader who is not attentive to these aspects and easily sets an alert tone which prevents an adequate adaptation, will suffer a failure, in the best case, and, in extremis, could even be labeled as a madman.

Quo Vadis is the doubt that gives you a task that may prove to be a waste of time. It is the doubt that you finally reveal over your own reasons to believe things that are not necessary, but accidental. So, strongly sustain your vision, without printing a rapid pace of development that prevents the proper orientation of human adaptation to the future.

A scientist should develop the ability to see a change where human essence and truth of a new perspective merge and define each other.

Learn to move with the speed of the navigator in other production zones of science, finding the strength to integrate yourself in the acceptance without dust of "The Man of Time and Space."

My art did not always have a rectilinear development. It knew a period of slowdown due to the intransigent concepts of science, living in the face of the Lord's work, but blind to the soul, taking a truth value only in the interior of the parallelogram of forces of expression emerged atop the uppermost aspirations of performance under the virtue of creative impulses.

I sometimes considered myself defeated in this almost endless spin of scientific terms, played through artistic calculations based on message vectors. Tired, my mind was crossed by strong flows of ambiguous technical details carried in a dimensionless space in the great ocean of forgetfulness of self, in the dispelling of a soulless horizon. "You had your time, you had the power..."

Could someone engage in the strength and endurance test against the largest representative glimpse from the circuit travelled by current in space? Upon the genius, the traveler from the future to himself, to here and now, lays the ingrate task of soliciting an answer from time, that mumbles through the cogs of evolution, through meaningful events. The gigantic imaginative spirit sees itself forced to give real meaning to the disturbing real, to dependency of being connected to the challenges of life, bringing touch to its honor as a speeder. "So don't become some background noise / Who just don't know or just don't care."

With the extraordinary instinct of a scientist, Freddie Mercury, navigator of the skies, that revealing system locked into a perpetuum mobile, crossed by unsuspected energies, is no longer just a transporter to an alternate universe, but rather an existential state instantaneously substituted to the phenomenon of producing the seeds of a rebirth, of rediscovering oneself, through the reproductive organs of an extreme perfection. "We hardly need to use our ears / How music changes through the years."

Leadership: Can you gather all your forces and fling creation to the highest level of imagination, as to become a magnificent meaning between science, life and eternity?

Leadership best distinguishes itself from the highest levels of subjective knowledge, but sifts from the deepest levels of experience and objective understanding. He who has the power to integrate in the acceptance without dust of "The Man of Time and Space", to travel with the speed of the navigator in other zones of science production, but reflecting its brilliance in the important aspects of life: physically, emotionally, socially, spiritually, has all the chances of setting his purpose as a "superior" in the equation of eternity.

The music video Radio Ga Ga is brilliantly made. The leader, in terms of new art creators, represents an experiment whose outcome is that science echoes back to the whole universe, under the aegis of two entities: one of imagination and one "before sight."

The symbolic substratum of a fictitious work can be prepared by gently polishing distinct poetic views, overturning the fires of a sui generis world. More importantly, we now see that a fictional work of art illustrates only a single isolated event with symbolic representation in a field of a priori knowledge, a means of information present everywhere, to the extent that time and space are much more profound and the feeling of existence is immensely enlarged.

Just as naturalist Lamarck advanced the idea that a clear distinction must be made between organic and inorganic, causing a different configuration on what is called matter, Freddie Mercury, this fierce composer, a true mystery, this magnificent meaning between science, life and eternity, gathers all its forces and flings creation to the highest level of imagination. "Let's hope you never leave old friend / Like all good things on you we depend."

Leadership: You are able to vary from one world to another, allowing everything that does not really exist belong to a world accessible only to the one who witnessed directly to its creation and disappearance?

Open one eye and look through the sky of the window in front of you, into the world of top innovative experiences, devices and technical means that encompass the portrait of the postmodern man. You will observe the horizon that precedes a major intersection, at which turning left is prohibited, but leaves a spot of light to the right, a vision called Radio Ga Ga. "Radio, what's new?"

Always an energetic entity located between heaven and earth, due to an impulse of a certain width that would overthrow the whole system of beliefs of a world in the making, unitary through its reality revealed in the formula of agglomeration of mundane or complex details, can create a bridge over all borders.

Look around, forward and back, to the future and into the past. Seek that divine form of solidarity with humanity. It is in everything and everywhere. Immerse yourself in its brilliant brain, in the energy of the vital universal force distributed throughout the whole timescale, through all sound waves of a certain frequency, and you will feel the entire weight of a fragmented existence. "So stick around 'cause we might miss you / When we grow tired of all this visual."

To vary from one world to another is similar to listening to the radio from several different and distant locations: the information is the same and propagates as fast, but it cannot always be confirmed as true or false, but only as a key element of a suggestive composition that drives the mind to new destinations.

Radio Ga Ga symbolizes the means of communication that can accompany potential consumers of science to another level of authority, in which the experience of creation reaches a peak that no longer justifies effective presence, but rather distinguishes itself by the echo sparked worldwide through an impulse that overthrows any system of beliefs.

The Ray Of Light From The Kingdom Of Darkness

Reveal the positive side of your personality, by projecting your true values and views on others.

- It should crumble away, because only then will collapse faster that wicked regime ! openly uttered a Serbian representative at Geneva, regarding the prisoners from Russia for which the great explorer and diplomat Fridtjof Nansen carried out all the steps to release them. It was clear that the European diplomats hated the Russian system.

However, Nansen, in whose veins flew the blood of a winner and hero, was nobody's fool, and threw again his lance. He transmitted a message intended to go directly to the heart of these people who followed the policy of the "backstairs":

- Can we allow winter to stifle forever the voices of those millions who cry out for our help? There's time, but we do not have much time to lose ! ... In the name of humanity, in the name of all that is pure and holy, I appeal to you, who yourselves have wives and children at home - think what it means to see women and children die of starvation. From this place I appeal to the governments, to the people of Europe, to the whole world, for help ! Hurry up, before it's too late for repentance !

Even if he was constantly accused by a good part of the global press of being a Bolshevik, a spy sold to Russians, Nansen finally received the long desired help.

During 1920 and 1921, Nansen has brought back to their homes a half million of prisoners, and snatched from the clutches of hunger several millions of people from Russia; in 1922 has led the exchange of a million Greco-Turkish refugees; in 1923 has provided the transport for the Bulgarian deportees in Thracia, and then the return of the three hundred thousand scattered Armenians. *

Leadership: Leadership: Does the major impact of the perception of life, reflected on a certain form of activity that the Ego charges as a "compromise" solution, occupy a special place among the dimensions of your faith?

The specialists or just ordinary football fans have always asked this question in order to clarify the option pro or con. For which option do you plead? Think well. For if you tip the balance only in favor of the football on goals, you can be accused by anyone that you align to the front of those who, regardless of the game quality, even practicing the foul play, are following just the victory at any cost and by any means.

Exactly in this situation was put Nansen. His choice tipped the balance in the favor of needy people, in this way stirring protests, anger, from those who had other guidelines, other priorities and other mentalities concerning the Russian lawless system.

His faith was not limited by the negative influence on the perception of the risk involved in personal involvement in an unfavorable war environment. He did not allow humanity to be a place of chaos, but showed openness and a positive attitude towards the mission, towards change, towards his own conscience and towards renewal, towards the possibility of cooperating with the political movement.

True faith is the voice of moral clarity in a time of war.

Leadership: For an image to become memorable, it must be seen and felt directly, without the unnecessary intermediation of a conditioning process !

And the option that people express concerning football, somewhat resembles with the choice that Nansen selected as being the most important in those days. In the consequence, he was criticized, bombarded with accusations, offended and ridiculed.

However, Nansen always proved he has a special character, coupled with a sense of ethics, values and desire to make better the life of those in need. The accusations that have always been brought to him have not affected his ruthless character. He continued the fight. Firstly, the fight with himself, oscillating around a certain point, depending on many influences to which he was submitted - the point where regrets gathered and joys no longer existed ... to a point where his good soul, disappointed, sad, lonely, defeated in the fight with the reason of others.

What is the effect of the leadership produced by you? Has it a long duration? Are you different of those incapable leaders who are content with the "honor" to deal with this hierarchy, and whose leadership only produces a "placebo" effect? Show others who you truly are. Put your soul to the test, until the righteous cause that you sustain and for which you struggle, will win.

The contextual influence on the perception of the message that is transmitted to the whole world can diagnose the nature of a leader: he never gives up the chance to fight and be strong, he never gives up the chance to show greatness.

And, one more thing to know: The chance of being selected as a leader is equal for everyone.

The Ray Of Light From The Kingdom Of Darkness is the only way through which you can get to the essence of what you truly are. Highlight the human side of your personality that opposes to any negative thinking which distracts you from your deepest values. Knowing of your own being is a constant battle with yourself, which you can win, only if you defend your own convictions and beliefs that support your role and strengthen your relationships with others.

Get to know yourself and you will be able to know the others. Self-knowledge and knowledge of others are the rays of light from the kingdom of darkness, dominated by indifference, carelessness, ignorance, malice and revenge.

Through the positivism of your personality, you will be able to dominate the positivism of others that should be adequately stimulated in order to become a "modus operandi" positive and permanent. Reveal the positive side of your personality, by projecting your true values and views on others.

Conclusion: All the people have different convictions and beliefs, and as they are less firm, as more they are manipulating, by tilting and adhering more quickly and easily by the side of one or another, so-called leader.

A true leader, with progressive ideas, endowed with a positivism in thinking, and which aims achievement of the objectives based on the respect of human dignity, will be able to direct people easier in his favor and his ideas, by making to tip the balance by his side, against those who humiliate human ideals, who are not good at anything else than to hinder, by sabotaging and slowing the normal evolution to progress and prosperity.

The Reality And Its Imaginary Double

On April 28, 2014

Help others go beyond the clouds of confusion and know exactly who they are dealing with, by making an alibi that is fair to the credible everyday realism.

Everything seemed to be statistically quantified in my life, basically everything. Except that cumbersome need of attaching myself to the world of pure ideas, frequently covered by a fine crust of consciousness, whose possible maximum of abstraction I wasn't able to calculate, which could've kept me safe from the game of getting closer or farther away from the vicinity of phenomena challenging to science. It was as if I was part of a Stephen King script, I had to experience a reality that some consider superficial or prefer to ignore, while others experience it as a sword of Damocles, without them understanding the symbolism of its power, rendered in a particular way.

Confident, I became skillful in avoiding the ambiguities between the real and the imaginary, but at the same time, I was turning into a master of the scientific inadmissible. In a provider of complex algorithms to which only a short madness, only a utopia could ensure their implementation in a continuous manner. But, was it a correct one, I wonder?

Science is the double of a reality that surpasses the immediate of a life out of the current norm, which makes you feel invincible in the skin of a momentary character.

I didn't like to think of myself as a juggler of figures, largely basing my existence on the spot I'd situate myself on in statistical terms, overshadowed only by a false debate over the value of my identity. But rather as a puppet led by the resort of ideas of redefining science, through unexpected matchings or combinations.

For any other mentality, my entire science was like a ray of sunshine that slips through a crack in the rock. An estimate that could very well have been inaccurate, because it offered certain explanations concerning the variation of external scientific capital entries, from a source of understanding superior in depth, at a point where others did not fully agree.

Because this science made things much more complicated and harder to solve. Starting from this accumulation of concerns, mechanisms for generating random variables that could lose their coordinates through isolation, above me began to hang a threatening hunch that tented asymptotically towards certainty. Later turning into an attention that strengthened my steps towards reconstructing and reorienting reasoning.

My salvation was to hesitate at times, to get out of the sun, but to not give up on the dream, even if it seemed a utopia.

Leadership: Do your aspirations for an unbeatable ideal prove your guilt before the world in constructing a scenario in which you must compare an entity of thought by internalizing real actions, with a reflection of your reactions to the surrounding world?

Open matches, in which the teams of "science" and "reality" encounter frequently in the leader's work of art, lead to the impossibility of total formalization of a major formula of understanding and appreciating his science, ultra-advanced, manifested in the study of theories with a coercion or influence effect, that can return a true, positive value.

But precisely through this contradiction of ideas, dreams, opinions, expectations, horizons, which betray a different fundamental understanding of things, the scientist is somehow guilty of that "spot of light". Of a far too great an integration in leadership of new sources of scientific capital that are not in others' boundaries of understanding.

Therefore, each scientist has an obligation to redeem their "guilt" in front of their fans, proving a certain intelligence, a certain fingerprint of identification that attests to their quality, justifying the emergence of new elements of development, management and popularization of science. This intelligence is based on building a scenario in which you must compare an entity of thought by internalizing real actions, with a reflection of your reactions to the surrounding world.

Leadership: Do you take responsibility for ensuring the delivery of a finished product, from the perspective of what you're willing to go all the way without getting entangled in stakes too high?

A heroine of writer Anne Hebert said: "Needless to deceive yourself. One day, The Reality And Its Imaginary Double will coincide. Confirming all fears. Abolishing any limit. Dispelling any alibi. Prohibiting any escape. You will be declared guilty before the world. You have to immediately get away from this weakness. To reduce the dream to silence, before it is too late. To shake it off good, in the light. To rid yourself of phantasms."

It's a subtle warning, that you have an increased responsibility for ensuring the delivery of a finished product, of a real leadership, per the quality norms imposed by the limitations of others. It's so easy to dribble reality, but it is so hard for others to go beyond the clouds of confusion and know exactly who they are dealing with.

Because when you start to let yourself driven by the resort of ideas of redefining science, through unexpected matchings or combinations, you are always tempted to cheat, using your own mechanisms of generating random variables that can lose their coordinates through isolation, i.e. not understood by anyone. Be willing to complete an action without getting involved in too high stakes, meaning without making a science of consumption or a captivating but unrealistic gaming experience.

Science is a finite product, of high quality, only if you know how to turn it into a goal whose fulfillment does not imply a material gain. The big stake of the people is often the financial gain, but for an inspired creator the real gain is the possibility of the "product" to be useful to the evolution of the world.

Leadership: Do you ensure the application of the principle: "everything is possible however, in any amount, anywhere and with anyone", considering yourself one with the synthetic sum of some knowledge related to a certain research object?

The consequence is easy to deduce, you become like an actor certain of his reputation, who is entirely caught up in himself and only pretends to act with his scene partners. This dip in yourself, tacitly dialoguing with leadership in a purely scientific language, even if it arguably constitutes the highest creation of your genius, is highly likely to be cataloged firsthand as individualism, or vanity that wants to be flattered, but not appreciated, a vanity unconscious of the ridiculous it finds itself in.

It is wrong to apply personal criteria for the selection and use of knowledge, or put them in front of an unattainable ideal to others, because you end up turning into a ruler of the scientific inadmissible, a maker of ambiguities and complexities for which only a dream, only a utopia could bring fulfillment. And a utopia expressed the straying from diversity, reality, the loss of any cohesion and application of the principle: "everything is possible however, in any amount, anywhere and with anyone."

In addition to the act of creation, the scientist relates to a single object of research: "Man and his symbols during the evolution of the world".

The great challenge of science is destined for an emancipation of thought from the perspective of the image you have about reality, by its ability to make visible the effects of an integration in a story whose action takes place in the decoration created by you.

The Reality And Its Imaginary Double aims at the integration of leadership in everyday life. It is nice to dream of stars and a blue sky, full of vibration, but you cannot reach them if you are inaccurate in relation to the facts, in relation with the accepted standard in terms of how others perceive your science.

For frail minds, to be independent can mean to be abnormal, and being abnormal often means being hated.

Receptive Leadership

On February 22, 2013

The scientist travels a path that can always remain captive in time, without getting lost in a nothingness of the inability to conceive the "supreme being".

Umberto Eco writes in his book "From the tree to the labyrinth", the following:

The labyrinth is a type of network in which any point can be connected to any other point. Any point of it can be linked to any other point, and the connection process is also a continuous process of correcting connections, its structure would always be different from what it was a moment earlier, and each time we would go through it by following different lines.

Thus, whoever travels through it must also learn to continuously correct the image he makes of himself, either this is a concrete image of a (local) section, or an orderly and hypothetical image of his global structure (impossible to know, both for synchronous and diachronic reasons).

A network is a tree plus endless corridors that connect its nodes to each other. The tree can become (multidimensionally) a polygon, a system of interconnected polygons, a huge mega-hedron. But this comparison is still misleading: a polygon has external boundaries, which the abstract network model does not have.

...These are the attributes in search of which we must go "to the point where, even if each of them has a wider extension than its own subject, all together have the same extension as the subject: and this will be the essence of the thing".

Leadership: Do you have the ability to integrate the potential of your essence into a new unity, by increasing receptivity to what comes from outside of you?

What you are looking for will eventually find you, provided that what you are about to assimilate (another type of information, another fantastic dose, a new amount of knowledge) will give you the opportunity to immediately overcome a tangled subjectivity. The mental image of what is outside of you can become a new reality, on the one hand virtual, which must be understood in a broader sense than you are willing to accept.

This reality is a mixture in varying amounts between the "truth" and the "projections" of your imagination. It is an important concept that could capitalize on what can be highlighted in the pros and cons of the idea of the superlative, meaning the absolute condition of dissimilarity.

Receptive leadership intervenes in the context of the evolution of science through the observations you make about everything, giving a new meaning to events, but especially through the relevant questions you ask about the nature of things and their conditions of existence, questions that have the potential to surprise everyone.

To integrate the potential of your essence into a new unity, by increasing the receptivity to what comes from outside you, means to get lost in a labyrinth that contains all the science of the world, whose way out you must discover through the details hidden in everything around.

It is that unity of knowledge that serves to bring as close as possible the experience of using details and circumstances from a changing objective reality, the imperative of "thinking in images" that leads to the deepening of methods to highlight the plausibility on which depends the very progress of a discipline.

Leadership: Can you provide a new revelation on the philosophy of science you serve, finding correlations between the visual perception of information transmission stimuli and the ability to produce something new in the field?

The essence of your determination to find new forms of interaction between science and intuition, between progress and innovation, includes a sequence of actions and positions in the face of what is called: "knowing how to customize events and changes with new meanings and connotations, depending on what intrigues you about them".

At another level of development and flexibility of thought, the superimposition of a virtual reality over a real environment, going beyond the realm of the possible and the evidence, creates the premises of an advanced power of knowledge and stimulation of reason. The power of being everything in a new landscape, at another time, in order to eliminate the conventional. This produces innovation, originality, revelation.

Revelation, composed of meanings attributed to created circumstances, particular representations of new forms of information, that is, to a subjective reality, is a way to bring to the surface things that you carry within you and of which you are not aware. Here, we refer to the infinite corridors of the labyrinth of knowledge that rests on the line of the idea that everything that does not exist can be imagined, and that what can be imagined can be transposed into a new linguistic, scientific, cultural universe.

The labyrinth is the result of systemic and complex approaches to the actions needed to ensure a good correlation between what is called the natural order and what can be called the "supernatural" order, between the celestial and the terrestrial origin. Something mystical, isn't it?

You can find the way out with the help of information transmission stimuli, such as comparisons, connotations, metaphors, analogies, which are influenced by the power of the visual – depending on the perception, in many respects, of space and surrounding elements.

To produce a novelty in the field means to represent in the plan of a higher expectation about life and about the world a surprising reality, in the form of creations, which can exist even when you are no more. The novelty is actually your unfinished story...

Receptive Leadership refers to the way you compose and expose a message from observing and knowing the world around you, but with the mention that you must live the experience of pushing your mind to its limits and forcing it to jump beyond the immediate known, towards a reality that proves to be more fascinating and overwhelming than any darkness.

Receptive leadership is also known as the "Labyrinth Test". And the supreme being who keeps under control all the mysteries of the labyrinth is the symbol of continuity in the evolution of science.

Reduction To Essence

On January 24, 2016

Think first of all of what you don't need to show to the world, so it becomes clear what exactly you do need to show.

In his work, Eisenstein see everything in gigantic, cosmic proportions and in relation to this is also what he himself calls "the inhumanity of the system of terrible images" (although this obsession of cruelty must also have a different explanation). He confesses that his interest in researching phenomena fades away as soon as things reach the threshold of the narrow stage of human development.

He is always somewhere, at the level of the wise spider. That is why, for example, the theme that always recurs in his work, that of revenge, is seen through a special lens: revenge is, quite simply, a reaction, like a partial annex of the general law of equality of action, like the resistance that dictates the movement of oscillation to the pendulum.

Eisenstein always seeks in his films the reduction to essence. He used to say jokingly that the director is obliged to think first of all of what he needs to not show, and then it will be clear for him what exactly he does need to show. Watching his films, we will notice – for example – a symbolic essentialization through the permanent presence of those three basic elements: water, fire, and earth. *

Leadership: Does your interest in researching phenomena fade away as soon as things reach the threshold of the narrow stage of development, from the perspective of an image that does not fit into a unique creation?

The one who manages to go through the entire evolution of the relationship between science and philosophy, technology and society, will address the theme of his own creation with a state of hate, hostility, or with an attitude of condemnation, which creates a thick wall between what he tries to capture and what he needs to prove. But the wall can transform into a mirror if you know what you need to address. The image that you objectively capture, in different aspects of your life, is the theme that will constantly return to your creation.

Leadership, oriented towards the representation of the expansion of an individual's uniqueness, must value the interest in researching phenomena of novelty, defined through the permanent presence of basic elements. And this interest must not fade away as soon as things reach the threshold of the narrow stage of development, meaning, to reach the exhaustion of possibilities of reconfiguring expectations concerning a reality that only you can understand. But rather, it must be continuously amplified by combining basic elements at a certain instance of context.

The main merit of a successful work belongs to the director for the fact that the system of beliefs, synthesized in a theme that wants itself to be the essence of an original idea, or of a certain reality desired into manifestation, ensures the achievement of a state of perfection that can help him capable of bearing the demands of demonstrability of personal theories and truths. Think first of all about what you shouldn't show to the world, and then you will find the main reason behind the theme that you should use around the image to be inserted in the minds of others.

If you want to become an excellent leader, learn to play the role of a director. First of all, think of what you don't need to show the world, eliminate all components of known reality, so that you create a particular topic of discussion. At the same time, learn to see everything in gigantic proportions, meaning from a certain viewpoint, assigning each aspect a more pronounced personal meaning that you will constantly highlight.

Leadership is the meaning you attach to a creation whose main subject is not only freedom of expression, but especially the essentialization of an idea that takes shape after years and years, triggering a true phenomenon called: "an amplification of what is within you."

Reduction To Essence suggests that acquiring of clarity in addressing a specific topic of a screenplay, presented as a surprising finding.

An excellent director manages to show the world his reaction of the type "Only I know this" in the direction of what he wants to change, or in the direction of what the essence of all of his achievements represents, through a particular highlighting of his ideas and experiences.

Reflections Of Truths Revealed In One Man

On February 11, 2023

What you see in yourself when you look at the world around you corresponds to the orientation you must center around a destiny marked by the exceptional.

Three great alchemists, apostles of the named Logos, lived several centuries apart, manifesting themselves as pendulums, each oscillating above the point of the other. No diplomas, certificates, transcripts or other documents have been discovered to show that any of them attended any school, although their names appear in the registers of certain institutions of higher learning.

1. Nicholas Flamel (author of The Philosopher's Stone)

2. Paracelsus (inventor of chemical remedies)

3. Fulcanelli (the one without an identity)

But the ancient prophecies of an Indian guru announced that, about a century and a half away from the third, the fourth alchemist would appear out of nowhere, a fearless d'Artagnan who would definitively complete the formula of the 4, the symbol of stability, reflecting the energies of the archangels. The latter, an ever-burning torch whose mistica y eterna identity will be revealed in due time, intimated that he knew the secret of that which causes heaven to unite with earth, God becoming one with Man. He said only this:

"I am infinity."

Leadership: Can that which makes you add value to your vision be circumscribed to a (hard-earned) destiny responsible for cultivating a perspective that goes beyond what you know about yourself?

Eternal rule, number four. All these four alchemists, Reyes de Reyes, Señores de Señores, were set apart from birth, were protected and bound together by a Spiritus Sanctus Supremo, and the great prophets of the hidden times wrote their names beforehand in a pink-white papyrus, called Rosa Ponselle. They will be known as mirrors of the truths revealed in one man, the Messiah, insofar as he will represent the objective identity of the universal and the particular.

And I am not here to reveal what is hidden behind the mega-absconded equations that only the initiates understand, nor am I talking about what will happen after the second coming of Christ, but only reminding the world of a mysterious vision designed as a network of mysterious and unsuspected connections.

Also on this line of prophecies are the texts of FWJ Schelling, from which it was worth extracting, com precisio e cautela, a short fragment that, moreover, ordinary readers can easily lose sight of:

"At well-balanced times, we expect the appearance of that grandiose spirit that would take philosophy out of its current misery, articulating again, in a brilliant vision, the great members of a sumptuous edifice of thought. Philosophy will then find the road it took walked for centuries, leaving the paths and dead ends that the indigences of the age had pushed. Of course, we must be aware that for such an enterprise a truly brilliant mind is needed, which is capable of conjugating to the end the immense mass of information that humanity has accumulated in the meantime, and on top of that, to find answers to the great questions that the contemporary crisis has added to the traditional ones. That things are like this, that the intelligence of our century is periodically waiting for the Messiah, he sees precisely in the incoherence with which the subjects of any science are approached, the collective mentality failing to assimilate the eternal, luminous wisdom that gives stability to the love of God."

Leadership: Are you subject to the phenomenon of "mirroring in your own being", when what marks the entire course of your existence is given by the perception of an organic unit whose identity survives the passage of time?

This Messiah will carry out his work under the seal of a d'Artagnan who does not allow himself to be touched in the slightest by the sharpness of narrow thoughts, without spiritual background, especially in the case of a precarious interpretation of science. Because the infinite can only be contained with the help of science, and d'Artagnan is a visionary who rises above his petty self, reaching through boldness and thoughtfulness a real liberation of the intellect, managing to soar into the undisturbed empire of unlimited possibilities.

Yes, he is a visionary who propagates the idea of "permanent connection" between the four enduring pillars of spirituality: Mind, Body, Spirit and Truth, or Prayer, Perseverance, Contemplation and Service of the holy word.

Readers of Dumas should have realized that d'Artagnan was not an ordinary man, although his presence in any place, without striking a glance, was taken as an ordinary existence. But his stormy soul, led by a brilliant mind, was possessed by a divine aura. Although he always told himself that danger, and even death, was lurking everywhere, thinking about the different characters of those with whom he was going to fight, he began to see more clearly before him. In him was that unwavering substratum of determination, which his father's advice had planted in his heart: "Don't avoid unexpected circumstances. Always benefit from your mistakes and those of others, and don't forget that he who hesitates for a moment can escape the luck that fate extends at that precise moment."

Follow his example to become like him, because you never know what divine spirit is hidden in you.

Leadership: Is your vision more comprehensive as it combines, with insight worthy of a brilliant mind, reflexivity and transitivity?

Let's think about the two attributes of the vision that animated d'Artagnan along the way. The first attribute, reflexivity, represents the attention you must pay to the mysterious nature of the reality you experience through an existence that is not yours, but belongs to a protective God. And transitivity is a kind of relationship with some powerful spirits that watch over your destiny. You will acquire an exemplary value, drawn from the Sign of the Four, as soon as you borrow a meaning that transcends the limits of your individual existence.

Unfortunately, nowadays you bump into "musketeers" everywhere you turn, adventurers looking for the luck that the eventual discovery of a Holy Grail can offer. Everyone plunges into countless and complicated intrigues, threats and diplomacy, opportunities to assert themselves and impose themselves through the image, always taking shortcuts. But all these unmarked passes, hurried raids, sprinkled with many dodges, slits and tackles, are increasingly tying the threads of the understanding of the idea of "Unity in Divine grace".

While the real d'Artagnan, that Messiah long awaited by all, will be like a surprise, like an unexpected appearance and bringing hope just when the world will be closest to its total destruction, caused by the dark forces that defy the divine plan.

And this d'Artagnan, take him from where he is not. It is he, the most spirited of all, the youngest and most talented of the four, he will fight em segredo on a spiritual front borrowed from the ancients, a spiritual background passed through the fine sieve of a unique and primordial thought that manifests itself just like a thin summer wind: you don't feel it, you don't see it, but it spreads over a very large radius...

We can talk about leadership when you have to integrate several visions in one eye that sees more clearly and further than others. And a clairvoyant eye is supported by a sparkling mind that educates itself and mobilizes all its forces to access a higher spiritual level.

The Reflections Of Truths Revealed In One Man are those images which, depending on the angle from which they are viewed, may show similarities, but are by no means identical. d'Artagnan is a symbol that confirms this interpretation: the more your image will stand out from other similar images, the more personalized it will be.

Reflections On Leadership

Accept reality before you focus on the things you think you know.

Forget my opinion. Leadership excellence is only achieved if you accept change, freely and without coercion. It is like an urgent need of the present and the future. The world, the requirements, are constantly changing and so you need to be able to keep up with them. I mean, we have to be always willing to take the plunge toward self-motivation, towards the ideal, and originality, to change our mindset, and to keep pace with the world and the times.

It is useless to understand leadership if you do not know how to use its essence wisely. The essence of leadership is manifested by the decisions you make whenever you interact with other people, but also whenever you educate your own self, storing and analyzing the latest features of human nature. It is not for nothing that I have said many times in my seminars that the leader, before leading people and guiding them in a direction beneficial to both, must discover his own values, his own self, try to constantly fight his imperfections until he reaches the level where its results and performance improve.

Beyond self-knowledge, another characteristic of leaders is that they are constantly open to the new, obey the rules, and take only calculated risks. Be careful, it's about the "inside" rules, the circuit that these risks follow so that the leader's perfection is complete.

Let me add that the best leaders have a high degree of self-confidence, a confidence that is shaped by the cleansing and uniformity of their aspirations (giving voice to their feelings) – which often makes them more pleasant and more easily accepting of a failure or a contradictory opinion. Various studies have shown something important – an increased interest in their emotional and moral status, in the way they are seen, in the way they perceive themselves. An excellent leader, for example, will not want to have the most expensive car and the biggest house, but as many people as possible to follow him.

Leadership: Can the values your personality is proud of influence the decisions you need to make in order to make adjustments that can lead to incredible upheavals?

Values are important to the leaders of all companies in the world, from the smallest to the largest, being especially edifying. For example, as someone rightly points out, women managers tend to be altruistic, more conservative, and not infrequently base their business decisions on intuition. Men, on the other hand, are much more pragmatic, the immediate results concern them the most, they only talk about money, and they almost always put business before personal life – "this will make shareholders love leaders, but they have to be careful so that employees do not end up hating their leaders."

Your personal and professional value springs from the depths of your own being. By this I mean the extent of your confidence in what defines you, in our faith and will when you exercise your skills and test your skills. You can prevent the erosion of your potential by creating a positive impact on your actions.

To achieve excellence in leadership, to become a performer, seek to discover what works best for people, use your influence to inspire value in your organization. Your involvement in getting to know people is a positive thing. And I find that it is very good when you highlight, on any occasion, the values that are the object of your leadership, when you expose your concern for what defines you, for what you think, for what hurts or makes you happy.

The incredible ascension of a leader can mean the transition of man from imperfection to perfection, or the transition from an insignificant role to a very important one.

But at the same time, you need to focus on those errors of conscience, on those purely personal, irrational, emotional elements that have left their mark on the reality of your life (such as pain, sadness, hatred, fear, etc.) and remove feelings that can lead to emotional "paralysis". Once they flood your life, you can hardly change. Leadership is like an apple that needs to be beautiful on the outside, ripe and healthy on the inside – but an apple that does not dry out with the changing seasons and climate, and continues to bear fruit. This is possible only if the people around him take care of him and provide him with all the optimal fruiting conditions.

The question once asked by the great leadership expert, John Maxwell, is this: *"Are you compatible with the way you think about your organization and the way you lead?"*If the answer is no, don't even think about mentoring. For you to be excellent in leadership, you must be compatible with other people.

No training in this world will make you the kind of leader that people want and really need. Your endowment with those qualities accepted and desired by people requires employment. It takes time and effort on your part. The longer and harder your path to endowment, the longer it will bear fruit.

The role of a leader is to guide those who have chosen him. Based on a deep knowledge of human nature and especially of those he represents, he must know how to guide them on the best path to achieve the common goal, by unanimously accepted method (and in accordance with the requirements and standards imposed today).

A leader who wants to achieve excellence guides people on the same path to achieving performance and excellence, and definitely cannot be a... dissenter... but also not a commoner... (a man who today destroys what he made yesterday, and who repairs today what he will ruin tomorrow). Remember: It is useless to understand leadership if you do not know how to use its essence wisely.

Leadership aims to achieve a great goal, fulfilling the role of authority in situations where events are identified that prove the existence of incidents at the level of emergency management.

Reflections On Leadership can be extracted from any random event, from any situation that makes you think about how to intelligently manage the evolution of uncertain phenomena that can lead to an excessive loss of support from people.

Remember Me

On Octombrie 05, 2019

Learn how to relate yourself to a time of intense artistic experience, immortalizing it at a turning point in your relationship with a being that feels and imitates you in everything you create about it.

Whenever I am in the midst of roses, like a Harry Houdini among paintings, I feel like they are introduced to a story landscape, in memorable conversations between two similar characters, and yet as different as moral endowment, education and character. It is as if I am having an unimaginable experience in a world of sensations and the optical illusions spun around a unforgettable images, sober and at the same time full of sensitivity, in which two points, perceived separately, declare themselves united in one crossing of the history of art.

I agree with myself and take heed when thoughts capture the silence of a moment of affection and longing, questo momento è un santo segreto, that not everything I see is a bunch of organic matter collected in one form or another, at the same time something fleeting and pointless. There is also an aesthetic side in which the colors alter my perceptions of something existing outside of me, a dialogical monologue, a complex religious symbolism embodied in a suitable artistic form, an exquisite beauty that is enjoyed with the praise and admiration of all by constituting a point of reference: "The destiny of a transcendent reality".

This perception of the rose, in the privileged moments of my break from the world, facilitates the encounter with an Alter-Ego inspired by the immortal brilliance of an indestructible whole, the horizon of an irretrievable situational understanding enclosed in an extremely tight space. Often, even the roses diligently do their duty of freely transmitting, as a holy prayer, what words fail to: a good mental focus, peace of mind, a mental creation of Everything.

Leadership: Do you have the ability to materialize some ideas in a visual form that give meaning to a concept of the type "believe in something more than you can see", immortalized through a factor of attraction that subtly convinces you to adopt it without having rejection reactions?

In a way, I forced myself to listen to the silence of the roses, with pleasure and delight, only through the mere fact of my presence among them, as when the painter admires the landscape and visualizes it as a matrix of sacred space and devotional action, experiencing it with all the intensity it is capable of, before immortalizing it in a decisive moment of its relationship with nature.

The painting, once completed, is a great surprise because you have to recognize a new aspect of what God wanted you to see from Him, through the diversity and grandeur of nature.

Remember Miranda Gray, the character in John Fowles' work. What she told the butterfly collector remains a defining emblem of the roses externalized by art, because they themselves feel as if they are a part of people's lives, un ritiro dalle onde delle tentazioni del mondo, as they are set with many predefined colors of nature, with feelings and thoughts that I find in myself, in support of my story:

It is madness, it is sinister, but a sort of relationship was created between us. We tease each other, an almost friendly situation. Partly because I feel so alone, away from the agitated world, I do it deliberately so as to force him to relax. A part of weakness, a part of deceit.

But there is another part, mysterious, that I cannot define. There can be no friendship, because I hate him, you prick the vein with some words of gray nuance even when not necessary. Maybe it's some kind of interest to his person. Because I know so much about him. And when you know someone well, you automatically feel closer to him. Even when you would like to see him on another planet."

Leadership: Can the object of your attention become the authentic version of a proactive type empathy through the plastic representation of a being who announces the discovery of a masterpiece of yours, so far unknown?

Attention focused on a splendor of nature is associated with the modification of an image of artistic value conceived in order to facilitate the extraction of information of interest for the construction of a sense attributed to the activity experienced through a character, through his conscience, following his thoughts and feelings. Whether as an emblem of purity and candor, or as an emblem of power in terms of imaginative or intellectual knowledge.

With much inspiration and passion, I know that I will be able to bring about a change of artistic mentality, oltre ogni dubbio, a lasting enrichment of the vision about the infinite creative resources of the human genius with a source of the power of expression of the language, only if the object of my attention will place an increasingly stronger mark on the need for diversity. He must also motivate other currents of opinion to embrace the aspects of revitalizing the aesthetic feeling towards nature.

Being proactive means being a man of the ideas of art impregnated in the mind and soul of the person who completes your experiences with a certain intensity. And the masterpiece of an artist consists in rendering the intensity of this experience as an expression of a symbiotic success between the visual and the conceptual, between nature and the contemporary man.

As I recognized my inclination to portray the beauty of roses, as the very fact of immortalizing a unique moment in my life, being able to be transposed into a story, I began to introduce in my pictures the content of meaning attributed to a life experience of impressive force and vigor, captured in images, as the writer Artur Silvestri does in the work "Perpetuum Mobile":

"Undiscovered music made him dream with his eyes wide open. It was something like a magic he had never tried before. He had begun to see landscapes, motionless scenes and unnamed faces – almost like photographs – that he had known before, perhaps long ago, even from his life perhaps. He seemed to be reliving concentrated moments, which had only happened to remind him of another time, sometime, in some random future, coming just now without having announced him."

The great secret of creation is experiencing the feeling of being ALIVE, detached from the words that remain imprinted in the minds of other people, only if you communicate them in time by artistic reflection of an object, of a landscape, of a painting, of a reality forgotten in our daily lives.

Words are the paths that my art also produce in view of a brilliant, completely inexplicable work, which nature calls Logos, the expression of God, His expression of Himself. At first it was the word, then the telling of a reality to which I am deeply subjective, giving great revelations about myself. Getaways from those found only in the poet's vision of nature, in the thoughts of peace, harmony, tranquility, inner love that I give to all those who want to be a permanent novelty in the landscape of art.

Remember Me is the urge of the rose expressed by the artist's personal perception of changes in mindset, thinking and attitude, made possible by his contact with a sensitivity of a structure other than that of the limits that push the expressionism of comparison, but rather that of a vibrant expressionism, with symbolic inserts, anchored in the reality of an event called "La Creazione Incessante".

Remember Who You Are

On February 20, 2015

Change your fundamental attitude that justifies the interest in formulating a new idea of reality, extending the authenticity of the experiences that are constantly trying to face the situations that bring you to the point where you become someone else.

There always arose a revelation when I was trying to emphasize the existence of the fiercest consistency in the struggle with the representations of life. It was a unique game to explore, a direction adjusted over time, a way of access to the closures of individuality. Somehow, I felt the need of a new standard of externalization, through the practice of interiorization. For this, I had to meet the requirement of rendering an experience of navigating through the fields of the past, born from the idea of the constitutive elements description of an animating bet (event - stake - gain), by using the equations of suggestibility.

I found myself, as the daring Vikings who ventured into various expeditions of exploring unknown territories under the pressure of the acute need to lean my shoulders of uncertainty by the fragile delirium of joy procured with the effort of imagination. By a deep and affectionate remembrance, by an event that happened in the vicinity of my destiny, by some secret that warmed my soul like a ravishing melody that does not stop. However, I did not always respect the rhythms of self acceptance.

Once, in my rigorously formalized mind, inadequate to the character tinting focused on the interpretations of the past - carried out as an imperfect film, I dropped a question whose answer I struggled in vain to find out. I could see my own story through the partially reflecting mirror of the reason manifested by the empirical Ego, in a succession of endless images (reflections of the reality behind the appearance of life feelings) from the height of the consciousness, from the height of the word of thinking speaking to me in the chest through the heartbeats, under the leaden whip of the commandment: "Remember who you are ! "

Leadership: Does your horizon of knowledge and existence converge towards the transformation of a given reality, by analogy with an Ego that experiences the humility of constantly experiencing a true process of consciousness?

While the story about his twin brother who drowned in the trough, Mark Twain observes that: "Nobody has ever knew who has drowned, me or my brother." So well they were alike that no one could verify its authenticity. He was the only witness and his testimony was the only means of expressing the truth.

The opportunity to improve a situation, in which you fight with what we call classic Ego, even if the feelings are stronger than you, depends on the validity of the relationship between certainty and illusion, between reality and spirit. You are the only witness of situations that validate the authenticity of the experiences you experience in relation to an increasingly complex reality marked by acute fears or hidden joys.

A remembrance expressed by stimuli coming from the exemplarity of an experience of navigation through the fields of the past, from memories and reconstructions, revealing a reality in which does not interfere the error to depart from yourself through questions that are not answered, can trigger a deep desire of change and transformation on all levels.

Leadership, as a science, whose foundation is built, moves, staggers or falls depending on the coordinates of the power manifestation to recognize you as an individual separate of the world, and who at the same time has an influence over the world, passes through the empirical stage, when you experience unforgettable emotions.

The results of exploring the analogy between knowledge and existence are rigorously calculated in the phase of self-change, but they can be interpreted and validated in the path of total acceptance of what you are when you become aware of what is happening in a reality that only accepts your truth.

Leadership, in this case, resembles a game like "travel and count" in which you need to drop the old identity that follows you with good and bad that you have shown in the past, into a finite existence. And to conceive a new representation of your understanding - in the light of what you have known over time by capturing the contrast between appearance and essence.

The appearance is given by the thoughts or the feelings full of regret, of sadness or deception on which you focus - that grow increasingly more the uncertainty in you, until finally are gathering and the explosion occurs. You lose your identity in the thread of your own memory, in the shadow of the memories you become suspicious towards your own power of comprehension.

At the opposite pole, the essence is what remains stable in you after you read between the lines of appearance. That is, once you enter the labyrinth of memories, instead of getting lost, you find certainties that bring peace of mind to the consciousness, restoring your inner tranquility.

The fundamental attitude that justifies the interest in formulating a new idea of reality belongs to the situation when you see yourself caught between the uncertainty of a change of image and the uncertainty of a changing world, and you have decided to choose the variant of truth that allows you to be yourself.

Remember Who You Are brings into attention the brand of the personal identity intended to be researched in order to reconsider your position towards your virtues or weaknesses. Let us not forget what was saying the blogger Lucian Radu Alexandru: "Identity is what every being is at a time, being seen from the perspective of her own Existential Whole."

Thus, tinting the character by interpreting the past, passing through the filter of thought, of feeling and of the system of values, those questions that satisfy the need for authenticity and deep knowledge, is necessary, because it facilitates the easier transition from the statute of a "loser" to the statute of a "winner". A defeated man has no power over what worries him; he cannot find the rhythm of his inner life in the social disorder.

To change your background attitude - from resignation to determination, expand your knowledge over what possesses you, on what has led you to the point where you are now. But not the emotions !

Renunciation Beyond Creation

On November 08, 2015

Manifest your authority in the fight with yourself, focusing on the opposition between the apparent simplicity of producing a distinct creation and its ulterior complexity.

In a letter from Mexico, the director Sergei Eisenstein wrote to a friend: "You know very well that the spirit, the heart and... my fate are melodramatic." They are lines written on the 28th of December, 1931. His fate, however, becomes deeply tragic and, in a letter from after only four months, written on the 27th of January, 1932, after Sinclair gives the categorical disposal to stop filming, we read these disturbing lines:

"I give up everything. Everything, everything, everything – only to be given the opportunity to finish what, under the conditions of the most unimaginable hardship, I am not working on, but am fighting for... This is about, as we are all surely convinced, our best film. Something such as this cannot be destroyed... Terrible it is that people do not understand that the film is not a sausage that you can eat in full or just as well only three-quarters of its length...

Maybe a miracle happens though and I will be able to film the episode for which I'd give my heart's blood (and I don't say this ironically – you know my character very well). Help us... Such letters are not often written... In my situation man puts a bullet through his head. I'm surprised I'm not doing it actually ! Who knows – this could still happen ! All the possibilities exist and I could give up everything ! " *

Leadership: How do you perceive yourself in the face of the supreme court called "renunciation", in the limits of what you can experience and obtain through the act of creation which puts to the test your patience and ambition?

Deep down within the being that constantly refreshes its wounds caused by efforts that most often only produce a terrible fatigue; a flaccidity is manifested that remains hanging from some passing illusion. This is a syndrome of strong personalities, even if it seems hard to believe. In front of the act of creation, there is always a wall, called renunciation, a terrible struggle with the very possibility of being part of the story to which you gave an absolutely fantastic form, because few succeed in translating a story into a celebration of the authentic spirit of sacrifice, of loyalty to an ideal, manifested in the struggle for the victory of a dream, a vision, or a passion.

The very act of creation is a definition of the dedication, the involvement of the ambitious man in a project called "A chance of dignity". In the leavened thoughts in deployment polyhedron of the existence that prevents you from materializing a vision, as a weakness brought about by the blows of fate of your own powers, i.e. in the thoughts that strive to explain that psycho-emotional state that cries out that you have reached a place where nothing awaits you, we can distinguish two orientations.

One, represented by the sensation of opposition between the apparent simplicity of producing a distinct creation and its ulterior complexity, manifesting a relative independence from its content, which approximates you to a sort of barrier or border, marking the boundary between value and non-value. The other, represented through what happens to you when you feel you're stuck and cannot advance further, the ineffable existing here in its purest state, leads to a sort of accelerated degradation of self-image, of our own being, instead of discovering and developing it.

Leadership: Can you highlight the image of a destiny addressed as a consequence of a search that involves effort and uncertainty in the direction of a "self-consciousness" called to remind you that anything that tests you has an evolutionary purpose?

The power to know and understand yourself cannot be complete if in the discovery of alternatives from which effect states come from you don't, at the same time, follow these two orientations. Remember, the first characteristic of leadership – and for this we call it an integral part of a powerful style of combining the nuances of life with the efforts of creation – is that of accepting this "renunciation" in its essence as an annex of your personality.

And the confession "All the possibilities exist and I could give up everything", detached from the pain of not being able to reach the fulfillment of the "great work", cannot direct leadership towards the transformation established through the authority of engaging in effective decisions (not illusory ones) relating to matters of personal and professional life.

For despair, linked to the creation to which you cannot give a certain form, to which you cannot set a certain dimension and value, affects your style of thinking, of acting, of expressing yourself and exposing your ideas. In leadership, this is called reaching the resistance point from which you don't want to take an extra step. It means you being to immerse yourself in the area of personal obscurity.

Self-consciousness, which includes a set of other structures such as: knowledge, passion, will, imagination, is that deep-seated affection defined by the imperative of "I do not give up on what I have set out to do" only assumed by the artist who knows how turn the most difficult of attempts into a characteristic of spiritual maturity.

Renunciation Beyond Creation highlights that characteristic of the creator of living in a state of tension, anxiety and mistrust, resulting from the efforts of demonstrating his talent and value.

Few recognize as object of study this obscure area – that of renunciation. It being a form of manifesting yourself as an active factor in the process of redrawing the boundaries of your own world, offering new interpretations to your own being.

Susceptible to a truly relevant study in leadership, is the art of knowing yourself in the position of being defeated by your own efforts, later manifested in a form of being a winner – integrated in the consciousness of other people.

You can be a role model for other people if you manage to manifest your authority in the fight against yourself.

Repent And Die !

On November 08, 2016

Start considering leadership as a moral force, outlining your sense of life as a form of excited emotionality for something that can relentlessly represent you.

Indeed, for an hour now, he had but a side of his misfortune in his sight and behold, suddenly another side came to mind, no less dire.

Towards his wife, he acted as an unyielding judge and even condemned her to death. And she, terrified, crushed by remorse, collapsed under the shame he called upon himself in the name of spotless virtue, she, the poor woman, weak and defenseless against an absolute and supreme power, maybe even in that very moment, was preparing to die !

An hour passed since her condemnation. It was without a doubt that she relived in her mind all of her crimes, she was asking for God's forgiveness – all criminals turn towards the heavens before death – while writing a letter begging forgiveness to her virtuous husband, forgiveness paid by death.

Villefort shrieked again in pain and fury. Alas – he groaned as he rolled upon the carriage's silk – this woman only became a criminal due to living by my side. I am the one infected of crime, me, me ! But she contracted crime such as you contract typhus, cholera, the plague ! And I am punishing her ! I dared say to her: "Repent and die ! " Me ! No ! No ! She will live ! She will follow me, we will both run away together, we will leave France, we will keep going forward, as long as the earth can endure us.

*I spoke of the scaffold ! Good Lord, how could I dare use that word ! For the scaffold awaits me as well ! We shall run away ! But I shall confess everything. Yes, I will tell her every day, humiliating myself, that I too have committed a crime... Alas ! The union of the tiger and the snake ! Eternal wife of a husband such as I ! ... She must live, my wretchedness must make hers fade away ! **

Leadership: Do you show your exclusive concern for the phenomenon of "remorse by delegation", expressing your gratitude for the relentless end of your own evolutionary cycle that supports itself with the unshakable testimony of the deeds that deserve their reward?

The starting point in the construction of a personality that changes the world, can be investigated and interpreted in any type of experimental science by integrating dynamics and the mental processes of man in a context of training and responsibility. Any such personality is based on a strong motivation: to live and think positively.

And man's stopping point, which may have as a moral the negative effect of an action served and manifested in excess, or an omission which in a moment created an imminent threat of harm over your own environment of training, must be considered as being a less finished version of "yourself."

A "yourself" that is associated with a weak content of positivity. A "yourself" that is a partaker of that state of waking consciousness, in which the "guilt" solvent is activated, enabling a form of ethical paralysis, that feeling of sad resignation in the face of an undesired reality. Guilt means mercy, it means a weak conscience, it means running away from yourself in an attempt to find another reality in which to take refuge, knowing that you can always get lost in another area called "confession without surroundings".

The experience of being a judge and a defendant belongs to the man who consumes his existence through continual confessions related to his deeds, proving that he is not interested in knowing the truths of the world, but only in his relationship with himself.

The inadmissible end is always the result of "it's my fault", with a large dose of resentment at an individual level. What man tends to know about the whole world is directed to the center of his inner world, as it is in relation to the phenomena of the soul, to the product of his consciousness. So, his relation to the possible that he can bear in connection with his deeds, is the result of reaching a point where the mind must be accompanied by balance in order to move toward wisdom. Otherwise, man is compelled to no longer recognize himself, reawakening deep pains that will move him to tears, and moving further and further away from godliness.

The man that doesn't shape the meaning of his life as a complex experience of attachment, as a form of excited emotionality for something that has to relentlessly represent him, will always have accents of resignation after the wars lost with himself. Always will the man defeated by his own weaknesses start off actions as early as his youth that will, in excess and over the course of time be incriminated in the occurrence of unexpected events. He is prone to changes that can often be dramatic.

Leadership is emerging as a mental strength when permanent changes and the surrounded mess that constrains you into feeling weak and stuck in a nostalgic bewailing of losing epistemic self-control, emotional and moral, and yet choose to believe in something good, in greatness and the beauty of life.

Leadership is the tendency to enter the vein of existential meaning of the man who shapes his own existence, meaning sensations and moods, as it is located at the center of events: as a victim of chance or as an instrument of chance.

Repent And Die ! is the alarm signal suggesting that you are on your last journey: that of loneliness, vanity and perdition. Proof of repentance is valid when you have to go forward, as long as the earth can endure you to escape a guilt that must be immediately punished by the laws of the world.

The proof of your own narrow-mindedness and scarcity is justified when you only see one side of your misery and when, always and unexpectedly, a new side comes to mind, no less dire. And you are forced to violate the principles of equality.

Return To Innocence

In December 17, 2017

Adjust your steps to place yourself within the sphere of the virtue of believing in yourself and of being capable of great deeds before the greatness of the creation of God.

I had arrived in a totally different geography of the present, in the mental approach of seeking new ways to overcome thresholds and steps, adapted to the circumstances of experiences of erasing the sin called "wandering", along the psyching and social life that seems to drive me mad, covered my hope of lasting continuity in redefining and improving my image in the world.

I wanted to be someone really brilliant, the founder of an immeasurable science, maybe in a future that seemed to me as imaginary as the previous lives that I once lived through God's eyes, yet I do not remember anything about them. The immense diversity of the sensitive eye that carefully scrutinizes the facts, the landmark of fine adjustments of the "Just believe in destiny" function, had their replica in the nuances imposed by the psychology of the art of being prepared for the chance of regaining the authenticity of faith, when it would appear.

The steady hand of fulfillments that obsessed me and ruled me with sadness at the same time, for the magic with which I assumed commitments greeted me during the period of belonging to the profound consciousness of the present time, was a certainty of the purpose of possessing a unique, grandiose value, called "Follow just your own way".

What seemed stranger to me, better integrated into the peaceful reality of a sunny world that makes you forget what you are currently experiencing, except for the condition referring to the financial situation, was that of constant and perfectly rigorous alternation between change and immutability that seemed to lead me to the idea of reversibility: "That's not the beginning of the end."

Leadership: Do you ensure a state of mind specific to an established nature, by the express definition of a notion of "circumstance" on which the decision to possess a unique value is based?

Here's how Romanian writer Artur Silveștri expresses this type of reversibility: "There are people writing on the water's edge, that is, where Time otherwise reveals its great mystery of the end without beginning. And they, like me, may once be understood, in a way, the natural soul that defines us as a kind of entelechy. "Just look into your heart my friend, that will be the return to yourself."

The culmination of a forward, which I was preparing in the depths, developed between the precise reproduction of the harsh reality and the hallucinations of my mind lost in the chaos of the impatience to prove my leap of renewing my faith, through the contempt of conformism and by practicing the relationship with the possibility of a provocative adventure, as a vision of my art. With its possible distortions.

Again, without betrayal of content-generating forms, life is revealed to me as a customized offer, more focused on cultivating the sense of superiority or domination, from the force of that interpretation of the impossible to be achieved by total abandonment in a madness of performances, not necessarily desired, but certainly, appreciable.

The unique value given to me by that part of life that seeks answers from any circumstance is characterized by a fragmentation of the totality of a set of representations and putting it in a frame of reference that requires you to believe in it to be convinced that has the potential and the power to accomplish a goal.

Leadership: Are you trying to find yourself at the forefront of the "Great Work" when you are the only one that does not fit in the surrounding imagery?

You are the only one that does not fit in the surrounding imagery when you commit yourself to an overcoming of personal value in the art of following your own way to achieving your true purpose.

What is art, the red stage of the Great Work, other than a match of circumstances that emphasize your uniqueness, yet another step closer to God, be yourself don't hide, identifying the means to successfully deal with the daily situations with which you are confronted, so you can learn more about yourself.

Don't care what people say, tirelessly whispered to me the consciousness with the weight of a rock collapsing into the sea, when you crash under the pressure of internal forces and try to rise from anonymity, when you are under the pressure of a higher power. It is about that consciousness of difference, that is, something related to the superior reality of the integration of divergent scenarios into a single model of perfection: God, followed by the representation of the totality of these differences throughout life. Just believe in destiny !

The forebodings, the controversy, the near-inescapable situations, the passions stemming from the vastness of nonsense that occupied my free time, the vital outbursts, the alternation between fatality and salvation all consolidated my destiny. I thought that if I considered my course as a reflection of the beliefs about myself, parallel, while giving myself the respite of an incursion into the lesson-filled past, I would be able to honor my commitments more easily to the purpose of being a creator and putting it into practice courageously and with style.

The greatness of God's creation is observed in the existence that man experiences through everything he can imagine that is possible to come true.

Return to Innocence symbolizes the image of the soul of a perfect man approaching God through the quintessence of a maximum customization of the course that he follows in order to be within the realm of virtue of believing in himself and of being capable of great deeds.

It is about that innocence of the Ego who imagines that his imaginations will be fulfilled, manifested by the healthy pleasure of experiencing the certainty of the proposed goal, overcoming the fear of "heights" through love for God.

Return To Yourself

Learn to embrace the acceptance of finding yourself in front of countless doors that no key would know how to open.

I had to find a plausible explanation regarding this long road, uncertain reaching, that only led to myself, as concrete as it is abstract. When, where, why, for what purpose does everything I observed in the stretches of a sea stretched and suddenly emerged in imagination happen, knowing that I have to return there, somewhere in time and space, as far away as possible from the rest of the world? To see if I find myself in what I once was?

Between something planned and something done there is a shift from closed to open, which lasts for who knows how long, a sort of going forward and dive in a time of which you feel the need to believe there exists a sort of truthful closeness. But time, for its language to be coherent, is indispensable to be associated and tied to intuitive and analogical thinking.

You, just like a star shinning stronger and stronger, as you pry into everything that stimulates your imagination, through the magic unity of doubts, ambiguities, and obscurities notched in the body of an eternal matter, one that you alone care for and unknown to anyone. When you believe that you can put yourself across things that exist around for real, although their outline is unclear, in the mysticism of a world recreated bookishly, would you try to abandon everything, absolutely everything, only to define for less than a second what is visible only with the eye of an occult philosophy?

Leadership: Can you replace the value obtained in one of the equations necessary for the defining of individuality, so as to obtain a second unknown of your own existential mathematics?

The most important equation in defining my individuality was quite complex: first I had to end a certain life experience that I was unable to sustain without the intervention of an abolished knowledge of the Universe, then I had to use at all stages of life to comes into a position of power from which I can ascend no more. Of course, with the risk of staying alone in a holographic internet where all human brains are connected to a central computer capable of feeding the same collective reality.

Ioannis Angelos, the last descendant of the Byzantine dynasty of the Angelos, tried to understand the reasoning of doctor Nicholas of Cusa: "If on a point of a circle is constructed a straight tangent, and the radius increases more and more until it becomes infinite, the perimeter of the circle with merge with the straight. Therefore, the infinite, its boundlessness meets the finite, in our case, the circle with the bounded perimeter, and merges with it.

Without realizing it, I found myself in the situation exerted by an excessive fascination that needed to be put in the rightful place, among the bowels of a monster – associated with mathematical thinking, embodying wisdom and endless intelligence, for which all the wonders of the world find a certain expression in the repeated proposals of thoughts, in their raw form, in the value of the partial pressure of a quantity from the arterial blood of a primary cosmic pulse. Was the universe trying to tell me something?

Parallel to the world of science, a superior force seemed to speak through me, without me realizing that all the power I thought I held was illusory. I was too young to grasp the acceptance of finding myself in front of countless doors that no key would know how to open. The first unknown of my existential mathematics was the presence of a context of thought that served only a limited conception: "I had to know if I would keep the secrets of the location of a key belonging only to God".

The great challenge of science that leadership embraces is to embrace a very high teaching with the mind of another person in the vision of a world-maker who can be mistaken for God.

The finite of a moment of lucidity, dilated to excess by the hallucinatory fever of initiatives of finding answers to the great questions of my passing through the world, could not meet the infinite. The second unknown of my existential mathematics refers to the way of gathering all the clues from my blog testimonies written with the impetus of an artist of the passing world for the spread of supersensible knowledge so as to respond to a crazy idea: that I can, at any point, become an alternative option to the traditional view of the universe.

In order to integrate leadership in the concepts that have the power to change lives you must be open to an independent thinking capable of sustaining, in a certain sense of convergence, to a limit of an extreme of the dimension of rationality in a broadened horizon. Leadership means to trace firmly your advancing towards a new arrangement of what you try to believe in relation to everything that surrounds you, with everything it means to be a part of a larger equation.

To obtain the second unknown of your own existential mathematics is similar with the appearances of new spaces of confrontation with yourself, between an end and another beginning, knowing that you have to return there, somewhere in time and space, as far away as possible from the rest of the world, and see if you can find yourself in what you once were.

If you manage to find yourself unchanged from the way you are now, in the mysticism of a world recreated bookishly, when you feel that a superior force seems to speak through you, only then can you consider yourself qualified to be perceived as a starting point for a very necessary recovery of the purpose of the true art of leadership: that of suggesting a new beginning, a sort of intuitive perception of the whole that mostly deeply explains life, the world, human nature, and even the universe.

The ability to suggest a new beginning of thinking in a way of speaking of the universe in the plan of existence depends on how you value your knowledge in a context like: "convince yourself to believe in a Creator that's part of who you are".

Return To Yourself is the road travelled towards an initiation in the mysteries of your own being, so as to find a plausible explanation of the way in which you have to transform in someone else more powerful to embody boundless wisdom and intelligence.

Revelations of Secret Things: Our Enemies Within

On December 05, 2010

Inner enlightenment is a personal journey, unique to everyone, that cannot be rushed or imposed from the outside.

- Could I also receive the ineffable vision?

- It could be, but no one can know the inner ways of the other, not even himself, because only after a tireless search for yourself and your own spirit do you come to know yourself enough to begin to hope that you will be able to receive inner enlightenment. Through successive lives or in one life, through asceticism and the effort of meditation, we can, however, manage to get rid of our enemies within us, to drive away our tormentors.

- Can you tell me who I am?

Leadership: Have you ever experienced an epiphany where you felt like you were beginning to understand an ineffable vision that guides your self to transcendence?

- Who are your enemies? I can only name them to you, but that does not mean that you will have the strength to drive them away, to purify your soul. The first enemy is ignorance. The second is injustice, opposite to that Maat, which is not only equity towards yourself and towards others, but also everything that is likely to brake the smooth running of the world, to destroy the balance of things. The third is envy, for it harms us more than others; it gnaws at our heart, driving away the serenity of the soul. The fourth is malice, for it pushes us to do harm to others and gives birth to injustice. The fifth is treachery, for it uses lies and deceit, which are condemned by Maat.

The sixth is avarice, for it makes you live only to possess goods, so that you are ready for all betrayals, all crimes to satisfy so fatal a passion. The seventh is sensuality, because you no longer live except for the satisfaction of the senses, you only think about the pleasure that the union of the body with another body brings, without caring about your own dignity, without avoiding the harm that -you could do to others. The eighth is anger, for it casts the soul into the greatest turmoil, banishing all dominion of our will: being seized with a fury unworthy of a divinity, the distant goddess laid waste the Earth, sowing death and terror.

Leadership: Is your mind formed enough to be able to move forward on the path of knowledge, without being disturbed by feelings considered inferior or inappropriate to your nature?

- Can a god indulge in such human feelings, which seem unworthy of his nature?

- Of course, when this god is nothing but the creation of the human mind, when it has no reality outside of people's imagination. But perhaps you will discover for yourself that the gods that people worship are nothing but creations of their minds.

- Tell me more about this, because I was always told the opposite, that the gods created men.

- It is a great blasphemy and the fruit of an incredibly naive mind if you say that a god, whoever he may be, created man in his own image, for such a god cannot have a real existence, he usurps the attributes of the god, who is totally different from both humans and animals, these being, all of them, creatures that emerged from the mists of time, following long maturations, long transformations. But your mind is not yet formed enough to go further on this path of knowledge. Let's move on to the ninth executioner of the soul: intemperance. For, like sensuality, which is an exaggerated need for pleasure, intemperance is an abuse of fermented drinks that leads to drunkenness, which causes us to lose all sense of ourselves and all control of our body and mind.

Leadership: How do you propose to continuously improve the understanding of the initial realities, overcoming the obstacles imposed by the subjective interpretation given to a limited knowledge?

The tenth is greed, because the abuse of food deforms the body and incites the soul to deepen even more in matter. The eleventh is temerity, for it inclines you to neglect all prudence - which is a great virtue - prompting you not only to risk the life of your body through criminal audacity, but also the life of your soul, through lack of measure and wisdom. It is a vice which any man destined to rule others must banish from his heart.

Finally, the twelfth is none other than error.

- I listened to you, said Neferu, but, while you brought a few brief details, regarding ten of these dangerous passions, you said nothing about ignorance, the first, and about error, the last.

- These, my son, you will find out later, down to the deepest realities. He learns, however, that ignorance is opposed to the knowledge of initial realities, the real essence of things, of the nature of the universe, and error is the false or flawed interpretation of this revelation of secret things. But for now I must confine myself to presenting these concepts to your understanding and meditation.

Wisdom consists in recognizing ignorance and striving to overcome it in order to avoid the mistakes of revelations undistorted by hidden truths.

Revelations of secret things refer to the enemies within us when we try to climb higher to the pinnacle of wisdom. Our guiding beacon is that bright sense of self-knowledge that lights our way in the darkness of doubt so that we can clearly distinguish between truth and illusion.

Reward Or Punishment, I Receive My Destiny

Seek to understand life in your entire wisdom and emotional manifestation, by relieving yourself of the fear that you lose something by allowing yourself to be what you truly are throughout it.

Upon hearing his voice that woke even the innermost fibers of his heart, Monte Cristo shuddered. His eyes met the girl's gaze and couldn't bear the glow.

- God ! God ! – said Monte Cristo – might it be true what you've let me wonder? Haydee, would you be happy if you wouldn't leave me?

- I am young – she answered gently – I love the life you've always made so pleasant for me, the life I thought I was dreaming, which you taught me how to live. And I'd hate to die...

- So, you love me? Monte Cristo felt his heart grow. He opened his arms, and Haydee rushed to his chest, shouting:

- Yes, I love you ! I love you, as I would a father, a brother, a husband ! I love you as I love my life, as I love God, for you are more beautiful, more kind and greater for me than all beings ! And, yes, I would die without you !

The tendency to reflect on your own spiritual life, on your psychic traits, on your own behavior and actions, appears with the finding of a news story that minimizes the position of power you've built for yourself.

The count awakened by a divine thrill, as if finding a secret over time, but almost immediately calms his sublime start to exemplify his delight. Various spiritual states pervade his consciousness. Its sublime sensitivity cannot be stopped by any power, rather it comes out when you master your tears from flowing when hearing good news:

- Then, let thy will be done, my sweet angel ! Answered the count. God has given me life and allowed me to defeat my enemies, God, I see all too clear that He does not want to place repentance at the end of my victory. I wanted to punish myself, but God wants to forgive me. Love me, Haydee ! Who knows, maybe your love will make me forget what I have to forget.

- What are you saying, my lord? asked Haydee.

*- I'm saying that one word of yours, Haydee, enlightened me more than twenty years of wisdom. I have but you in the world. Through you I feel bound to life, through you I can suffer, through you I can be happy... Have I glimpsed the truth, I wonder? He asked. God ! For what ! Reward or punishment, I receive my destiny. Come, Haydee, come ! ...**

Leadership: Is the opening of the others to the version of your spiritual identity capable of printing a rebirth of the feeling will from which the instinctive factor of the feeling of power is formed?

Kindness and the depth of feelings always leaves room for rapprochement between people, increasing openness and responsiveness, often having as an effect the possibility of forcing a sustained effort of understanding of the traits of a different facet of life, except the situation where the "remodeling" of its route is more formal in nature.

The image that defines the quality of life will finally be whole depending on how you will interpret the leading role in its screenplay. You will be able to become a model for which the very reason of being is represented by the mix between happiness and suffering – two close regions that reflect "light" in a good capacity, only if you manage to get close to what cannot be understood with the mind, but rather only squeezed and emaciated with something else. With spiritual warmth.

In leadership, which makes room for an involvement in the life full of force and motivation, through the release from the fear that you lose something by allowing yourself to be what you truly are throughout it, are highlighted the contradictions and oscillations of your own being subjected to a blind law – based on happiness and suffering, soul and mind.

In fact, in leadership these need to combine and complete each other in the perspective of a fulfilled expectation, in your fill wisdom and emotional manifestation – which tend to exert, one to another, a collective function, in order to reduce harsh appreciations, or even negative ones, related to what you could've been, but never were.

Leadership is the sovereign trait of life, the accentuation of a positive affective state, from which emerges the condition of maximum power of the man who knows that the true lucky star appears as a recognition of unity in the world of duality.

Reward Or Punishment, I Receive My Destiny highlights the feeling of an involvement in the existence connected to someone else, through happiness or suffering, through conscience or emotional energy.

Always the most relevant experiences are tied to what you interpret in the version of personal defining, seen as a choreography of the moods caused by others, but experienced personally at the level of a lookout "light."

Rhythm Of My Heart

On February 10, 2020

Learn to rediscover yourself in a hypostasis that you will remember with pleasure in the pure red of an immeasurable time.

I began to paint the rose, with finesse and great talent, In The Rhythm of My Heart, as I would paint myself in the vivid colors of a sublime meaning attributed to the remembrance of a life started from the very core of a non-figurative art that is perceived only through the openings of a Heideggerian metaphysics. A bright red is reserved for the tip of the petals, before they open in front of an eternal universe starting from a pure coincidence, or from a trivial resemblance to an inverted pyramid concentrated in the shape of a diamond.

The rose is the object of my observation, of my interpretation on the aesthetic level, as a kind of abstraction capable of symbolizing any possible object invested with the fervor of a holy soul. I have to sit still for hours, just like the object of my creation, knowing that we both have the power to experience the same dream from a time that relates exclusively to the phrase "Let me still exist in another place", so as to keep that feeling of "self value" in a dual universe.

Perceptual comparison calls as an artistic basis, in a way that the metaphysicians would call Asqachumensi(gratitude to the makers of the Great Union), a process of drawing with the soul, so as to capture the double movement of the trajectory of a voice, a line, sensations of shape, light, temperature, all reinforced by means corresponding to art: figure, color and orientation in space. The great art of Kabbalah deals with the perception of the exteriorization of a mystical world similar to the one you live in feeling level, but in another space and in another form.

Leadership: Can you allow yourself to be guided by the accessibility of an emotional charge that comes from a truly imagined image of how the world can look in a higher artistic plane, so that you can recognize yourself in another hypostasis?

The wind blows lightly. The sun pleasantly warms the atmosphere of a poetic realism with symbolic accents. I feel the artist's brush as it sketches my soul, before the painting gains a beautiful shape, suited for me, concentrated in the eye of a diamond that shines through a metaphorical operator: "Where the ocean meets the sky". My master told me often as he mixed colors in a mix of physical effort and mystical quest: "Play with science as you paint a soul, without ever having seen a painting before. That is the whole magic cabal ! "

The last of the Kabbalists, in life and immortality, tries a new way of integrating into other worlds, on the chorus of an affective load, belonging to the divine plan: "Burning down the bridges of my memory".

Delicate as a runaway touch, recreated by an intense brushstroke movement – doubled on the trajectory of the whole parts difference, I feel transposed into another reality by strikingly resembling the figure of an Egyptian pharaoh that suggests royal power and beauty. Others look at me in the shape of a big teary eyed and candid Bamby. It depends on the angle in which the figure and the spatial orientation are maintained in the same state of mind, open for visual-conceptual research.

I am an unusual rose that often defines the experience of controlling the space between worlds, in the same way in which the artist integrates, with the divine soul and feeling, into the main subject of his painting. The artist speaks, becomes a dialogue, becomes the binder of the worlds, a conditioned reflection of a higher order, forced to follow the course of the action of a "With the words I love you".

You can look at me as much as you want, but you will not be able to understand me with the ordinary eye of the mortal, but only through an activity analogous to the creation marked by the possibility of crossing the worlds.

Leadership: Is providing a safe and easy viewing experience for projecting an image that you can only see from a certain angle valuable by simulating the conditions for viewing a new format of reality?

You reach the recipe of creating a thing only when you understand its nature, the divine in harmony with the essence of man passed through the filter of matter. In fact, the significance of a rose can be recognized by the way in which the artist realizes the illusion of movement generated by his Alter-Ego in the form of divine spirit. And I don't know how it is done, but every time the artist tries to give me a new touch, always with the immense breath of an immortal god, I feel as if I am experiencing an illusion in a physical dimension that simply looks real to me.

Through all kinds of artistic representations, I often allow myself to combine the different elements that symbolize spiritual values: sacrifice, revelation, purity, majesty and distinction, randomly immortalized on the fine linen canvas, from various abstract forms to a gradation of brushes that gives the impression of three-dimensionality. The forms are united compositionally by a force mobilizer "Love may still be alive", but also visually interpreted as having only one meaning: Elscogrellar(imagining an unusual writing).

Light up my darkness ! The only condition for viewing another reality is to transform myself into a beautiful dream that repeats itself, into a higher plane from which to look at my life as if I were at the cinema.

I am an unusual rose because the red of a divine blood flows in me that demands externalization in ever more intense thoughts and experiences. While the world admires my appearance, but completely ignores the depth, the unifying force of the coherent figure used symbolically in a specific space, sheltered from other relationships or social interactions, the artist remembers his destiny on the stretch of canvas so revealing, dominated by the secret teaching of Papus:

"As in the invisible man circulate fluids and cells (blood and nervous fluids), active factors of the body, so in the Invisible Nature circulate forces and beings, active factors of the physical plane. The occultist who has found in man the existence of an astral body, factor and conservator of organic forms, does not stop in the study of Nature at the physio-chemical forces or at the results of evolution. He knows that these visible things are nothing more than the result of invisible principles for our senses."

Leadership: Do you manifest your sensitivity to the receiver's perception of his high mission as Creator, faithfully rendering your image seen through an analogy with the term "resurrection in another plane"?

The great science can only be perceived by the means of artistic expression in the field of a perfect means of analogy: "As in heaven, so on earth." In this case, the rose is personified in an artist who knows how to accurately reproduce the image of divinity obtained through a striking analogy with a spirit word: "With the words I love you".

Perhaps from the point of view of cabal, however, I am the equal of God, because I know how to be a rose painted with the soul of a genius artist, and because my soul knows very well how to make the transition into other worlds and other universes through artistic means. But today's world has forgotten the noble significance of art, because the world itself has lost the coordinates of its significance in the universe. Only artists can bring salvation and immortality to light. And if it had been determined before the providence, humanity could have never experienced the wonder of transformation.

The artist who knows how to reveal his sensitivity by integrating himself into the life of a rose, also knows that Jesus is a parable chosen with debate by the old Kabbalists. Son of God has risen from the dead because he knew how to turn, changing the composition of the solid spirit, and vice versa. Therefore, it is essentially about how you can integrate yourself into two similar worlds: through spirit, through deification, through salvation, through call to incarnation, reincarnation, resurrection and ascension into heaven.

The artist is the personification of a rose, being a receptacle for emotions that come from everywhere: from heaven, from the earth, from a piece of paper, from a transient form, from a spider's web, or from a sound wave. Picasso knew this best, before moving in time, before embedding himself in me. And I brought art back to the forefront of the highest science.

Leadership, from an artistic perspective, is sustained by the idea that an image can remain imprinted in the memory of the world and of time as long as its Creator departs from reality to go into the depths of a vast cosmology.

Rhythm Of My Heart is the consequence of the breathlessness that arises from the merging of two realities, different in substance and manifestation, the immediate and the long-lasting, in order to reach a common denominator called "artistic construction".

To love art means to look at God's wonderful creation with the eye of an artist capable of spontaneously capturing that actuality that has the chance to withstand the test of time.

Rich Man, Find The Poor Again

On December 14, 2014

Realize a return to what you were, before to regain your superiority in who you've become.

"My judgement now lacks the precise weighing of the past, because I revisit the past from the other end of the horizon. Indeed, the more I move forward, the past, similar to the landscape you cross, fades away as you depart. The same happens to me as it happens to the people that get hurt in their dreams: they see and feel their wound, but they do not remember when it happened.

Reborn man, rich full of oddities, man who sleeps with his eyes open, all powerful visionary, invincible millionaire, look again upon the fateful road of the miserable and starving life, again go through the paths in which destiny pushed you to, where misery drove you to and despair received you.

Too many diamonds, too much gold and too much happiness shine now in the waters in which Monte Cristo sees his past self through the deepest darkness, Édmond Dantes. Remember ! Remove the diamonds, smear the gold, wipe the rays. Rich man, find the poor again. Free man, find the prisoner again. You, the reborn, find the corpse again."

And having kept telling himself all this, Monte Cristo walked along Caisserie street. It was the same street where, twenty-four years before, he was taken by the silent and nocturnal guards. The houses with the cheerful and animated look were dark that night, silent and closed.

*- And yet, I am the same, murmured Monte Cristo. Only that it was dark that night and now it is broad daylight. The sun is the one that brightens and cheers all. **

Leadership: How magnificent is the image you are creating on the "experience" relationship to the experience of life, as expressed in an add-on of critical reflection on the interactions between Choice and Destiny?

Sometimes we have to take several steps back to see the big picture. Recognizing what we really are, grouping certain meanings of life brought into contact with a stronger Ego, can charge us with more motivation.

This too is a way of discovering our personality, strengths and weaknesses, but not a certainty of healing from the syndrome called "split personality" that can influence our path followed through life. A personality that wants to be different from others. And a personality that struggles with the fear of losing itself, of remaining trapped in a reality in which nothing makes sense.

The only way to achieve a high-level experience that will allow you to exceed yourself (the main ingredient of personal development), is to not let yourself be led by that filled consciousness that negatively fuels your mood, which permanently whispers you to stop in your tracks and slum it out under the blanked of a relative stability – of the abundance that doesn't spill its overflow.

A form of mental reflection of the objective world, characterized by a dry rationality and by the fear of your own identity, does not permit you to understand the imperfections, but rather exerts a bad influence over your performance indicators.

Psychologist Paul Slovic from the University of Oregon said: "You need your feelings to check an analysis and you need an analysis to keep your feelings in check."

Leadership: Are you willing to rethink your way of relating to yourself by using the "Load Extended" command so that the motivation with which you face the trials of life will know an upward trend?

Prior to contributing to the expansion of leadership, highlighted by your quality of not being noticed by others for various defects, remember how important it is to self-evaluate and correctly shape yourself, "clinging" to the past that tested you and brought you to this point. Differences, of course, appear between what is mainly achievable and what is not otherwise possible, but it is nonetheless a way to better find yourself within your own authenticity.

The command "Extended Load" allows jumping into a time of unpredictability, of mishaps you had to experience as if they were natural for future changes.

Crossing this oppressive space, returning to a time of a still undecided destiny, you will remember to live, to risk and to again bite with great appetite from those days life lays out for you. To live by that supreme hope of reconciliation with yourself, with the world and time, is a way of passing the harsh test of life trials and to push the limits of your own thinking towards the good you have to reach. This is a form of greatness that a leader must show.

The greatness that influences leadership is represented by the way of dealing with God in trying to resonate with that which defines you to the end of your life so that you do not force your destiny to take you where there is no need for you: towards regret and vanity.

Rich Man, Find The Poor Again is a metaphor that highlights that relationship between causality and effect, showing that man wasn't placed in the center of the world to easily look upon what happens around him, and also not to become complacent in that state of slavery of his own struggle, but rather to know himself.

Adding a word from philosophical doctrines, "man must know himself to see what he knows and what he does not know, and then to thoroughly prepare to acquire knowledge, only thus hoping to become wise, so as to judge others as well."

Romulus' Victory

On April 21, 2009

Masterfully dose your leadership, to reach to people's consciousness and change them.

For the first time in their lives, Eliot and Romulus, father and son, are face to face, hating one another as poison. Romulus had carefully planned his every move. He sat down at a table, turned his head towards the old man and gazed at him, stubbornly fixing his eyes on the old man's wrinkled profile. He concentrated all his power into his stepfather's eyes, as if the fire of his eyes could make a hole in his skull.

All kinds of scenarios were invading Eliot's mind. To what extent is it possible for all his imagined scenarios to happen? To a little extent? Sometimes, it is useful to have a clear picture of the true disaster, because it can give you a clear image of the true disaster, the necessary confidence to take risks. The truth is that Romulus was used, being trained from early childhood in espionage activities and in all his dirty actions. But the worst thing was that he killed Remus, Romulus' brother and his second son.

Romulus still had him in front of his eyes, deliberately imitating all his gestures. Coherence, order and a source of motivation were behind this imitation of gestures, tics and silence. Eliot was discouraged and ready to give everything up. After all, he was a crazy old man who had forgotten his son. But he was still the head of CIA, being quite skilled and agile in thinking. He didn't want to let himself seized by panic. In an effort to control himself, he tried to imagine things in the best possible light. But he had no idea how evil and patient could Romulus be.

Finally, psychologically defeated by Romulus' attitude, Eliot stands up from the table and leaves the room. It was the first defeat in the life of a man devoid of feelings, who controlled his moods better than anyone, who was able to master complexity and confusion.

Leadership: Can identifying the need to be an influencer be a way of positioning your mind to engage thinking along the path of interrogation about human meaning in a trap of illusion?

Do you have the courage to enter a new field? In leadership, ups and downs aren't always the same thing. Those who contribute to your success, to the improvement of your leadership qualities can be just the ones taking you down.

In the movie "Brotherhood of the Rose (1989)", Romulus turned from a simple docile doer into a proficient initiator. His leadership potential wouldn't have had dynamic force if he hadn't created a lever that would increase the efficiency to a maximum. How did he manage to do that? Just as any leader who struggles to do something, he entered a new, difficult, but catching field. Using an appropriate persuasion strategy, he managed to make a good game, physically defeating his own stepfather, who was considered "the bottom pillar" of the CIA.

If the eyes are the mirror of the soul, then man will be responsible to the outside when his inner part will reflect the potential for a feeling of gratitude to someone or something. Therefore, your attitude of superiority can become an obsession transformed into a mask of the illusion of one's own thinking, if it does not have as a point of support the feeling of unity. This is exactly what happened to Eliot, even though he was the head of the CIA. His lack of affection easily led him into a realm of illusion in which he could dominate his feelings by detaching himself from anything, any person, or any situation.

Leadership: Are you able to consciously attempt to repress the feelings that have taken over your thoughts by casting an accusatory glance at a person who is the main subject of your life experiences?

The mistake, which turned out to be a blessing, belongs to Eliot. He produced the change of Romulus' leadership structure, by not observing the values that he, himself, grafted in his son. It's just like teaching someone the traffic rules, but not observing them yourself. In Eliot's case, it was like he would have injured Romulus on the crossing, thus waking up his consciousness.

What about you? Does someone need to wake you up to reality? Does someone have to dig you in the ribs, trip you and get you injured, for you to become conscious and aware of your potential?

One of your duties as a leader is to make an inventory of just this kind of qualities that infuse with your structure. You must learn to wisely dose your feelings and lucidity determined by reason. If you let yourself overwhelmed by emotions and manifest them all the time, it means you are a weak person, which might harm you on long term.

As a football player is characterized by motor agility and integration in the team game, so your leadership must be characterized by agility of thinking, spirit and conscience, as well as their handling, for you to integrate in their strategic game of your own character, which is specially built and rebuilt to achieve maximum effect on your areas of interest and to reach a greater area of influence.

Masterly dose your leadership, to reach to people's consciousness and change them.

Leadership results from your ability to share a self-management experience (self-awareness and self-control) in terms of the relationship between what sets you apart in the eyes of others and what you intend to communicate through non-verbal messages.

Romulus' Victory is nothing less than the victory of every man who aspires to become a leader. Everyone can change his own level of thinking and action. Only the decision to go to the limit of your potential will help you achieve a leadership level that others are unable to reach.

Conclusion: Any victory can become a failure, as every failure can turn into victory. This requires a constant analysis of your own structure, potential and, especially, the actual situation faced by an aspiring leader. It also requires learning from others' experience and mistakes, as well as applying some appropriate methods in unexpected situations. Therefore, a leader must feel when something goes wrong, to be in permanent alert in order to develop his ability of quick response.

Roses Have A Background Experienced At Great Heights

The Great Science is what you say to a rose, naturally, so that it feels abundantly endowed with the gift of speech.

It's as simple as talking to you, as simple as it is for me to talk to myself, without anyone around hearing us. And if I knew how to be simpler in expression, with more power in a writing without variety, then surely you would admire my words for their simplicity. I add a clarification here: for me you meant a friendship experienced at the majestic height of the eternity of art, which gives free reign to innocent youth, to the fulfilled dream of a colorful artist.

In this way, whether the hand moves away or closer to an object, the eyes always see it in the same light of an easy-care shrub, which if you embrace it with your mind, thought, voice, soul, you feel carried in a fairytale land in which summers last for decades, so where space and time acquire their own logic. Thus, the rose came to represent a continuation of my story over the centuries, but also the first step of exposing what I write.

As for the distant ones, nothing can limit the sight of what is close. The rose appeared out of nowhere in my life, as a desire arises from a bouquet of roses that charms you at first sight, or perhaps from a simple consideration of an isolated phenomenon, da un semplice punto di vista visivo, thanks to which I learned that the connection between the beauty of art and the so-called beauty of nature means to distinguish the difference between the initial image and that obtained by inspiration at every step.

Leadership: Does your creation express those things or ideas that speak to you about the act of perception of external reality, supported by the image as a representation of one Self in relation to the Other?

Me, myself and the "Double Delight" rose form a chain whose main link is the reflection of a deep reality in a mirror with illumination and zoom, of which art, the exercise of the spirit, the processes of changing reality, are just a reflection of an inner state or situation of inspiration. But this impression of authenticity, that everything is something natural, greater than greatness itself, varies proportionally with the distance between me and myself, between ideal and reality, because imagination decreases or increases in the same proportions.

It is just that. Self-consciousness escapes into oblivion and derision in the face of a Work that leaves you speechless, but which regenerates itself incessantly in the spiritual world through stretching, materiality and strong contrasts of color. More precisely, this Work is distinguished by the materiality of a reality that constructs its meaning outside the intrinsic meaning of life, from that matter of words that is of the same origin as the form of a particular creation.

And that is why the rose is the result of my words, entirely dedicated to art. Because thanks to it I saw a vast space from sight to vision, from sight to the desire to touch, from contemplation to empathy. In it, in this miniature universe, permeates everything that is truer and more alive in my being, the motive for performing an act of beauty, in connection with the triggering of an imaginative interpretation of the viewer that surprises us both with a reaction such as: "Look for those things that speak to your heart."

Leadership: Can the source of your creation be attached to the knowledge of a theme that does not disappear in time, but evolves with the uniqueness of your model of visualization of a more comprehensive self-image?

Sometimes I discern in the existence of the rose, having a daily dialogue with it, as if by virtue of an "avant-garde conscious act", the will to crystallize a *Parexpriothyss*conception according to which the artist's attention should not be directed only to the permanent exercise of attitudes of responsibility towards nature and environment. But, especially, to the virtue of enriching one's vision by allowing intellectual access to the mechanisms of functioning of inner reality.

From the same sphere of meanings attributed to the reality that I discovered with the help of the rose, from which *Occulta Philosophia*feeds, is part of the theme of the novel "The Philosopher's Stone", written by Marquerite Yourcenar, when at some point we meet, in a completely transient manner, a rather interesting character:

"Man agreed to for there to be an opening for him of a happy or unhappy immortality for which he was directly responsible, but not to be surrounded everywhere by an eternal duration of which he was and at the same time was not part. It was Origen's error, the eternity of the soul, which led to indignation because it reduced the immediate adventure to nothing."

We are dealing here with that part of the soul which is, by its nature, attached to the knowledge of a theme which does not disappear in time, but evolves with the uniqueness of my model of visualizing an image of great art. It is, in particular, an image that captures the duration of an emerging state of mind, never quite tense, making the transition from virtual to real, and this state manages to materialize in an act of perception of the feeling of otherness.

Alterity means being someone you deserve to meet whenever you want to be alone, with yourself, in a way full of originality (and full of meaning).

Roses Have A Background Experienced At Great Heights if we think that each artist has his own world that represents the cognitive value of a creation meant to include, in its horizon of beauty and significance, the soul, to stir and delight it with echoes that last beyond the bounds of the moment.

Rough Boy

Increase the aesthetic value of the work you promote by referring to a fragment from the structure of the human spirit permeated by that expression of artistic receptivity capable of being a pure notion of a particular existence.

The visionary commitment I have pursued throughout my entire life, full of glory akin to a path upon which only pure spirits step, was that to not compromise with everything in the modernist world of art that represents the avalanche of kitsch or "second-hand" performances. Gimme just a minute and I'll tell you why !

Basically, I was faced with the addiction of being a story character trapped in the trap of the enchanting mirage of the second philosophy exposed to the deceptive verbiage of the theory, being stimulated only by that painter's preference for the abstraction of form, raising the color to the rank of "moral substance", carrier of the expression of the humane, introduces a certain fragility and suavity that says about him more than he would have desired.

There is a courage born only of pride, linked to that addiction to the context of a writing experience that marks the literary use of words as weapons of victory for an indisputable creed that would say: "Never retreat, not even for a moment ! "

Leadership: Does your creation subtly preserve the traces of vanity in a certain context of time and space, shaping a unique and impactful vision, rather than conquering by brute force?

Of course, the comparison and parallelism with a great conqueror, like Genghis Khan, is immediately imposed. While he was conquering territory by territory with his sword full of blood, the artist in me struck with such expressive force the great literature of the 21st century until the shields of defense of moralists became useless.

The extraordinary intellectual originality that distinguishes me from other artists, putting together the details of a hard and systematic work of imposing an Art Nouveau of a spiritual blessing, at the same time burdened by a spiritual mystery framed in a certain context of time and space, leaves to be seen an extremely emotional message affirmed with so much energy in its expressive purity: "I do not keep the traces of any minimal vanity in me."

I still needed to prove that I deserved the trust of the great titans of literature, to dare a passage of despair of harsh habits, even if I was afraid of my weaknesses in the style of expression. And I had to do it in the manner of a painter who conveys exactly what he sees, serving himself more arbitrarily of color just to express himself more strongly. I am the one who can fade the heat, the one they all say just can't be beat.

Leadership: Do you constantly update your artistic approach by analyzing the realities of the contemporary world through a syncretic journey that takes into account the fascination of an apparently exhaustive expression designed to extrapolate observations from the individual to the general?

When you try to express yourself in a literary fashion, but against the way of painting of the artist who is fertilized only by image, background, color, sensation and appearances to facilitate the process of understanding art, slowly, your credibility begins to bear a new name:

Kitsch or Debauchery. Ain't got no rap, ain't got no line.

Be a painter of great finesse before exemplarily choosing the words that can beat time in the writing space. The authenticity of writing is built with the technique of time by a watchmaker turning the spring and then letting the clock work alone.

I'm a rough boy. Inflexible on the right path of quality, I have gained the support of the untold truth of an unparalleled experience without making conformist concessions to the unusual communication of equivocal contents, but chosen as a means of finding distinct features of art, the miraculous findings of ancient understandings that go beyond the current ones.

Leadership: Does your art assert its power in purity of expression, using expressiveness to reach new horizons?

Images full of flavor, touched by the sensibility of a mystical spirituality of unique beauty, ready to take back the generous investment that evoked a real and fabulous world at the same time, could at any time materialize in a fragment of an illusion which will always remain a dream shattered by memories.

So, I have extended the notions of a high artistic education from my own findings and continuing to assign them connotations designed in the light of the outer world.

In the era of super-intelligent technology, moments of freedom, the moment of relaxation, the body full of sweat of a delicate and sentient creature always takes place on the easel's cloth. As the writing continues its journey beyond the window of the magician's modest cottage, exploring new frontiers of aesthetics in the spotlight, with more daring decoration and costumes.

Leadership: Can the meaning you give to an isolated element be correlated with other elements that from that moment constitute together with the first an ensemble called "form of domination masked under the appearance of improvisation"?

Once again, I have to wonder what happens to the soul of someone experiencing a certain experience in a new universe, when reason makes a too strict examination even from the "here" and "elsewhere" ideas from the distance of a comparison with some of the most impenetrable fantasy consumption rules.

I don't care how you look at me / Because I'm the one and you will see.

As the final retort of a dialogue between the passing existence of the mortal and the eternity of the universe, to which is added ecstasy in front of the cold heavens, the gigantic metaphysical, always renewing process of identity and alterity under the dome of beauty is justified by the need to encompass strong feelings of the lyrical ego, such as regret and the starting point, the place where I left, which I cannot forget and which I must always respect.

The hero of the novel "Lolita" said at one point: "I have such masterfully embodied the tranquility of extreme despair, the silence of the morning before an outburst of insanity, that the Farlows have taken me to their home."

If the way to expose an idea, a theory, a story, a matter that intrigues the world is related to the root of things reinforced by the phrase "to establish a reality of another fact", then you will understand the syncretic foundations of my creation on the wavelength of a lyricism of another formula and depth that impresses through the refinement with which the facts, the world's states of affairs enter.

Through artistic spirit I have dominated my reactions and feelings, under the appearance of improvisations springing from a superior sense of beauty as a partitional value (expressing the idea of part of a whole or the whole of which a part was taken) and from a human flock which was not subject to restrictions on artistic experience.

In art, it is excluded the insertion of expressions that gather active sensations, encourage the "reflection that projects in infinity", but which do not sufficiently emphasize the value of certain border phenomena with other worlds and other realities.

Rough Boy is the expression of artistic receptivity capable of being a pure notion of private existence, because it calls for unbelievable comparisons in images and symbolic associations of high degree of credibility, sometimes a little exaggerated, but which can increase knowledge, intensify the feelings and introduce an extra of existence into an increasingly dynamic reality in the process of transforming a topic into a wider debate.

Run With Us

On November 06, 2016

Begin developing under the guidance of a tremendous power from which you can deduce not only the existence of the Supreme Being from yourself, but above all the truth that betrays your emotions and your true personality.

In the infinity of silence, are howling powerfully the voices of thoughts that come to my aid, their waves circling around the world, like circuits oscillating between positive and negative with their own frequency resonance, tuned to different, specific values of the hazard: You can run with us ! We got everything you need ! After a careful examination of these voices, as in a painting full of symbols, hence the idea of beauty dialogues with myself, I realize that silence corresponds to the need to know myself through the relationship with art, with the character of a work that continues to seek their meaning between dream and reality.

Of course, in any artistic image you can distinguish a voice of the artist who calls you, who makes you jump, who braves through the centuries just to keep up with what makes you unique. I evolve between something above emotion and something above desire, something that cannot be named by what is happening within me when I scream my storms of anger at the boundary between the logical and fantastical, between what is real and what is a dream, without any subtle change occurring out of the blue. Do not be afraid / You're not alone.

Just as a weapon always gives a weak man self-assurance, as there is always a magical solution of affirmation for an inflamed heart in which the spirit of adventure reigns, so too exists a wavelength, perceived by the eyes as having only one color called fear, and verifies the relationship manifested in an attempt to be more than what you are: Don't be afraid / Wipe that fear from your eyes ! / And if you feel you're going under / We'll be around.

Leadership: Can the form that gives your creation a certain orientation be linked to the voice of your choice to be placed in a space of inspiration that experiences its untouched deep intimacy?

Fearful, I dive into a moment of metaphysical curiosity and try to rise to the surface fully charged with the echo of an encouraging voice – the echo of an adventure, as if, under the guidance of an immense power, I could have inferred the existence of the Supreme Being from within myself. Between fear, doubt and courage there is that "naivety", a relative of curiosity that always provides a lucrative direction to my own vitality, igniting all obsolete patterns to center my identity around a great purpose.

Art is the voice with which I tell my life story in a painting made by the Supreme Being within me, while another life flows in parallel much faster. I begin to think that there exists a greater originality of expression, a more receptive conductor in receiving enlivening energy, to occupy a more prominent place in the poetry of a state of mind, to the extent of my strenuous character. A kingdom that cannot be shaken, carefully built to the tone of the lyrics: When you're behind closed doors / All alone by yourself / And you're longing inside / To be somebody else.

In art, it is impossible to understand your experiences if, first of all, you do not experience your deep intimacy through the subjective experience of temporality or the encounter with the unmeasured, translated as a wonder in the face of your own inner tensions. The content of spiritual life is a peak of the artist's maturity creation. Do not be afraid to place yourself, at least apparently, at the forefront of the obscure infinite, leaving shadows in the night, as if endlessly hard on yourself, with what reality means. And you become aware of your exaggerated feelings relative to certain times and situations, cause there's still time... to change your mind.

Leadership: Is your attitude, expressed through a connection with the development of the spirit of adventure, is it surpassed by the suggestion of an atmosphere that gives a distinctive note to your inner manifestation?

Humbert Humbert, Nabokov's hero from the novel "Lolita", tells his torments, desires, dreams, aspirations just as he knows them in order to get rid of them:

And I looked at her. I watched and understood clearly, as I know I'm going to die, that I loved her as I did not love anything I had ever seen or imagined on the ground, or I had hoped to meet elsewhere. Now she is nothing more than the faint breeze of the violet and the echo of the dead leaf of the nymph over which I have rolled over with such cries in the past. The echo on the edge of a vigorous passion that betrays itself, diluting into mist or melting into a chaos of mysticism.

But thank you God, I did not worship only this echo.

No method of human research, folded (in a first instance) on the means and possibilities of responding to various demands of control in the sphere of mental activity, by diverting emotions and the transformation from the negative to the positive, cannot be performed without the presence of a certain form of reciprocity, based on an external action.

Reciprocity is that constant need for self-finding that stretches between what you give out most from yourself to relate differently and constructively to the world around you, and what you learn from yourself when you do not hide your dependence to a burning and refined passion, to a particular state of energy.

Leadership: Can you relate to the beautiful in you by highlighting in art a word addressed to the content of the spiritual life of a Creator, referring to the power to materialize it in a unique work by interpreting your defining characteristic?

The mode of manifestation of each human being is the effect of the echo of an adventure, when it develops under the guidance of an immense power from which it can deduce not only the existence of the Supreme Being from itself, but above all, the truth that betrays its emotions and the true personality. Through the way you manifest yourself inwardly, the effect of the echo of inspirational power is produced, which guides the existence of an emotion in the joy of Creation experienced as a kind of liberation from everything that belongs to the surrounding world.

And leadership, along with the formation of a positive attitude, does not have as a top shelf note the close unity between the role and importance of this truth in the process of personality formation, but above all that side of curiosity that offers a lucrative direction to its own vitality, igniting all obsolete patterns in order to center your identity around a great purpose.

The Supreme Being, attributed to a character modeled between fear, doubt and courage, is the result of a perpetual search for causes and approaches of the limits of your power to turn yourself into what you want to be. After all, the beautiful in you can be brought to the forefront of art by a word addressed to the content of the spiritual life of a unique creator: "Intimacy" or the challenge of understanding yourself, of self-perfecting in the path of loneliness.

The atmosphere that gives a distinction to your way of manifestation, in which you experience the whims of the highest experiences, is dominated by the effective ways of directing your energy and attention to your future goal, which in turn helps your subconscious remain focused on the desired result.

The defining characteristic of a being that is self-perfecting from the perspective of its inner self is that it is considered, sometimes involuntarily, the interpreter of the intentions of the creative artist who tries to expand his point of view on the contemplation of his intellect.

Run With Us is the urge of consciousness and feeling of not giving up on what you really love, on what binds you to the past, on what you have in excess: the passion that chains you, the energy to feel at ease, to enjoy life, to reinvent yourself, to manifest yourself more confidently in any situation. In response to that echo of questions, transformed into a nest of despair, trapped in your heart, which helps you understand what suits you best to walk faithfully on the road of rebirth.

Sadeness

On June 10, 2017

Consolidate your position as a facilitator of a memorable experience from the perspective of what you exist in an undefined space.

A ray of light, reflected by a crystal embedded in the upper part of the wall that holds me prisoner in the earthly space, not allowing me to show myself to the world as it is in the will of universal laws, warms my thoughts, crosses my spirit and clarifies what I need to do to make my feelings speak for me.

Significantly, I write in the prolongation of a previous metaphysical construction that allows me to rise up to the level of sublime knowledge, experimenting with the manifestation of my own pulses and experiences. I feel as an unshaken conviction spurs out of every word, always tied to another meaning from unfinished phrases. The awakening of the infinite Ego consciousness, more than the reflex of a wonderful dream, is kept away from the world.

It is like tasting a much larger mystery than the one reserved for the spectacle of a reality that constantly self-regenerates from the hidden meaning of an arbitrary metaphor. This brings with the novelty of random events, transformed into a subject with an occult, a dexterity that only the rebellious operation of curiosity requires for things not forbidden by all-knowing providence.

Always a work subjected to the unseen, the expression of the greatest degree of conscience's despair, "The Virtue of Vice and The Vice of Virtue" has its laws, conditions, principles, and its secret agents. It results from too many randomly combined actions and influences, too diverse to compose Georg Lukacs' empiricism, the construction of an original aesthetic vision, the coordinates of prospective, fluid, artistic thinking.

Leadership: Do you affirm your fidelity to what is gained by inspiration and revelation when you make the transition to another world?

I feel as everything moves with me, like a carousel that defies time through a slow, but continuous rotation, despite my will. And I fall asleep. Sleep creates a composition that is much quieter and easier to look at from the spirit of the universe's direction. A mystic of the beginnings of great books, from an undefined space-time.

The pen falls smoothly like the advent of a separation of life in the silence of a room where there is nothing else but a drop from the artist's soul, an extract of the passing condition in search of the last destination. Even during a sudden sleep, where the colors represent changes in the sense of vision affected by the light of a star, I am the servant of an endless lust to meet a new adventure.

Without my will I cross the PORTA MAGICA, driven by an invisible force. Darkness hides behind the curtain the sadness of a confidence in something that does not allow a direct approach: "In nomine Christi, Amen ! " I come to the shrouded land of Symbolism from the Renaissance era, in a place full of illustrious figures, statues as guardians in the night, as if you are coming face to face with the original sin to connect with the eternal. The same theme that governs the novel "The Mystery of the Cathedrals", which Fulcanelli deciphers up to a point.

The composition of portraits is characterized by a less unified character, followed by a doubt that asks me to explore them from the angle of a realistic epistemology and an evolutionary ontology. Everything is enveloped by the wisdom of the inscriptions, which contain a certain thirst for knowledge and expression, under a certain signature: DAT JVSTVS FRENCH SVPERBIS (The right man keeps the proud at bay).

The position of facilitator of a memorable experience, through the prism of what you exist in an undefined space, is characterized by the manifestation of the endless appetite to accept a new adventure. In which you can discover the depth of a higher vision by inventing your own concepts of a single reality.

Slowly, whispers to me the voice of a violin in the context of a story full of symbols: "What is it that you seek? The rightness of wrong?" What accompanies a boundless perplexity. I begin to understand the man who, ever since he was alive, has taken all necessary steps to hide his identity. He wanted to disappear from the face of science, and his stone work had only the elevated title of the Rosicrucianism.

I feel that something in me is severely lacking, that something unusual happens elsewhere than at the top of dream-minded thoughts. Then I suddenly wake up.

Great knowledge is a powerful potion of spiritual truth obtained through revelation, during a lucid dream: the fact that you dream and while the dream is happening you can control what is happening in it. With the only benefit of the teaching of the hermetic science, the gold of the wise: to make you unseen, to disappear from the foreground of the life of the world. And going deeper into the revealing light of a star with multiple meanings.

The true wealth that will accompany you forever is the knowledge you attach to a context of remembrance: remember by interpreting the deep meaning of a revelation produced in a state of altered consciousness.

Background music and the video for "Sadeness" always sparks my imagination, makes me fall asleep in a deep sleep and always wake up more meaningful and fuller of revelations, assembled and retained the gold of the wise after the proportion of light received from a time beyond this world.

Saltwater

You will never appreciate a form of existence of perfection if you do not feed from the depths of its boundlessness.

Throughout my life I have made restless remarks about high dreams, great ambitions for an artist of the word and of eternal beauty, whose significance can only be given by the sea. This force of nature, full of a subtle poetry of movements of the waves, with the brilliance and framing of their sound, keeps its splendid splendor over the times of the Iliad and Odyssey.

The unending endlessness of the song of the sirens and the faded voice of the poet, a metaphor, seems to be capable of orchestrating the composition of many lives, of uniting worlds or of absorbing them in an endless abyss. One thought seems to whisper about love and faith through the mysterious appearance of an ineffable harmony that will be lived in the form of oceanic happiness: to go on a long journey that ticks as a destination the unread realms of the mythical universe.

Immersing myself in dreams, as the fine sand plunges into the vast sea, unknown and yet so familiar, I feel as if I am adopting a way of moving from one reality to another, a projection of perspective on the experience of circumscribing a line of contouring a spatial area, defining it out of a form of association imposed by the multitude of thoughts within a vibrant art.

For a moment that resembles eternity, a rebirth to something other than what was before, I am in possession of secrets gathered over the ancient times when living and thoughts merged into a single land.

Everything that perishes in me seems to revert from the creative force of the navigation experience into a virtual space, accepted by immortality as an old document, in the forms that only the sea song and the solos of the summer breeze know. The rise of a solemn love or the sunset of a torrid day are suggested in a synthetic, evanescent but charming manner in a composition made up of colorful spots, predominantly blue and green, opposite to the act of drawing new horizons of dream and hope.

Leadership: Are you turning to a new version of personal transformation, using the intense echoes of an endless WHOLE to capture images from that difficult to access part of a reality received only from an artistic standpoint?

When the artist contemplates the endlessness of the sea, immanent to the processes of perception of its depth reflected through comparisons and other figures of speech (the visual ability to perceive the size of each moment), it isolates the form and content of the entire universe as an existence separate from the background of the surrounding beauty's extension.

This is how for someone like me, caught in the gear of words whose effect of the surreal possesses an endless potential of expressiveness, the measure of understanding life resides in the vivid curiosity of those who sink into an abyss without end, and suddenly spring forth like a torrent in a creative expression. One is to observe a reality, another thing entirely to live in it.

The message so skillfully camouflaged by a sort of summary of the times brought by the waves into a transparent bottle of the rear-view mirror appears to me in the red light of the twilight and seems as clear as can be to me: I am far too small in world that is far too big. Only the painting, through its desire to recreate the materiality of the space modeled in the depths, goes to the ambitions of a theory of extending beyond the sound of the sea, where the aroma of distances is felt.

The sea both frightens you and offers you moments of sunshine, it offers you storms and wonderful oases of tranquility. The full knowledge of this wise colossus, unfolding its arms to the shore as if to test its resistance, grinding its edges anyway, is the example that for so many centuries the elders give to the young: never will you be able to evaluate a masterpiece if you do not contribute to its perfection, immortality and godliness.

Leadership: Do you try to prove your true creative power by remaining at the "finding" stage of full compatibility through the requirements of an eternal present that is updated by the most intense experiences?

For who knows how many times now I feel the strange need to walk in the footsteps of Ulysses or Dionysus, like wandering stars, listen to the flute of the sea, to be the wind blowing you further than your destiny allows, to venture beyond the patience of time. Just to impress in an unequivocal writing the idea of spiritual fluidity.

The sea has a single penetration formula that everyone feels, but only explorer Jacques-Yves Cousteau has found the right words to express it with such stylistic refinement: "once she cast her spell, she keeps you in her grasp forever."

As an ancient philosopher, the sea dominates me through moralizing teachings, talking to me from the outpouring of a pain that concerns me exclusively, from the extent of the symbolic relationships she can express as a means of language (configuration and expression) of the art of painting, the speculative game of consciousness on the limits of being. All these are sublimated in a seismic vibration that unleashes the high tension of the most complex experiences: dream and imagination.

She responds to the aspirations of simple hearts, but only to those who measured her abyss.

If I had to describe myself in a few "oceanic" terms, I would find myself lucky, moving the cursor of interpretation from the artistic towards the psychological, philosophical and existential. And I would attribute, with some trace of culpability, a divine right, representing the unquestionable qualities of an agitated reality, as a tribute to loneliness that thus acquires the creative and founding function: the right of succession to a content full of puzzles that can only be deciphered through an esoteric knowledge.

Leadership: Are you able to decipher your content full of feeling in one impact area of an endless stretch that overcomes all the adversities of a destiny that pursues you without your knowing?

With tender care, eager to clarify her feelings, the sea brings to my attention a small piece of Emperor Hadrian's vast inner speech who remembered his life with a stray, grave, ravaged air dominated by a moralizing passion:

"In the old days, when I was contemplating my own end, like a self-conscientious rudder, but trembling for the passengers and the load of the ship, I was bitterly telling myself that this memory would sink with me. The young being, embalmed with care within the depths of my memory, seemed to me that it would have to perish a second time. But fear, so justifiable, subsided in part. I compensated that early death in what manner I could. An image, a reflex, a weak echo will last for at least a few centuries. As far as immortality is concerned, nothing more can be done."

The Sea seeks the formation of a reflexive spirit, pours out the meanders of an exemplary destiny for the alternative of death in a single sense immortalized in immortality, through a visual identity, through a sort of its abstract, austere essence, without corporality, possessing an endless potential of expressivity.

When I will have the opportunity again, I will certainly return to contemplate the eyes of an artist armed with the claims of a demiurge who takes the risk of turning painting into a space of purity of the creative act as a more direct communication between the sensibility of a world in full rebirth and the story of a repeating dream.

It has a quantity, it crosses the recurrent cycle of evaporations, clouds and rains, has warmth, has depth, hides an inestimable treasure, has a sanctifying power, has therapeutic effect, has a borderless experience, has a special ecology, has strength, sensitivity, charm, meaning. It has everything you need to turn you into a Ulysses endowed with the amazing quickness of the brush and the mind. And it still teaches you an important lesson of leadership:

You will never appreciate a form of existence of perfection if you do not feed from the depths of its boundlessness.

Saltwater suggests the content of a charming sea that sheds her blue at the same point, in her uninterrupted and unimpeded flow into a much larger ocean called Time, which the universe has always outlined, and mankind can barely understand it.

Sanctimoris

Discover the unknown aspects of your being, so that you successfully go through the important stages of total and permanent becoming.

Again, in the peace of the night, I woke up. The voice came from an unexpected place. I heard the word "Sanctimoris" whispered again, and again, like a threat. A dark symbol of the profuseness that required being if not deciphered, at least reasonably explained. In a sense, I felt bound to something strange, an experience of real removal, as if an unfriendly spirit, barely released from the glass, urged me to approach a kind of barrier, apparently the frontier between earthly life and the later life.

This phenomenon had become a sort of dominant of my being, in relation with the unknown and unexplored aspects situated between the conscious and unconscious that progressed more and more towards a state of alert. Was it one of the components of a charade, whose sum up had to result in a new interpretation of the self?

Leadership: Does the inner voice become a mirror of the need to redefine your existence, carrying in your mind a new vision of what you could truly become, beyond the self-imposed limits of your limiting beliefs?

From the moment this infinite chain of whispers appeared in my mind, I couldn't live my life according to a schedule, calculated as before, but in a continuous denial of my individuality. In tandem with the countless misinterpretations that appeared around me, with everything that entered in my action. Almost daily, I suddenly heard at times this unique murmur, hard to understand, in which my whole authentic and discreet personality seemed to be focused.

In order to explain this discrepancy when it came to fitting in the reality, I admitted that the sudden voice, this passage to an extreme I couldn't understand, was a reaction to my own doubts regarding what I was living. These doubts stood in the way of my evolution.

Or it could have been the result of a chain of elementary rejection reactions that continued alone, one after the other. Like my body was controlled by a fine substance, a*messenger,* quickly transported to the brain, producing a modifying effect in my mind for around 20 minutes.

Leadership: Are you able to build a reality that resonates with your genuine Self without transforming the product of your understanding into a strict correspondence with the evolution of a dominant force that cannot be identified?

This unexpected spirit, the dominant force that awakened me at night to induce a sense of restlessness, the intangible part of my nature, seemed like the imagination of an extra being that once belonged to me, but one I lost by loyalty to the world's whims. Who allowed me to face them alone? It was almost impossible to understand the phenomenon, even if I went through its important stages, from its appearance until its disappearance. I had to start from the defining idea that depth and complexity played the role of a target that had to be reached.

And if I didn't allow intuition to go beyond the limits that reasonable explanations couldn't transcend, and reach the truth itself, they I could never have succeeded to focus on the relation with myself and understand myself better.

The self, viewed from the perspective of an invisible creature, of a constantly lingering conscience, seems to me an approximation of a "guardian" or "hunter" type of entity, depending on how they respond to the fluxes and refluxes of life. The self is the hidden truth behind the appearances that you cannot overcome by vertigo, intelligence, cunning or direct opposition, but only through an open, accepting attitude about any deed that we have committed.

Leadership: Can you build a picture of existential assimilation that is due to belonging to a concealed reality, without putting yourself to the wall of that personality you are showing to the world?

All this confusion that rose questions, proving itself fatal for my present and future could have meaning as long as its opposite existed. And the real impact that the voice in my head had over me could have an only explanation, which was:

Searching for the self, an archetype of totality, can lead man towards the process that leads him to become a master of its own thought, granting the Ego a possibility to cope with new feelings and surpass itself.

Are you confronted with a phenomenon that becomes some kind of dominant of your being? Did an infinite chain of whispers creep into your mind? Do you live in a continuous denial of your individuality? Can your intuition penetrate beyond the limits that reasonable explanations can't transcend?

Leadership: Can you use shifting consciousness moments to access new perspectives and understandings about yourself and the world when your inner voice seems to contradict everything you've considered calculated and accurate in life?

Here's what fully confirms the development perspective. When your personality, intuition and capacity to face the impact of change guide your steps towards the true fortress of self-knowledge, towards everything that truly represents you, actually you enter into a superior and entrancing game. And in order to win it, you have to be aware that you're a player. Then, you have to evaluate the gains and risks, to know the rules and the consequences that can arise in case there is a big difference between the two.

Leadership intervenes in the performance of your own development when you transform from player into investigator, thus when you try to explain the discrepancy between you and the reality of the great game of life. It is then when you go from a belonging and an identity to another. Basically, in this important moment, you walk the road towards yourself in a reverse direction. You stop trying to be at peace with the reality you're used to, but make the necessary steps to fully know yourself.

This is actually the meaning of the "whispers" that penetrate all your being, giving you shivers on your back when they strangely transmit those inner vibrations that awaken the individual part of your nature and allow you to be aware of who you truly are.

Leadership: Do you begin to understand that the attitude to what you feel at a key moment of life can at the same time give you the opportunity to be honest with what you really are in a reality that only belongs to you?

The Marquis of Vauvenargues said at a certain point a very important thing that deserves to remain in the memory of every leader: "Reason and emotion counsel and supplement each other. Whoever heeds only the one, and puts aside the other, recklessly deprives himself of a portion of the aid granted us for the regulation of our conduct."

In order to be a good servant of leadership you must keep the help that was destined for you in order to lead yourself to excellence, living under a law that enforces the criterion that must be used for evaluating your own abilities and resources.

There is an art to managing one's own self and using time the time you grant to "whispers" to its fullest. They disconnect you from that continuous denial of your individuality, up to the point of enforcing and admitting who you truly are. Leadership becomes justified and valuable only when you manage yourself better, when you are used to entering in relation with your unexplored side, when you manage to eliminate doubts about what you are.

Among the main procedures used in analyzing one's own self and predictability, there is centralizing the necessary resources for producing change and discovering the necessary strengths to eliminate confusion between "being" and "not being".

Success in leadership isn't the result of a succession of elementary "truth" rejection reactions, which continue alone, one after the other. But it is the result of a negotiation with yourself, when you're focused on the relation with yourself and to succeed in understanding yourself better.

Being honest with what you really are in a reality that only belongs to you means taking into account the way you influence yourself, the way you grow your inner character so as not to break the connection with what happens outside of yourself when you have to find a justification for your "subjectivity".

Sanctimoris is the key to a charade, whose understanding can ensure an ascending development. It represents a metaphor that takes your mind off its usual track and makes you ask yourself the fundamental questions that help you chase away the fog in front of your eyes and unravel who you truly are.

The better you know yourself and explore the unknown aspects of your Ego, the more your chances to turn for yourself are smaller. Through this deep self-knowledge you will be able to find out who you are, what you want to build and where you're headed. You will find your true calling and what you must bring into this world, from the status of leader.

Say No To Extreme Methods

On February 21, 2009

Correct your position on the map that you are drawing up from what characterizes you, without fragmenting or distorting the reality of your own guidelines.

- I am the best ! I am the only one who managed this performance ! I had most of the achievements ! Only I was able to do that ! Nobody is like me ! I am unique ! Vote for me and you will not regret !

Are these the words of a really strong person, optimistic and self-confident?

Margaret Thatcher, the British Prime Minister between 1979 and 1990, knew the best what it means to be truly a strong person: "Being powerful is like being a lady, if you have to tell people you are, you aren't."

Leadership: Can you create a new set of landmarks in the image of a whole that intersects in its various fragments an act of free will that can determine the trajectory of your self-appreciating power?

Where it prevails the personal interest, prevails also the manipulation, while modesty and discretion are totally lacking. Out of desperation and for fear of losing the battle for power, some people, eager to obtain an important job, make an appeal to extreme methods in order to attract new supporters on their side. They throw grenades like: "You are everything to me. I will fulfill and your last wish. "Only to dispel any complaints about the way he assumed responsibility for his weak results.

At the end of the road they make a last attempt, a last desperate effort to exercise influence on voters and to save their reputation. Unfortunately, those leaders who come in such a situation – critical, by their way of reacting, probably they do not know or could not get people by their side in good time.

The cry of despair with which you are trying whole-heartedly to affirm your power is a whole that does not totalize, never unifies anything, suggesting only the doubt you face in trying to get closer to people. It can be as confusing as the non-recognition of a master's degree abroad because you are trying to gain a "formality" instead of deepening a certain ideology that answers the questions of others.

Leadership: Do you have sufficient evidence to demonstrate that the degree of justification of a belief, based on certain predictability criteria, is an indication of the truth with which a news story item can be reached?

A news story is what is happening to you, revealed at higher elevations, which strengthens your beliefs about a certain thing. A news story you plan to publish is like representing a map of the world: it has to be much too well defined in relation to mapping information.

To demonstrate that the degree of justification of a belief is an indication of the truth with which news story can be reached, you must have sufficient evidence to support a point of view and to make it known in the hope that you will change one's mind.

Someone said a great truth: "Nor map does not appear out of the blue, they are made by someone to serve a particular purpose. If we manage to understand what that purpose is, we will make an important step towards understanding the map."

In order to diminish any type of communication barriers between you and others, you must first create a map of your own ideals and visions that you have transformed into reality, and to use it as a form of alchemy between you and them. However, if you fragment the reality, if you neglect or limit those reference points, which lead to an understanding of the leadership model imposed by you, it means that your map is not good, or it is not updated, or it is not sufficiently finished.

Correct your position on the map that you are drawing up from what characterizes you, without fragmenting or distorting the reality of your own guidelines. Your map of leadership does not appear out of the blue, but it is based on some clear data, on some statistics taken from some studied aspects, on those elements that enhance or diminish the quality of your evolution, and which are revealing your true intentions.

Just as you create a map, by which to exert your influence, in the same way, the other people create a mental and spiritual map that reproduces the truth about you. You are limiting your leadership potential if you constrain people to pay attention on you, if you oblige them to orient on your map.

Leadership: Does your personality look good only on a highly detailed map that only you know and use?

The personality of a frustrated man always comes to the surface when his will manifests itself to the fullest through obsessive thoughts and an exaggerated preoccupation with his own person. Nobody can play endlessly a duplicitous role. No one can hide the truth forever. For the results verify the actions of a person, and are really convincing.

It is very difficult to obtain people's goodwill, admiration and their respect, if you are not a reliable, serious and intelligent person. That is what should know all the aspirants to high management functions in the state before submitting their candidature. To be efficient means to move quickly and to act in the support of people in time, for them to be able to form a good impression of you. The one, who hopes to avoid a catastrophe in the last moment, will intercept more only reject messages from others.

The whole world will always come back to the correct man, honest, who really did something good for his country, for his people. At elections will not be voted that candidate endowed with a great power of persuasion, but the one who had notable achievements.

Does your map differ greatly than the other people's map? Does it serve to the establishment of your true personality? Does the model of the map that you create or choose it can be accessible to others?

Think well to these things before making the first step towards failure, before uprising the "cry of despair".

A more detailed map is distinguished by an exaggerated customization of character when everything you want to highlight leads to a whole new, unexpected life path.

Science And The Intangible

On January 11, 2015

Achieve an expansion of scientific knowledge, ensuring the continuous regeneration of the specific mentality of superiority.

Could I trust the creations of a nonexistent world, could I drift with my thoughts over human limits? Could I impose my beliefs, impelled by the uplifting force of reflections engaged in an imaginary transcendent that only a universal creator can assemble in a metaphysical plane? How could I, who believed myself to be guided by an unseen hand, as a thinker who doesn't limit himself to what he knows but to what he understands, dare to harmonize myself with the internal order of the universe without denying my existence?

It seemed that I was looking in a mirror, trying to define the universe through my image reflected in an infinity of angles, same as Dante Alighieri constructed the abyss within his mind, crafting the epos of specters. This equivalated with the fragmentation of my entire being in tiny pieces, possible only through integrating consciousness into a sort of super-consciousness that opened everything in front of me, revealing the truths on which whole matter edified upon. It meant accepting my membership to universality. Could someone understand the extent of the sacrifice I was making I wonder?

Alexandre Dumas caught his character one moment: "Imagine that the supreme master, after creating the world, after fertilizing chaos, would have stopped at the third part of His work… And imagine that, after preparing everything, after leveling everything, after fertilizing everything, when the moment came to admire His work, God would've turned off the sun and cast the world away into eternal light."

These words for me were a real watershed between two abysses – science and the intangible, two shores of land developing a field of propelling forces towards yet unconquered heights, my way and my destiny. Demoralized, I had realized once again that I found myself in the face of a complicated geometry whose significance eluded me, in the face of an incomprehensible embodiment. Unable to discern if it was a search of knowledge or of space and time. A real challenge in the realm of metaphysics.

Leadership: Can you develop a new direction of approaching science through a sacrifice of adjusting perceptions of existence, the world and reality, so that you become more than you could have imagined that you would ever become?

The highest knowledge anyone can possess, by exerting a will programmed to build a new approach of the truths about life, in a way in which its footprint over the world does not reduce, is acquired through the experience of being "whole", by escaping into the fantastic and the miraculous. Just as for a painter a color is not more useful than another, for the musician one sound than another, so too is the space that gives the scientist an obvious uniqueness included between the flow of thought, consciousness or subjective existence and the attempt to discern a meaning in any situation.

A certain type of infantilism kept constant, a slight madness installed in the interior of the borders of thought, a must-see that becomes a must-have, in direct dependence with the interest for a certain field as well as how it covers it, all this allows an for an easier crossing of the path towards leadership. A new approach to science is achieved through a sacrifice of adjusting perceptions of existence, which means extracting a much wider meaning from how you select, organize and interpret the information received from the environment with the help of the most intense experiences, the imagination, the intuition, the action and its consequences.

Existence, viewed from the point of view of science, can be a form of manifestation of the relationships between experiences and events set in one idea, an effort to coordinate a multitude of explanations given to the process and dynamics of shared thought. And the intangible is the totality of what you have not yet assimilated at the level of knowledge to produce a change in expression through creation.

To the difficulty of approaching a science that meets the requirements of holding "deep truths", from the perspective of knowledge based on reformist beliefs, can be imprinted a direction of deepening existence and the world, created after a custom pattern. But only through a sacrifice of adjusting the perceptions of reality, only through continuous attempts of generating reflections vis-à-vis what it truly means "to be" in a certain segment of time.

Leadership: Can you maintain an attitude of superiority through an indispensable activity in the creative process so that the focus of your consciousness and existence goes to the ideal and the Absolute?

Leadership has as a distinction criteria from other fields of activity the consequences that occur from the beliefs of the individual, and through this assures the continuous regeneration in the future of the specific mentality of superiority, one of the "Imagine that the supreme master" type. Or the idea of superiority aims, through the construction of inspirational decorations and themes, to the crowning of a great complexity, that recognition of the past, of the present and the future dedicated to achieving an "all-in-one" ideal, bringing together diversity of reflections, research, thinking exercises, critical opinions, etc.

If you manage to upgrade yourself to the level of predictability of a thinker not limited to what he knows but to what he understands through "doubts", scouring deeper into the thick of certain particular aspects of reality, only then will you get close to the ideal perfection of the man that hastens his transformation from observer status to status of "superior thinking".

And only such a man can justify his raison d'être, assuming the consequences for appropriating certain untold truths, incorporating a variety of experiences and of new ways of thinking that befit him. Only such a man can place his potential of integration of consciousness into a sort of super-consciousness, serving the creation of a new identity. Only such a man will be able to make an important contribution to the development of the science of substantiating a link between existence and leadership.

The absolute is the highest form of knowledge aspired by an eager creator to share his perspective and vision of what can happen to him in a day in the life through the little inspiration from a reality that seems to not let itself be deciphered.

Science And The Intangible bring forward two sides of the formation of a man that aspires to a deeper knowledge. The first is the objective side, which is achieved through the intention of making contact with a superior power, supporting the opening of mentality towards a deeper understanding of the world, life and reality. The other is the subjective side, which pertains to the tendency of man towards individualization, towards the awareness of the true, creative self.

Science Builds Art

On February 11, 2016

Find new means of artistic expression, thinking up the work within the material you have.

I had a great need for a remedy for a separation between the concrete and the abstract, in the course of the interaction between revolutionary innovation and the expansion of an entity of thought-form to a "border" entity where the calls for new benchmarks of creation stopped. My talent couldn't become obvious through the joining of the two, even if they would bring new update perspectives in support of the permanence of my authority in the field of epistemology.

A first limitation of mine could be determined by the vivid colors and deep shadows, all linked randomly in a less close unity, which I tried implementing in a painting, without defining their features by association with certain states or situations. It was as if I had to train my imagination to recreate the life of objects that could no longer find their place in a universe without name, or simply forgotten in time because the painting seemed to capture only the details of a reality full of contrasts.

I didn't have to be a great drawer to show certain ideas, small glimpses of coherence, but for this I had to search for the right color for my conceptions, same as a sculptor thinks up his work within the material he has. I'd more often lose myself in the indistinct outline of random scribbles, born of imagination, but with claims of great art.

Leadership: Can the assessment of your creation be understood as a "validation" of the fairness of interpreting a content of thought that can be reduced to seeking realism or aesthetics governed by the reproduction of the details of a questionable reality?

In fact, my talent wasn't a special form of expression through the means of additions of processing scientific elements, wasn't linked neither to the correct placing of the various elements of artistic composition, but it was rather closely related with the vast applicability of the laws of observation that fueled new theories and concepts.

The content of thinking that favored me in making creations, as with an engineer who combines different data and material elements for building, lifting and supporting a bridge over a river, was not justified in explaining new phenomena, or in order to understand the explanations proposed by others, but to pursue different ideas in a harmonic whole. The interpretation of this content depended on the perception of certain events and literary characters that facilitated direct contact with original works of art.

French scholar Rene Descartes, of which is told has founded analytic geometry, tried to present a system of the world in which the entire universe, from the Sun and stars to human physiology – was a huge mechanism governed by mechanical laws. The result of his concerns was that he set the basis of new perspectives of dealing with the process of change, from which resulted new and serious challenges for me, from which I had much to gain.

Inspiration, often difficult to achieve, is a form of introducing yourself in the space of someone else above yourself, performing a number of qualitative observations with the help of which you try to answer personal questions.

But no matter how carefully you'd look at things in the whole of common concerns, you could still register differences of views. And a presence that is completed with another presence knows that these differences represent only a few of the characteristics with added value of the way of approaching science and art.

Leadership: Can you ensure the handling of your own "Replies" in an attempt to deal with science through the means of cultivating the visibility of art?

It is easier to talk about change than to do it, which constitutes only one sort of feeble intention of fighting against a thought-form entity that wants to be revealed for an outside understanding – overall – of personal development.

Only when the thoughts start to get a certain form through the process of creation, depending on an influence that pushes you to leap more into knowledge, the switch from on approach to another can be made, especially in the case of a so-called relationship between "observation" and "experiment."

From a momentary scribble, new forms of expression can be formed, new forms of artistic expression. The "distinguishable" and "indistinguishable" that act upon the cumulation of experience in noticing aspects of detail, or of maximum generality, forming a more or less successful painting, are exclusively dependent on an operator called "complexity" that has its echo in the elements of objective perception.

The visibility of art can be achieved by combining ideas into imagination with all those aspects of the reality provided by the senses (a priori), along the line drawn by the path to recognizing a new intrinsic dimension of the human being.

Do you feel that a particular thing finds correspondence with your inner-motif, with your emotional flow, with the vision of a beginning? Leadership has as a development support an approach that explores the role of the individual in identifying those niches of interpreting visions, emotions and forming relationships between the conclusive landmarks of creation, which can generate understanding abilities of a high level.

Art, of which can be affirmed that it has the function of representing new compositions of image, becomes visible when others manage to connect to this image. It can indicate a concrete of the significance of your creation.

The ensemble of "Replies" shows the parallelism between the information obtained with the help of a representation of forms and information you can take up as being general truths. The latter can contribute both to the development of science and to the establishment of the foundation of a new system of thinking.

You can ensure the handling of your own "replies" in an attempt of dealing with science only if you manage to represent the reference elements of an image (the conclusive landmarks of your creation) in the space of a special knowledge, in the configuration of an emotional experience, or in the space of a new identity.

Leadership is the creative guiding point of representing a suggestive, powerful image that can be improved when looking for and combining the means to achieve a practical goal.

Science Builds Art when man thinks up his work within the material he has, or when he starts seeking and processing the material fitting to his conceptions following random scribbles. Science is closely connected with the applicability of the laws of observation that fuel new theories and concepts.

Artistic expression is a process of invention and production of the new that gives the shape of the adventure called knowledge. Often times it represents a realization of the scribbles...

Science Of The Absolute

On January 17, 2014

Extend your capacity of understanding the elements that control the development of the science that you serve, so that they can fulfill the performance requirements that define the quality of your evolution.

This science was more difficult than any other, perceived as a cumulation of contrasts between seen and unseen. Because it required to take into account the elements of some concepts, processes, laws and theories as possibilities of accepting the imaginary. All reunited under the shape of a profound and subtle reasoning that denied or rejected any fundamental principle accepted by everyone as definitive.

It was the science of the absolute, an innate and instinctive factor included in the formation of the feeling of boundlessness that can any time turn into the abyss. A journey to a lost space, almost incomprehensible, the more fascinating the experience of placing me between two different worlds, between two extremes that conditioned each other, the richer it became every day. Everything in my mind shaped in a very bizarre zigzag because the incompatibility haunches between what I knew, what I didn't know and what I was assuming.

The english physicist James Prescott Joule used to measure heat everywhere. Many years he had been measuring the heat produced by any kind of process: mechanic, electric or magnetic, in any imaginable environment.

The implications of his colossal work convinced me that was necessary an extension of my capacity to understand abstract notions, in order to bring together, in a broader frame, new properties of the substance that awaited its making. But to decipher the extraordinary complex mysteries of the transformation of elements as a result of the division of the tangible with the intangible, was more of a burden than a direct challenge.

Leadership: Can you change the pattern of relations with those around you so that you become acquainted with what is independent of any conditions and relationships, when you face a tense situation such as "you cannot get something from nothing"?

Every time I would come across a new experimental formula for multiplying the meaning of the notions I had been researching, a feeling of doubt would come over me. I felt trapped in a cycle of oscillations that was completely self-fuelling from a network of prohibitions like tu ne peux pas obtenir quelque chose pour rien, attracted in a genuine vortex of ambiguities, being unable to balance and absorb all the application requirements of the rules of science in an integrated and coherent way.

Somehow, I resembled a character from one of Dostoievski's novels that would dig deep inside the secret depths of his being in order to find God. And by that, the meaning of life.

Even if the different forms of measuring the actives of leadership don't have more than an intrinsic value – similar to the case of the challenge to explore the most special, the most distant or the most hidden areas of science, which are not exactly limited, but out of which you can extract the most precious mineral, the power of absolute understanding – they are designated to connect an unknown space to a known one.

The meaning of the notions we are researching, these assets that could be extracted, isolated or reproduced from any type of event or situation, had the primary objective of effectively positioning the contents of my world of thought on an unquestionable level of value.

They were given by supported and promoted concepts, processes, laws and theories, reunited under the shape of a profound and subtle reasoning which could denied or rejected any fundamental principle accepted by anyone as completely irrevocable. But in order to produce exceptional results, these actives had to be "opened" so that they consume as many knowledge resources that, in turn, can be directed towards a more efficient management of the ascension towards perfection.

Leadership: Do you try to represent in a realistic form what you can perceive as perfect within the limits of soul-searching without defining the absolute that stops your development?

A superficial knowledge of leadership, due to the inefficient use of the resources that science has given you because the incompatibility haunches between what you know, what I don't know and what you are assuming, puts on a second plan the utility of what you do and what you transmit. One of the minimum requirements for promoting leadership is to balance and absorb all application requirements of perceptions and understandings at the level of cultivated science in an integrated and coherent way.

The absolute is what you try to create or believe independently of any conditions or relationships with all surrounding things. It is extracted from the representation of concrete things or exemplary events that have a correspondent in a creative attitude, which is downloaded into ideas, leading to a new representation of the relations between the particular and the general.

What are the traits of space in which all the objects of the exterior are gathered that can give meaning to your way of expressing a new reality? This space that is shaped on the fly is produced by its use as a material product and, especially, immaterial, never assured in its stability and durability, being "consumed" by its very users. It stretches between what is happening and what is not seen, thus suggesting a systematic link between what is perceived at a given moment and the subsequent perception.

Leadership: Are you encouraged to support the connection and dialogue between the inner world and the outside world, which leads to the formation of a new self-image in absolute independence from direct reality?

If you want a practical advantage in the fight with science, paint your points of view and your perspectives on grounds of the understanding power of a real product of creative thinking that would have a representation on the map of your evolution. A fading tendency to experiment everything related to a good management of the knowledge resources will create a certain distance between you and science. You will never be able to reach your maximum potential of professional success if you treat lightly the anchors that support the alternatives of remodeling science.

Building a mountain chain rich in minerals in the attempt to mold a New Man is actually your attempt to manifest your unlimited freedom of thought, in order to avoid becoming a prisoner of an unclear or detrimental orientation. The search for what you want to accumulate, to acquire or to manage scientifically speaking through crossing various abstract notions and integrating them in a broader frame can prove very difficult, but it's a favorable provision of development.

The tendency to experience both the seen and the unseen reveals a culture of searching for answers to some questions that seem bizarre at first sight, often testing the most elementary sense of madness, but which become the symbol of a plea of originality for the need for uniqueness, renouncing the uniformity of concrete realities that became the synonym of normality.

As one person clearly states on a site: "the concrete represents the unity of multiple determinations, traits or sides of objects, beings and phenomena or, in other words, unity in diversity, which is in fact the synthesis of a series of determinations."

Science represents what must be acquired on your own by a phenomenological approach to the creative experience centered around observing those things, processes, particular circumstances that can result in judgments that do not have their source in experience, that is, a priori, but which allow some logical deductions with absolute validity.

The science of the absolute is the essential form of an ascendant path towards the highest peaks of performance. It means finding the "living water", that elixir of eternal youth and everlasting life that catches you and keeps you in a continuous process of adjusting your knowledge, towards ensuring a progress that gives a significant value to yourself.

The Science Place Within Leadership

On April 10, 2008

"Movement first attracts attention, and only afterwards do you think about what is moving."

Sergei Eisenstein had never learned drawing. He had begun to draw from a childhood impression: while waiting for the game to begin, engineer Afrosimov drew animal outlines with chalk on the dark blue canvas of the game table. Eisenstein was fascinated by the white arabesque of the line that was born before his eyes and that in its movement made dogs, deer, cats appear. The line moved along the invisible contour of an object which, by a miracle, thus gave existence on the table cloth. The dynamism of the line was a sensation that had fascinated him for years.

Engineer Afrosimov had inoculated him with the pleasure of drawing. Later, at the Polytechnic, the arid matter of analytical geometry acquired a special charm for the young student because it translated into the mysterious algebraic formulas precisely the movement of lines. The dynamism of "becoming", in opposition to the static, will fascinate him all his life, whether it is the movement of the line or the phenomena. It was a fascination with the genesis of things that has its origins here, in this early impression of drawing.

He drew, as we know, a lot in his youth. Much and badly, because, abandoning the primary inspiration, he loaded the drawing with details under the influence of the Russian school of genre painting. School calligraphy by model never succeeded. His manner was that of linear drawing. Then, abandoning drawing, he remained passionate, in his first films, for the mathematical purity of editing in his movement. The taste for sequence appears later, and explains the strangeness of this delay, by the logic of Engels' thought: "movement first attracts attention, and only afterwards do you think about what is moving."

Leadership: Can you trace the landmarks of an attractive vision if you look at them from that position where the total image of man turns out to be that of a creative entity that directly relates to the quality of being sensitive?

He who proves to be sensitive is the man with unsuspected spiritual and artistic values, the one who studies objects and their properties, applying the equally concrete procedure of the experiment to deepen the understanding of the theory and its application in the light of scientific discoveries. Such a man can enjoy a total work of art only if it contains all the landmarks of a change that preserves the background of the old rules of composition, and if the qualities of the work concern the image of a new, transfigured reality.

To enliven what the mind sees, to the satisfaction of the eye that embraces beauty and good taste, so that the things you accumulate, trying to concentrate them in works of art, seem less complicated than they appear at first glance. The eye slips into anything artistically perfectible, so much so that it sees a change in the world and serves its mind through a wide variety of knowledge. In this case, director Sergei Eisenstein becomes a kind of mirror of the world, a kind of light source, an archetypal image for the action of a creative force that causes astonishment and an unforgettable impression.

If painting represents color, the fruit of poetic imagination, a form of life that discovers its own identity, and is distinguished by the quality of recognizing beauty in all its forms, then Eisenstein harbors a rare dose of talent that surrounds his being with the quality of being sensitive.

He seems to live in the harmonious space conceived by an artist of plastic forms, who shares his vision according to the new currents imposed by the changing circumstances of society and budgetary possibilities, but with the amendment that he must be aware of what is beyond the visible shell of things, beyond the progress of the world, beyond words, images or silences.

We expand this point a little. When we say that "Movement first attracts attention, and only then do you think about what is moving", we think of an indispensable activity in the life of any artist who wants to maintain their beliefs, feelings, intensity, level of knowledge, on the positions of an original conception about the world, life and creation.

Leadership is the director's way of rendering the reality of a purely personal life experience with the help of beliefs and feelings that, generated by suggestion and image, can persist as a background of visual memory in the subconscious of those who have formed intellectually under the regime of subjectivity.

The total image of man proves to be that of a creative entity that relates directly to the quality of being sensitive, when his becoming as an artist is in opposition to the static of an opposing destiny, when he manifests his affection in his unique way of being, in the atmosphere of a life story from which you do not know what to expect. In this regard, the landmarks of an attractive vision are administered to a sensitive subject presented in a unique way. And regarding the application of the results of our discoveries, we mention the theme of the search for the sensible as an opportunity that can contribute to the aspirations of artistic intellectuals.

Science's Place Within Leadership is a result of artistic culture and directorial temperament, which has the power to individualize forms of artistic expression, to subject the whole imaginative material of the work to a personal stylistic foundation: "everything I create must first attract man's attention, then direct his thinking to what interests him most."

The "Second-hand" Stylization In Cinematography

On December 15, 2012

For your creation to be authentic, it must present the surrounding nature as it was seen by the people of the era you are painting.

How can all this be in the setting, in the surrounding environment? It becomes necessary, of course, a stylization in this field as well. The problem of stylization consists in presenting the surrounding nature, as it was seen by the people of the era we are painting. Because there is a danger here: "second-hand" stylization. When the artist does not reproduce the way he directly perceives the nature of a historical epoch, he does not reproduce his own representation of the way nature was seen by his contemporaries, but uses the interpretation of another person... one creates in the manner of Roerich, another in the manner to Surikov.

Through all these thoughts Eisenstein raises general problems of historical film. So how should the problem of the historical landscape be solved? He finds the answer after a serious meditation: "The historical landscape is characterized by a peculiarity , namely : the feeling of its distance from the viewer. I think that this feeling of distance can it appears when the landscape preserves only the elements that can be seen from a distance , when the landscape does not include a large number of details and its generalized and generalizing tures ."

Leadership: Can the image you create work through its generalized features, keeping only the essentials that can be perceived from a distance?

Designing an authentic creation in cinematography involves a complex process of planning and styling. It is essential to keep in mind the representation of the surrounding nature of the era the artist is painting. Details are crucial, from the choice of scenographic elements to the distribution of spaces and ambience. A successful film not only optimizes the use of scenery, but also provides an aesthetic representation of the director's vision, reflecting a balance between authenticity and stylization.

The problem of stylization in film is to present nature as it was seen by the people of the time, avoiding the danger of "second-hand" stylization, when the artist uses the interpretation of others instead of creating his own representation. The landscape must act through its generalized and generalizing features, keeping only the essential elements that can be perceived from a distance. Thus, an authentic stylization of the landscape in the film can give the viewer a sense of distance and depth, capturing the visual essence of a historical era without getting lost in excessive detail.

Leadership: How does the balance between stylization and authenticity influence the viewer's visual perception in cinema, and how can a director optimize his creation to reflect this historical essence?

Leadership and cinematographic creation have one thing in common: the impactful image. Stylization is the process of adapting, modifying, or exaggerating certain aesthetic, visual, or narrative elements in a work of art to create a distinctive and unique effect. This process may involve using specific techniques of lighting, colors, shapes, sound, or composition to emphasize certain themes, evoke certain emotions, or impart a certain atmosphere. Stylization can transform reality into an idealized, symbolic or abstract version, contributing to the expressiveness and originality of a work.

The balance between stylization and authenticity in cinematography can influence the viewer's visual perception by creating an atmosphere and aesthetic that is captivating and believable at the same time. An excess of stylization can destroy the believability of the story or the emotionality of the film, while a lack of stylization can lead to an interpretation that lacks innovation or visual impact.

To reflect this historical essence optimally, a director can rely on a deep understanding of the period or style he wishes to explore. Experimenting with modern cinematic techniques can bring a fresh and original take on a historical period or theme.

Also, working closely with the production team, including set designers, costume designers and cinematographers, is essential to ensure the film's aesthetic coherence and authenticity. Effectively communicating the message and emotions behind the styling and authenticity is therefore crucial to captivate and connect the audience. By finding a conscious balance between these two aspects, the director can create a deep and memorable cinematic experience.

A creator must explore different ways to give the viewer a sense of depth by authentically stylizing the setting, thus revealing the essence of an old image by juxtaposing new images.

Second-hand stylization in cinematography is the use and reinterpretation of visual and thematic elements taken from previous works, adapting them in a new context to create an original impact. Here, however, the question arises:

How can the detailed planning of the scenography and the distribution of spaces contribute to an ambience that highlights the director's vision, and how does he manage to preserve the authenticity of the era represented?

See Me Beyond What Can Be Seen

The artist's seal is felt precisely in the way he chooses the parts of life that he depicts in the work which is all the more brilliant, the more one guesses beyond what is seen.

George Kopaliani - Feel my mind. This song is all about attitude, it's about the power of educating your mind when you deserve to discover about yourself what you've never discovered before. By and large, it is about RUNNING, a symbolic world, tried unparalleled in the line of refined burnings and inner distillations, sometimes managing to reveal the most refined feelings that nourish the soul in abundance. For, often, running is revealed by awakening, amplifying and gaining long-term control over the mental performance of which only a creator who has subjected the forms of artistic expression to a self-imposed rigor, exploiting the qualities of his own nature, can prove.

Feel my mind is listened to during a comfortable and balanced workout, but in an evening chiaroscuro, when you follow the call of the heart. It begins slowly, like a warming of the soul before the muscles, in the subtle plane of a moving interiority, sometimes inclined towards fable, which abandons itself to an intense action that requires the use of the body. Then in the middle, shortly after the 3rd minute, the dynamism starts, when you give everything you can. A warm voice in the background whispers to you tenderly, preventively, not to give up. At no cost, do not give up. Something gives you the strength to keep going, even if you feel like you can't.

Suddenly you get the impression that you are entering a cosmic corridor, you start resonating with the stars, full of life and very dreamy, you are no longer attentive to running, you are no longer attentive to the world around you, you no longer see anyone. You are alone with yourself, with the air of holiness of grand solitude, in the sweet envelopment of the feeling of spiritual uplift that passes in a fantastic flight through the mystery of the evening. Honest with yourself, with your soul, alone with the moon and the stars. And you start building a normal RUNNING rhythm. Something in the shadows, like a whisper coming from nowhere, sipping powers from the fountains of a free conscience, keeps whispering to you: DON'T GIVE UP !

And then a view opens up in your way, as if saved from an avatar. It's your world ! And no one understands your world, because it is the winged world, so rare, full of introspection, that of winners !

Leadership: Can the object of attention that may fall under your senses be imposed on you as a whole unit before researching its contents?

There is a soul in this song, reserved and at the same time energetic, beyond its organic structure, analyzed under the impulse of the intense life, of the immediate experience. Her melodic line, so sensitive, with great emotional vibration, caresses my soul with the same zeal with which a painter affirms his boundless love of life in a chromatic outburst radiating light and feelings. It is there, in the cold of the beginning of winter, behind the trembling leaf, behind the tense muscles, whispering deep and incomprehensible things, bringing the Largo-Allegro succession several times in the defeated moments of unexpected impulses.

The sound of Adagietto, shaped by the depths of cosmic becoming, lazily plunging into my own feelings to discover the most vivid analogy with the eternal works of the Holy Spirit, extends into the space between reality and imagination. I still run freely, dreamily, embracing in my thoughts and in my soul the whole vibration of an utterance by which the universal being reveals itself as the world of the human being, and even of the divine being. When you run, the sound of the glory of infinity follows you, it does not give you peace, but it does not consume you either.

The expressive effect comes from the immediate juxtaposition of two contrasting musical states: one retains the greatness of the thoughts behind the spontaneous movements (materialized in an auditory image), and its pair echoes the Tremolo individualized feelings, said as if "whispered" in a compact frame of mind, of solidarity with an enlightening look at solitary passions.

There is something else that cannot be seen, and yet must be seen, or at least felt. Always a soul coordinated from the lowest to the highest sounds, turning into thousands and thousands of different sounds, becomes the center of the universe.

Leadership: Can you activate the image adjustment option in the form of an impressive confession of feelings, fully manifesting your willingness to become a single expressive entity contained in a single evocative setting?

Running is experienced as a struggle that you fight first with yourself. Do not count your steps, but listen to your soul, fill it with good will, orienting it towards the astral projections. A new world opens at every step, there, in the silence of the evening that has no other purpose than to whisper a syllable – either to bring down a mountain or to fly like a singing bird. And running is easy to bear, as a kind of spell of a universe totally different from the world of others, especially when the sound "solemnis", born as if from the silence of the earth, from the gravity of the cold air, activates the power of the creative spirit in the universal consciousness.

This is demonstrated by writer Alexandru Vlahuță when he told the story about painter Nicolae Grigorescu:

"A terrible struggle is his life. Every morning brings him new hope, and every evening is a new despair. Eternally dissatisfied with his work, shaving a cloth ten times, leaving and returning ten times in the same corner of nature, which always spoke something else of the great mystery, and he always asked, feeling that, beyond the lines and colors that are seen, there is something else that cannot be seen, and that still must be seen. It must. For this is the calling of an artist in the world – to make you see forever and ever what nature shows only once, in the flash of a moment, once, in all the incomprehensible and frightening eternity of time."

Well, where can the most emotion be found: in a painter's soul, or in a runner's soul? They both embark on the same long path of redemption: one with the easel in his arms, the other with the gold medal in his dream, one with his foot on the obstacle executing an impulse with the stretching of the joints, the other capturing and selecting what is characteristic in nature. But both look carefully, forward and downward, to balance the contrast between the imaginary and the perceptible, mediating the interference of the sacred man.

How gladly you return to where your soul is as an artist, well polished into a winning model. How much tension there is in a bold work that combines suppleness and sensitivity to the point where the tempo changes from Largo – into Animato, per giocare con entusiasmo e spirito, the acoustic character being thus prolonged as an echo with deep resonances beyond time and space, according to which "spirits living in different places and times think the same way, feel the same creative impulses, even communicate through unsuspected, transparent and evanescent channels".

I realized – Feel my mind – that whenever I return to Running, just as the artist returns to his canvas, composing colors and emotions, I will be deeply penetrated by the feeling of freedom that is offered to you by sincerity and fidelity, that feeling of "I would stay here, I don't want to go back." But that's not readily apparent, is it?

Leadership can be considered valid in the form of an impressive confession of feelings, a reflection on the inner universe that never conflicts with the outer reality.

See Me Beyond What Can Be Seen if you want to understand what can only be felt with your heart.

The runner has a soul, you cannot hear his cries, his sighs, you cannot hear his footsteps passing over obstacles, over lofty peaks, over lonely cliffs, occupying a scene subjected by lights and shadows. Often, without leaving a trace, but fitting into a single "Myself" frame, he steps victoriously towards an unexpected horizon, where he will create his world. You will not see him again, perhaps, in a flash, in all the immeasurable eternity of time.

Nicolae Iorga rightly said: "The artist's seal is felt exactly in the way he chooses the parts of life that he depicts in the work which is all the more brilliant the more one guesses beyond what is seen."

See Me With Eyes Directed Towards Eternity

On July 07, 2023

The work of art is a visual message that resonates with the soul of those who discover it.

I'm at sea, fully enjoying the Greek coastline. I look around, with emotion, with admiration, with the insight of a Sherlock Holmes among paintings, as if I should find among the variety of images around me an infinitely small part of my personality. A distinct one that forges a new image of how the "extraordinary" in the everyday becomes a Shatiitusni Oridaass Etta Inevaenci , an expression of feelings born from an uplifting search for inner truth".

And what do I see? I see things everywhere, levers of inspiration, from simple multi-colored lounge chairs, to green palm trees that seem to have spread naturally. The sand changes color when the waves recede. The warm wind blows constantly, but in gentle gusts, and the water is an intense blue, as warm and pleasant as in any corner of the island. Of course, in all this amalgam of places, views, geometric shapes, attractions, contrasts, visual and sound languages, among which I have every chance to find the dreamlike state of an unforgettable sunset, I must strive not only to imitate nature, but so and surpass them as far as Creation is concerned.

Virtually everything before me appears in the radiance of a great spirit and character, a chosen tool of Creation designed to intensify the colorism in search of the light of vitality, as if I should plunge into a fantastic and apparently illusory world, a fragment of the hologram of heaven, just to increase the power of the supernatural in pictorial art. Ultimately, this is what it means to be a painter: I must explore the colorism of the supernatural in pictorial art, so as to transcend the known limits of reality and create a new and mystical dimension within a living, authentic painting.

Leadership: Does your vision have a content that pushes the concept of art towards the idea of "interpretive effort" aimed at finding out hidden meanings of the subject in the foreground?

Perhaps the sea, as I look at it with eyes full of wonder, wrapping my gaze in its dancing waves, is giving me an eye test. It's not for nothing that I feel exhausted trying to capture, in an instant formula, a punctual state, or to capture aesthetically the essence of the space that feeds boundless thoughts, stringing together constellations of possibilities. In fact, the artist in the horizon of the sea deepens, gets lost, finds himself, rejoices and sighs, thus releasing the valences of an unconventional creativity that paints with many unusual words.

The foundation on which this becomes possible depends on the totality of views concentrated in a single vision, a process of substitution or restriction subordinate to action and thought, expressing a content that pushes the concept of art towards the idea of "interpretive effort" aimed at finding out hidden meanings of the subject in the foreground. But the sight remains a mystery if I don't consider Andersen's words from the famous story "The Little Mermaid:"

- But why don't we also have immortal souls? asked the little princess sorrowfully to the old queen of the seas. I would gladly give my hundreds of years just to be a mortal for one day and have the hope that I too will know happiness in that wonderful world beyond the stars. Even if sometimes I feel happier than the mortals above. But even I will die one day, and like the foam of the sea, I will float on the surface of the sea without ever hearing the music of the waves again or seeing the beautiful flowers or their sun. Is there nothing I can do to get an immortal soul?

Leadership: Does your creation bring to the fore the hidden subtleties of the subject that concerns you at a deep level, and which is always wanted at the level of the comparison between reality and the imaginary?

I believe that the only way to enter the sphere of aesthetic experience, changing my perception of the surrounding world through seeing, visions, and interpreting the meanings of life from a call of the sea, is to bring to the fore the hidden subtleties of the subject that concerns me at a deep level, of the subject that is always wanted at the level of symbols and metaphors. Only such a subject could illustrate the specificity of spirituality: "the exploration of the deep dimensions of human existence that go beyond the material and rational aspects of life".

The work of art is a bridge between reality and dream, between seen and understood, especially if I relate to a story character who wants to become real in my reality. Actually, I think that's what an artist does. Like the work of art, seen as a form of transcendent communication through aesthetics and emotion, as a refuge for contemplation and introspection, the artist knows how to merge two apparently foreign worlds: a world that flourishes in imagination and a world that comes to life in reality.

Leadership: Can you give your creation a permanence that suggests "living the evoked moment", creating an affective safety in the sense of the permanence of the work of art that depicts reality as a story?

The artist who aspires to a certain permanence has another way of creating his affective security, obviously in the sense of the permanence of the work of art. Nothing is superfluous, everything is necessary. In order to reach beyond what he sees, without lowering art to the level of a banal imitation, he must find the window to the human essence, where reality and dream merge into a mysterious world where the story of the unseen and unheard is written.

So, the work of art is not only a spiritual journey through colors, shapes and textures, but also represents a sublime manifestation of the fragility and ephemerality of life, in contrast to the search for a higher dimension of the spirit.

The Little Mermaid knows that her image is not fleeting, but eternal, herself not limited to the mortal sphere, but transcending the boundaries of the immortals. In this sense, the artist's eye becomes a completely singular way of forming the correspondence between what is seen, stimulated by emotions, and what is possessed through this sight, being above all that is known through the senses and through the mind.

Focusing only on the unrepeatable quality of the way to form a bridge between reality and dream, the artist creates an image that is not constrained by the earthly, but transcendental, and this because he himself does not want to be imprisoned in the ephemeral, but free in eternity...

The form that leadership takes in the sense of Creation coincides with the image expressed by the artist in a journey through time and space, which reveals unexpected connections between the eternal present and the timeless moment.

See Me With Eyes Directed Towards Eternity so that you can meet me in the present moment from which you will never be able to detach yourself. This can be better understood in terms of creation that uses a story to express an experience meant to highlight the nobility of the human soul, the power of sacrifice and giving, sincerity and empathy.

Indeed, there are writers like Andersen, the Brothers Grimm, Charles Perrault, who left a hidden message in each of their works. Many children read their stories, but they read them too soon, without understanding their message. Only an artist who has reached the age of full artistic maturity knows how to see what goes unnoticed for others.

See Me With The Eyes Of The Senses

Sight can influence the viewed element only if it contributes, directly, to the shaping of your experiences.

I was on vacation in Greece. Always beautiful, always welcoming, with spectacular landscapes, the Ionian Sea delighted my eyes so much that I could only look at it, without caring about time or exposure to the sun. And I looked at her with that serene look, directed inward, understanding my freedom, the state of mind coming as if from the painter's unitary consciousness, which manifests that mysterious connection between everything that means creation and detachment from everyday life.

It also has its great life, its special grace, just as the painter has the science of working on the palette, of obtaining the pigmentary qualities in advance through multiple mixtures. And I think that nothing matters more than seeing it again with the eyes of the mind and with a clear mind. I see her again with a vivid tone, to talk to her, to photograph her, to feel her breeze with that touch of the past that repeats itself, having an exemplary value for the present. To be so close to her that I can smell her, hear the sound of the waves rolling on the shore, feel the water caressing my feet as it wipes away my footprints on the sand.

Without realizing it, the painter's palette was enriched with particularly inspired, poetic means of expression, in terms of color and drawing, giving rise to the "always new" type effect produced by a creation extended to a new horizon. Moreover, by mixing the blue of the sea with the serenity of the artist's eyes according to all the rules of symmetry, a fact that leaves room for argumentation in a framework that allows free expression, I managed to translate on canvas an image meant to suggest a state of tranquility and peace. At last I was touched by the longing of a soul consolation: better to approach a visual combination of colors than to lose myself in a distant perspective.

Leadership: What you see can amplify the feeling of real in an area of memories that mirror that "expression of one thing through another"?

The sea has its smell, salty and clean, the breeze that blows bringing me into contact with dozens of substances that come from the organic matter of the sea. And the smell, having a concrete character because it starts from experience and remains in contact with it, amplifies the feeling of realness, controllability of the natural environment. You realize that painting has as a pivot for receiving emotions a phenomenon of living the experience of life, so it is also based on a science of the senses bathed in the light of the soul.

On the other hand, smell is a stabilizer of emotions, a particularly powerful factor for awakening memories, a trigger of memories more authentic than taste or hearing. So, the painter, regarding the chemistry of paints, must categorically combine the visual and olfactory senses in such a way that the brain oxygenates itself, protects itself against exhaustion. And if it is so, then the smell changes the painter's perception of the surrounding environment, changing the way he lays down the colors under the action of a feeling of otherness, turning into an incurable romantic who combines relaxation with the idea of purity, of communion with nature.

In this case, the possibilities of establishing an agreement between the colors of a quasi-figurative painting, carrying meaning, depicting the image of a revelatory rest, of a mystical state of mind, are unlimited and depend on the artist's sensitivity to smells, to the perception of colors in the case of an irresistible element. Definitely, the activity of the senses must arouse his reason, challenge it. Through this challenge, reason remembers, while ideas always come from impressions, emotions, color expressions.

Leadership: Can the image to which your creation relates extend to a visual field that involves the exclusive experience of intense emotions during a time that is being relived?

Here, a purely contemplative attitude, enveloping a harmonious dynamism of the shades of the sea, is related to the way someone characterizes the painter Minu Movila, so that the comparison with me seems detached from the fragment of an existence from which nothing is missing, except a small detail that, placed as it should, can transform the feeling of freedom into a real jewel.

"The painter Minu Movila debates with the help of the structural precepts of the two-dimensional, angles, perspectives, plans, probing into the mysterious diary of the concrete. Finding solutions and leitmotifs in which the imagistic fragment is revealed, narrating visual terms, the experience and sensitivity of the artist to leave room for aesthetic interventions Minu Movila remains a romantic in which the direct involvement of the creative soul is constant, a fact that can be read especially in the chromatic modulations, which fold on technical and stylistic terms, potentiated in the right variants."

Through such a comparison, between me and him, between two artists similar in soul, the increased vision in the living fire of a memory of a lifetime deserves a careful analysis. The involvement of the soul in an act of creation, in a place where the artist thinks, imagines, restructures his experience mentally, must find its stylistic form in the use of a reality not yet experienced, above the ephemera of a moment suspended in the imaginary.

Being more than I think I am, I still wonder if I don't have the traits of a soulful artist, touched by an area in the visual field that can bring calm and soothing vibration to a space that expands with its mind, colors becoming the palette through which I can bring to life the permanent exposition of a complicated but simply beautiful theme: "The Immortal Longing".

To shape a positive and constructive reality, you have to pay attention to what you observe and how you interpret your perceptions, so that all the experiences you transmit emphasize the importance of the image you relate to.

See Me With The Eyes Of The Senses, with the longing of a heart swirling like the sea, and you will discover the depths and riches that our experiences together can offer. Remember those emotions that vibrate within you, immortalize them in a dream image, and let them envelop you in the warmth of a burning imagination.

Now you are an artist too.

See Me With Your Mind’s Eyes Or With The Real Gaze

Only by observing and immortalizing the apparently separate elements of reality can the artist reveal an ever more comprehensive understanding of the Whole.

Whoever has discovered the secret of great science, will also have infinity on his side. This can be seen easily, so easily, just by looking at an emerald-colored leaf, unique among other leaves on the same tree. Or if we carefully examine this leaf, with those eyes that retain the images and recognize the views, without confusing it with the simple representation of an image from nature, and if we grant it the property of the eye to see and distinguish the shapes of objects, their sizes and other details, we will find that it becomes a field for exploring the environment.

To look at this leaf as a book open to view, une ligne directrice dans la réalisement du dessin, is a process that is all the more complex as the perceptive background of the receiver is more developed, especially since it can be particularized in the aspect of constituting a background of emotional agreement that does not exert a pronounced inner pressure on the intellectual processes. In this context, let's think about the fact that a leaf is not only a means of exploring the visual field, but can be a rational, communicative and informational entity.

But what does a leaf see when it sits next to other leaves? What does a leaf see through the leaves next to it? What does a leaf see when it lets itself be carried on the wings of the wind? Above all, what does a leaf see when it looks around not with its eyes, but rather with its mind, with its ears, with its soul, filtering reality through the thoughts of an artist who uses the pictorial medium to create abstract representations of imaginary memories?

Leadership: Can you create visual content that targets representations of reality so that you learn new things about the meanings of the senses that have a major impact on what is happening around you?

I will start from the idea that the leaf itself constitutes a fact of visual memory in an image of spatio-temporal essence, performing an analysis of the impact on the environment on the data provided by the senses. The eyes never forget what remains in the soul, as a pale memory of what once was. And the artist knows this, that a leaf sees from a certain angle a person passing in front of it, while another leaf on the same tree sees what does not appear to the eyes of the other leaves, and every day other people pass by the tree full of leaves, and many other things are shown to the view differently. Is it not so?

Far be it from me to pretend to any analysis to dissect reality, recomposing an image and discussing it as a unitary whole. But, being aware that matter interacts through instantaneous forces from a distance, not just nearby, I will consider that a leaf also feels the energetic vibration of every color, every thing, every being that enters its visual field.

I'll say it another way. Matter interacts through a mystical vision, a vision that exceeds in all directions the angle of validity of the projection of a sequence of moving images. And if the leaf is made of the same matter from which the other elements of the world are composed, and if it addresses a single entity in the scene unfolded by the vision, then the immortalized subject can enter a world of mysteries, symbols and cosmic correspondences.

Leadership: Can you create a comprehensive picture from autonomous entities, so that it comes to life with the help of a view that brings together, in turn, other views?

Only the artist sees what others can barely glimpse, because only he knows how to see an image through the eyes of a leaf, especially if these eyes cover in the field of vision every aspect of a reality that needs to be described without any shadow of concealment. Of course, another view jumps to the aid of the artist's view, which brings together, in turn, other views. Only after this mental activity of ascertaining, understanding and judging some stimuli coming from the outside, with the help of sensory receptors, the artist has the opportunity to recompose the image and discuss it as a unitary whole.

I would like to try something new. I would like to discern the message of a leaf, to be the trigger of its vision, to adjust its positioning in space when it is carried by the wind, long before it feels the caress of the earth. Even if her face is contorted with pain, announcing with a torn voice that her soul hurts terribly leaving the branches of the tree and letting herself fall prey to the wind, she can more easily get close to the vision of the painter who knows how to reveal what others cannot see.

Moreover, I decided to expand my horizon of reality by trying to figure out what a cigarette butt dropped on the sidewalk, with a leaf touched by cold raindrops that the sun is trying to forget, is talking about. What is the stake of such communication, from the perspective of an observer of physical matter? Because, yes, I have the ability to evoke multiple associations and imaginative representations.

Basically, I am referring to a single eligible work to be constituted as a guarantee of the absolute and of my talent as an artist. I emphasize this because the artist sees only what he wishes to observe, transposing into the work only what is shown as an omnipresent entity in a dialogue about the hidden nature of communication between elements. Only thus, by observing and immortalizing the apparently separate elements of reality, can he reveal an ever more comprehensive understanding of the Whole.

In the field of leadership, we can introduce the variable „creation" if we manage to pay special attention to the artist's ability to detect with the sense of sight that reality among realities, and to transform it into a sensation perceived as an image.

While I was looking at a leaf with a feeling of sympathy, as if it were a work of God's creation, a voice from off sounded in my mind: "See Me With Your Mind's Eyes Or WithThe Real Gaze if you want to initiate yourself into the field of painting".

Whoever hears and obeys this inner voice, which is the most precious but made by nature, will find in it an excellent guide to the mastery of the art. Do not forget that the sense of sight, the instrument of the power to understand the aesthetic-ideatic relationship, represents the greatest treasure of the artist.

See You Soon, Myself

On April 14, 2009

Rethink your orientation to your own self, so you can successfully cultivate mutually beneficial relationships.

Yesterday, I found this short story on the Internet:

"Once, there was a man who lost his axe; suspicions were heading to a neighbor. He followed the neighbor – obviously, he was the author. His look, the way he talked, his behavior... everything in him betrayed his guilt !

Soon after, the man found his axe in the garden. The next day, he saw his neighbor again; this time, his behavior didn't suggest that he could have done anything like that."

Leadership: Can you maximize the manifestation of a sensitivity to the perception of your conscious mind, simultaneously with the ability to turn your vision into an alternative reality?

Wisdom teaches us to put evil before good. When we lose our patience and sense of perspective, why do we blame someone we do not know very well, based on the assumption that he is "bad and negative"? Is it proof of wisdom and maturity of thought? Or is it proof of inefficiency/shallowness of thought?

To compete successfully to the test of inter-human relationships and gaining people's trust, you must first optimize your way of thinking and differentiate your emotions and feelings, which push you to go too far with your assumptions and suspicions. There is an element of truth in any mind, no matter how just or unjust it may be. However, you will not be able to achieve a remarkable progress in your personal or professional life if you use an approach (away from the objective reality) when it is not appropriate.

Leadership: Do you differentiate yourself from other people by a model like: initial-situation / transformation-final-situation, by acquiring a vision that contains the image of another side of your personality?

Just as any investment must maintain a certain margin of error, so your sense of analysis and understanding of issues must maintain its balance (not to be between hay and grass, meaning not too just or too unjust). Moreover, concerning people, it must be "repairable", meaning you can intervene in it before complications occur or before it is too late.

Our neighbor was not the author, but he could have been our friend. Such an observation is important because it means that you have focused your thinking in the right direction, it means that your attitude did not pull you down like a millstone. It means that you have not betrayed yourself or your sanity. When you judge someone wrong, you actually externalize your mediocrity and your shortcomings.

In order for your leadership to go well, give yourself something unique and invaluable: vision and visibility. You must see the beauty of the whole picture. Each analysis, each perspective that you adopt adds some additional details to the whole picture, thus building a complex and nuanced picture.

The ability to see things as a whole, without taking into account the current reality, is like trying to sell the solution to a certain problem, but without having enough evidence to convince your colleagues that there is a problem to overcome. The need to sell your idea for solving the problem begins here and now, with you. Or, more openly, the first problem that you have to overcome is yourself.

Acquiring a vision that contains the image of another side of your personality means seeing a situation from the point of view of what is not reprehensible in itself, maximizing your potential to observe and gain another perspective to see that things are not always as they appear.

See You Soon, Myself represents the regress that you register whenever you lose contact with reality, with your true self and with those around you – then, you are not really yourself, but rather that little part of your reasoning, used with little skill, which needs change.

What does your ability to solve a problem depend on? Do you have several back-up options to ensure the quality of your results? What do you think are the characteristics that people identify in you when you need to solve a problem? Are you able to concentrate on your own person before connecting to others? Do integrity and personal beliefs make your leadership seem believable?

Conclusion: In any circumstance, a leader must be himself, he cannot copy others and apply the methods of others, because circumstances are not identical. In inter-human relationships, in critical situations, there is not enough to find and nominate one guilty person or more, but based on the presumption of innocence, you must judiciously and objectively analyze the situation, the causes, find the weak spots of your leadership, and maybe even of your own person.

Rethink your orientation to your own self, so you can successfully cultivate mutually beneficial relationships.

Seeing Those Things Hidden Within The Deep

On December 09, 2014

Achieve the total transformation of the conception of who you are, relating to a deeper experience.

The memories I gathered were not without worth. I was capable of getting inspiration from life experience, imprecise in places, from the lessons full of teachings of the past whirling from high expectations, admitted by the fair consciousness that understandably awaited its transformation. No one could understand me. Somehow, I felt that I was swimming through the waves of a transgressive fiction, through the abandoned field of mysterious feelings from which meanings and various interpretations would trickle. The more I remembered, the more fascinating it seemed.

This experience synthesized as an index of my orientation in time, took on the transparent form of a different kind of explanation, revealing a liability based objectively on types reasoning that could get me close or distance me from myself. Explanations that could confuse that component of the conception of who I could've been, in relation with who I have become.

It was an almost inexplicable phenomenon, evolved in an unpredictable chemistry with the present, built as a set of conclusions with far too many coincidences, in a field of the reprogrammable hypothetical. Everything I tried to acquire from the past, at a consciousness level, seemed rather an extension of Kirchoff's law: at any point in which many conductors meet, the sum of the intensities of the currents that come towards that point being equal to the sum of intensities that leave from that point.

The present became an agent of the revelation filtered through the lens of randomness to which that unabated tension was applied that lay in the depths of hidden thoughts, trapped in the varied context of the past. A portion unbranched from a circuit of remembrance with multiple ping nodes, sending echo request messages to a transmitter host that analyzed events and corrected errors. I had to take into account the delay of answers reaching me.

Leadership: Do you need the understanding that behind each scenario of life are actually the undigested emotions of the past, on the line drawn by a consciousness that is no longer captive in the small world of the Ego?

What is the element that man cannot separate himself from, always carried deep within as an invaluable secret, as a foundation of character, as a scar of time in full knowledge of the effects of the impact with your own consciousness? Memories. Them prefigures any future configuration of a world that makes you forget all that "darkness" of experiences and thoughts full of constraints that have marked your existence in some way.

Memories are the result of life experiences that you have at one point checked as default to open up new horizons of self-knowledge, no matter the way to understand the relationship between what constitutes a high intellectual asset and what is said to be an exceptional innovation specific to the interpretation you give to reality.

Whoever tries to better position themselves in the field of experiencing a wonderful personal story of self-discovery and reinvent their sense of personal value must experience in a past tense the state called "alert mind". It is the state in which man tries to know something new, to answer the existential questions that have always troubled him, of which: "What does it mean to live?"

In its turn, consciousness extracted from the quality of content and memory characteristics, can be considered as a carrier of indirect values, as a relevant support for the respective combination between character and self-acceptance that support leadership. Life experience, without this sort of consciousness, cannot present functions of correcting errors of personality, revealing themselves more or less on one of those steps of waiting that do not enrich functionality and do not open new horizons.

A consciousness that is no longer captive in the small world of the Ego is a breakthrough of creative energies, such as the vision and intellectual rebel force in an attempt to understand the contents of the coordinates of life that remain constant in a variety of interpretations.

Leadership: Do you manifest your willingness to place yourself in a "gate" type area with a previous existence that prefigures any future configuration of a world that wants to be autonomous?

Here it is appropriate to resort to a quote belonging to the lawyer specialized in economic disputes, Daniel R. Castro: "Man has an endless desire of understanding why, so that he can attach a significance to events and appreciate their importance."

This amalgam of knowledge, derived from a memorable past through the lens of memories, which continually haunt the heart, mind, thoughts, filling us with regrets or gratitude, can create a hotbed of instability in terms of emotions, but also a stable one in terms of tuning and accuracy of moving on to the next stages of development.

Leadership, taking as a reference the merit of your positioning on the timeline, by returning to what is your own, subjective, influenced by the story of your life, experiences a perspective which, in fact, comprises several phases of evolution. A phase of investigating deeds, a phase of vibration with what you believe is good and correct, and a phase of restart that permits the changing of limiting beliefs and unleashing true potential.

Leadership can only work best in a framework uncorrupted by the impact of previous experiences, in which the significant is not suffocated by the hidden spiritual struggles. In support of the completion of personality, analyzed with the purpose of identifying weaknesses that can be corrected, we must take into account the advice of the great scientist, Georges Cuvier: "Do not let yourselves get carried away by the exterior. More important are those things hidden in the depths."

To relate to a deeper experience requires you to analyze yourself from the perspective of those experiences that, being never forgotten, turn your reality into an exclusive painting that helps you look at life differently than it is, more interesting, more in keeping with the meaning you attribute to the notion of "revelation".

Seeing Those Things Hidden Within The Deep designates that light of thought and remembrance, from the sphere of understanding aspects less evident, but indicative of the complexity of their composition and of the improvement of your positioning in a context of life that is intertwined with other roles, mandatorily assumed, meant to maximize your leadership potential.

If you want to attach meaning to events that assail you and appreciate their importance, first achieve the total transformation of the concept of who you are, relating to a deeper experience, to an existential anterior that can generate new truths about yourself.

Seek Me With The Eyes That See The Other Facet Of The World

On March 27, 2020

The prospect of a new attitude towards the totality of creation becomes dizzyingly broad if you have the ability to convert your latencies of spirituality into a world that puts the background before form.

I have thought of myself so many times, dreamily, near solemnity, with the pathos of creative zeal, as I would think of someone higher than myself, on a higher spiritual level than I could have imagined. Somehow, this meant discerning that content of precious, esoteric information from the memory of some famous alchemists, thinking that maybe this is my way of making the Great Work, with artistic, literary, but also spiritual application.

In this case, my thinking had to recognize, to adopt, to keep that cognitive pattern of other litteratisque hominibus prestigious, so that my image would be confused with the image of the alchemists in a reality that withstands the test of time. Only in this way could I have gained my double existence, with the prospect of an alchemical, celestial, timeless heritage. I also had to lucidly investigate the expression of a confusing mental condition: "As in heaven, so on earth."

And, perhaps, by incorporating into my own being the cognitive content of universal memory, I could have brought my image closer to the image of another side of science, and taking advantage of this opportunity to surpass myself, even to position myself with a step in front of other people?

Could the image of my being, being enlightened by an intellect agent responsible for the esoteric character of the Sanskrit language, penetrated only by the elite of the Kabbalists, could have fulfilled the function of primordial knowledge, Quasentio Adhis, or knowledge beyond eternity? Yes, it was possible, but only by crystallizing and encoding the meanings of the occult world, in words and verbal structures characteristic of people with a high level of training.

Leadership: Can the creation to which you dedicate time for reflection be the culmination of a total artistic masterpiece in which a single image can constitute the version of reality experienced through kinship with the symbols of the spiritual keys?

But to toil for the Great Work, to such an extent that my image acquires the meaning and personality of another image, beyond any imagination, was useless if we did not consider the two important spiritual keys. Only man who has gone through the hardships of creation can understand them, according to the meaning of the Laws of Aziluth:

"You have to give up this world to win the other."

"And he that shall endure unto the end shall be saved."

Newton spoke with Dee before contacting Flamel. All three made contact with the present, and called it the future, even though everything happened in the past. And from their meeting a star was born, itself the work of universal creation, which eternally illuminates the clear sky of a world situated in God's plan. A star converted into a fabulous image, visible only in the inner gaze of the creator. Many see it, but cannot understand it, and forget about it. Others understand it, but they can't see it, even if they imagine it.

The alchemist uses it as a robust reality, imperatively related to that "Be" of creation. He knows that no one can discover the Great Work, the magical encounter with the world of Reflection in Quintessenza through the inseparability of a historical-cultural organism, without working too hard on what is called the "Privileged Space of Divine Omnipresence". And this is because the phenomenon of transcendence does not really correspond to the reality strongly promoted in the guild of ordinary people, and because ordinary people do not want to believe in another reality.

Leadership: Does the content of your creation vary depending on the background of images that complete the profile of individuals able to share the same vision imprinted on the pattern of a story relived through a demiurgic experience?

And God has done another exceptional work, an unseen world, a world of angels. Newton, Dee and Flamel are kings in this world because they were saved, sanctified, on the grounds that they found a new understanding of man's relationship with space and action. They are immortal because they endured everything to the end, assuming the Sisyphean torment of creation and the demiurgic ambition of re-creation.

I took part in their meeting, under the auspices of God, of course, for only the Creator can arrange such a meeting. I couldn't believe it. I was the key to this meeting. I was even the subject of controversy of the excess of knowledge, in so far as I became intelligible in act by the light of the intellect of the agent Arhexossief. Perhaps also because of my qualities as a writer capable of understanding unimaginable things, or things heard in two or more ways of speaking, in order to be able to articulate and communicate clearly and coherently the truth of Scripture, here on earth as well as in heaven.

At this level, the image of the world in which I was spinning, from one reality to another, was like a trace of light left by the graceful passage of a poet's footsteps on the fine sand of a perishing language, but the spirit that transcends it cannot be reached by death. Honestly, penetratingly, evocatively, I shared through my manuscript, so precious, the accidental forms of expression or sensitive species of the original of an artistic masterpiece: colors, graphic line, symbols, perspective, wide viewing angles on reality, etc.

Since the image of the world became the image of a meeting of spiritual degree, for this was, in fact, an intellectual image interspersed with the assimilation of exceptional informational content, my very capacity to exist both in the extra-mental object and in the mind of a Trio Intellectus, it became a kind of orientation towards the glorification of my intercession as a partner of God.

I bow to the dignity and solemnity of the transition to eternal life, just as Newton, Dee, and Flamel bowed. All three are witnesses of my elevation to the rank of Creator, in a space with many levels of existence, as a participant in an event called Reashmenthis Levhelyss, or the glorification of heaven in the language of angels.

Leadership aims at the content of scientific, literary or artistic creation, displayed against the background of images that complete the pattern of a history relived through a spiritual and providential masterpiece such as: "I am The One Who Changes The Wonder of The World."

Seek Me With The Eyes That See The Other Faced Of The World if you want to understand the perspective of a new approach to knowledge, faced with the great test of the spirit of the times.

This precious, endless knowledge can be approached only by the encounter of the Creator with his Creation, after long efforts to find the balance between mind, body and soul, in the face of the challenge of seeing the magic of augmented reality through a subtle language as a transcendence to another, ideal world.

Self Control

On October 02, 2017

Before you believe something, you have to pretend that you believe it.

Night is my world, just as the sun is spring in my soul. Not only as a result of the effect of a contrast of shadow and light, from one moment to another or from one place to another, having their inspiration from the model of lives built around books and fresh ideas describing the complicated trajectory of the momentary feelings, more often than through the prism of reason. But as a request to confirm the captive thought in a real game: "I'm living in the forest of my dream."

Where the tangled spiritual life penetrates within the acceptance of the two masks: that of hidden life and of creation through the functions of the Infinite Spirit, which the imagination of a mysterious setting imposes on me as an experience of an assumed wandering, at last, something worthy by my complicated and passionate work, a new world is revealed, superior to the other unilateralist approaches.

Another night, another day goes by, and I'm still trapped in the Realm of Twilight, using the Inverse Spell of Forgetting Who I Am.

As an artist trapped in loneliness, laying marks of his tumultuousness in the unspotted spaces of this unknown world, to which both the appearance of the curtain and the weakness called "I haven't got the will to try and fight", first interpretative until I manage to completely pierce and tear it apart, I include doubts about the solidity of the past, to that of the reality and consistency of the present.

Can art reveal the hidden meaning of an identity full of dark and light, dealing with talent and zeal the making of these heavenly lights – the sun and the moon, not necessarily the testimony of a troubled conscience under overcast skies? How long can I plunge into a darker mystery than ever, inside an enigma heavier than time, compared to the distribution of the chance of demonstrating that I can use to my advantage the experiment of being isolated in the shell of a blind faith? "Before the morning comes, the story's told."

Leadership: Do you adopt a neutral, intermediate position, between the defeated and the victor, when the uncertainty of reality hovers above you?

As for my refuge in the obscurity of the deepest mystery, as in the depths of an agonizing prison, or between the walls of conventions and prejudices that take the role of sentinel before a very vulnerable defense, I would like to be able to give the same reply from a scene in the Doctor Faustus novel: "If you'd know the spirit of the bond between us, you'd know that my peace is not threatened, on the contrary, everything is based on calm and peace, a happiness settled and untouched."

A neutral, intermediate position, between the defeated and the victor, of the one on whom the uncertainty of a reality overwhelmed by fears and phantasms hovers above, is the same as that in which you cut a piece of a film running in the negative in a dimly lit room: without eyes tearing, without anyone realizing what is happening, without anyone caring about these things.

The position you adopt in front of reality is a tour of the most intimate resorts of spiritual life. Before you engage in overcoming the limits of resistance to the uncertainties that push you, you have to take part in this tour.

Through the effect of the commitment to achieve a tension-filled atmosphere inspired by the weakness called the intelligence of the honest soul, and on the other hand, extensive forms, purged by details, entered rigorously in the composition of a "Self Control" worn throughout life, serving to protect me from the abuse of any vanity lit atop a writerly décor, of great frustrations and resentments, I draw close to the craving of my poetic creation from the privileged place of artistic, high-spirited and intense anxiety.

Sometimes darkness – You help me forget to play my role !– is a fragment of time cut from a reconciliation with anguish, with which I am still in direct contact, a wonderful proximity to something unreal, but still possible, a scenario concocted by my brain and put in contradiction to the attraction towards recurring melancholy. A route traveled by the discovery of a dispositional symptom of life in a state of germination, of a defensive compulsion, of a reactional formation, continued with that state of blockage occurred as a result of a traumatic event.

Leadership: Are you able to realize at a level of perception that there is something beyond what you see?

Due to my contact with Adrian Leverkuhn in Thomas Mann's work, I came to reflect upon the complexity of the human condition, its limitations but also its possibilities to overcome them on this night that will never go:

"A work is made out of the artistic work with the purpose of creating appearance – and the question is whether in today's state of consciousness and our knowledge, the sense of truth, this game is allowed, if it's permissible intellectually, if it can still be taken seriously, if the work itself, as an autonomous imagination and harmonically organic, can stand in some legitimate relation with total uncertainty. Unless any appearance, even the most beautiful, in fact just the most beautiful, had not become a lie today."

Whenever you try to lock yourself into a darkness that is impenetrable, deep and mysterious as a door to a parallel universe where time flows backwards, like a question to which you do not get any answer, it happens that you relive excitingly that state of research that supports the generation of new theories or models starting from "nothing matters" and continuing with "I never stop myself from wandering why."

Everything that happens in a still frame from the film of reality represents the foundation of a lie you invent not so because you were forced, but because you wanted to believe it and, on whose behalf, you have let yourself be used. Lying can be combated by living the miracle of a new world by taking an identity of feeling established between the concept of "alterity" and "private space."

"I must believe in something, so I'll make myself believe it."

The miracle that helps you live is to believe in something that is hard to see or to further seek something that is very hard to find.

Self Control is the trait of releasing ownership of what appears to be the fatal trap of circumstances created by the sense of self-detachment. You are no longer yourself when you are questioning your skills, identity and beliefs.

If you want to overcome a moment of weakness, sometimes you have to believe in something that is not necessarily true. The same is true if you tend to go deep into a limitation of a spiritual, emotional and sometimes physical nature.

Self-Image

On May 21, 2017

Be willing to see the truths revealed to you during your own definition, as compared to a picture whose author you do not know.

I began to see an unrelenting attitude toward life, with its ups and downs, like a man who looked too close to a painting, observing the details but losing the whole vision. The art I assumed was no longer a call to free expression in the depth of an intangible world, but only a self-preservation of the self-image that I was going through in the plans of the extreme of the role of a researcher.

As a fervent supporter of a new system of beliefs, as a promoter of the image that appeared to me on the screen of reality filling the quadrant of the world with glamorous additions, I became increasingly fanatical in my fixed idea that there was, however, a limited measure in the capacity of man to transcend the immediate concrete situation. And to live in terms of possibility. Art is probably subordinated to the image of an intimate universe; it is the image of a man who seeks the meaning of life by manifesting the freedom to explore his artistic values in the process of generating a reality that cultivates "news" rather than "fake".

Beyond the brilliant knowledge and firmness of reason justified only by the involvement in the transformation of my own values, there was only a rational decision, a personal escape from the hell of the life of facets that should have crushed me in the implacable going forward, at least as much as destiny and the detail of boldness can be reconciled. But of which sincerity always doubts.

So, the first truth that was suddenly revealed to me is this: you cannot fulfill an extraordinary destiny if you do not escape from the world around you, to give birth to an original art that owes nothing and does not conform to the usual models of world representation.

Leadership: Do you overcome the condition of the pioneer by resorting to a "You can't hide your own true" lucidity experience which strikes at the other force, of the image of a complex reality and a distinct individuality?

And since I dared to open a window to this silent convention, called Status Quo, based on tolerance and on the generous giving of the self, I had the merit of clarifying an aspect that, as I could not believe, now applies to the whole world. The elements around me that inspired me, stirred me and made me identify with an artist of the moment, were like beautiful and judicious scientific arguments presented that could support the momentum towards another choice that I knew was a possible chasm, an experience of lucidity "You can't hide your own true."

Full of content, my time acted on the psychology of living through the nerve of a sharp intelligence. And to the sensitivity to the novelty of a seeming emptiness rich in significance, eternally a flame of life, with all the glory and honor of a miracle that eventually happened to me, to which I was an eyewitness, belonged a trace of blood impregnated at the moment of a sublime force. Itself felt as yet another test of my investment on the path of a chemistry that stirred my imagination, a mystery being drawn from a thriller full of surprising revelations, deep in a verse of chemistry of attraction to everything that is superior and which cannot be explained through words.

A pioneer is a man who sinks into the depths of an intangible world, is a master of precision, subtlety and complexity in the study of nature, art and science. Man's ability to accept the new psychology of the Ego, fueled by experiences that have the force of ordering the world, is influenced by the way to indirectly convey that motivation that urges anyone to overcome any form of self-enclosure.

The Unique and Random Functional Attribute of Creation is the content of lucidity you post in a reality in which sometimes you feel lost.

Austrian mathematician Ludwig Eduard Boltzmann knew that the labor of thought could be accompanied by intense suffering, that of not accepting a state of affairs under the conditions of the burden of existence. He was always complaining that he was beset by questions that were more and more meaningless, which had to be categorically rejected. Two interrogations unanswered came rushing in his mind, harassing him constantly: "From what cause stems the law of cause and effect" and "Why, after all, I exist right now in a world that is not as I want it to be?"

The most captivating man, an artist who is a forger of meanings, can show us through how he feels the activity of thinking based on the recommendations of his utility in a demonstrative lesson of approach, that of distance or differentiation from his destination status. In which the laws of deductibility of the basic aspects of life are provided according to the art of emancipation of the control act. Where everything appears to be photographed and you feel like spending hours on end wondering what's going on.

Leadership, compared to a painting whose author you do not know, can be complemented by the remnants of an existence in which you feel the pleasure of experiencing any situation with unrestrained perspective and unlimited power of acceptance of a sense of belonging to a whole composed of three truths.

The truth of a trained gaze, the truth of the transformations that you endure, and the truth of the perception that interferes with the symbiosis of reason and sentiment. They are subjected to the objectivity with which you present your "interventions" in the vanity of the world or in its beauties.

The activity of artistic thinking, related to the great metamorphosis of creation, is a spontaneous effect of depth, of the internalization of a rich experience of transcending the ordinary. It is the experience of a reality that enters into communion with man through a continuous transcendence "from you and beyond you".

Self-Image is a possible gap if you get too close to the edge of the moment in which you let yourself be carried away by inspiration to extract a disturbing truth. What doesn't defeat you makes you stronger, but at the same time it can force you to distance yourself from the way you feel you want to be.

Be mindful of what truths are revealed to you during your own definition ! A pioneer is never defined according to how he has decided to approach the emptiness of a fallen world, but how he approaches the abundance of a plurality of decisive and principal goals underlying a healthy development.

Destiny is a painting whose author you do not know, but to whom you can attribute a name, a depth and you can reset it to the size of your own consciousness and your own value in the world.

Self Leadership

On June 22, 2018

Before you rise to the forefront of people, learn to focus on the content of motivation that gives a meaning to your life within the framework of a work of art.

Life has set for me in its intriguing game a system of changes aimed at the destiny of an ever-straying world from the divine plan, as the chaotic events intensify against an increasingly hostile reality against which I began to fight with the pen of a genuine novelist writing history and the methods of a conceptual artist who sees the world painted in an expression of astonishment.

As an excellent chess player in a continuous exercise with himself, my life entrusts my first move to the unitary character of science, thus saving me from a wandering without a pre-set path within a theme of a nebulous consistency. Beyond all, I have enough spirit to immediately realize the truth expressed by a champion, that such a game is equivalent to leaving the primary, static and safe equilibrium state, in search of another equilibrium that is progressive, dynamic, uncertain.

Chess intertwines with art at the point where I have to obey stricter rules that I would not normally agree with. But because the order comes from above, from someone stronger than me, I can only say "Yes" to an unknown destiny.

Leadership: Are you eager to strive for ultimate knowledge, pushing the limits of self-sufficiency by venturing beyond what is known?

The wings of the angel in me, whirling to the highest and the most perfect, the thrust of the great knowledge, the tendency of the spirit to unleash the terrestrial pressure, illuminate the glory of a divine attention directed at the thirst of embracing an incursion in the midst of a world that still preserves the purity and the charm of nature little touched by man.

The color I give to my writings, the blood of Christ's sacrifice and that of the martyrs, love and fire of Pentecost, a nonverbal universal language that is intuitively used to go beyond any boundaries imposed by the human condition, is a wing of light, flying to the unknown, but especially to the wills ignored by the mortals of a defeated stronghold, called "self-sufficiency".

All these considerations are quite dangerous when claiming an effective word of mouth in the verse "I, too, could be a noble", despite the unchanged transparency of energy that prevents the soul and mind from rising to the light. I try to ignore my belonging to the contrast of black and white on the blackboard of complete motionlessness, in the way I accept my fate, wandering idly in the footsteps of a renewal that I did not know I had longed for.

Leadership: Does the motivation that gives meaning to your life depend on your perception of the ability to accomplish a spiritual task as well as the value that you assign to this task?

Beyond participating in the dense life of things and phenomena, by projecting an aesthetic related to the theory and the promotion of a mysterious art, I became accustomed to ask at the end of each day four questions, upon which should reflect any erudite in the situation of giving meaning to his status as a refugee in a narrative, and at the same time imaginary realm, in direct contact with all the times he belongs to by probing his depths:

1. How did I contribute to the development of science?

2. How did I contribute to the expansion of the universe?

3. Is the world moving in another direction because of what is happening in my mind?

4. What good reason would God have to make a star in the sky for me?

The price of hurtful memories served at the table of destiny, the trap of the images and projections that bind me to the future, spring from this enigma in which I live without realizing it, plus the paradigm shift from that of an instant type of revision to that of a continuous assessment.

True leadership is not a final move on the chessboard of life, but a conscious guidance to soulful fulfillment that frees the spirit from the constraints imposed by circumstances and allows it to thrive beyond limits.

The painting of the world in which dominate black and white on a chessboard that burns with impatience for someone or something to make the final move, the matte of a life with all its moments of balance, seems to be painted with the blood of an unknown artist who committed suicide right after he finished it, for lack of motivation. An original painting filled with content, the rarity with which one shows his independence from the clichés of a fading thinking – as a manifesto of freedom from things privative, inspires the idea of realizing an art of perverse intellectualism to sterilize the poetic mystery.

Perfection is the secret geometry of form and substance, in no case a randomly cast color over the length of a long life that does not find a form of total satisfaction, other than what you feel in search of a justification of the assumptions on which are based the projections of consciousness.

As you can see, the value of the spiritual task that I am addressing in the formation of leadership concepts depends, first of all, on the fulfillment of the soul that makes me feel that I have had an impact on this world. Afterwards, it depends on the hand of destiny that guides me to where I must be and to make the "work" of union with the prototype of a perfect human being.

Leadership: Can you propel yourself beyond the limits of the credible, studying the form and properties of a thought centered on the immortalization of the destiny of the creative man in a masterpiece of universal literature?

I am reading the preface of the book "The Flemish Painting", by Arturo Perez-Reverte, at this very moment: "An art restorer finds a mysterious chessboard inscription on a painting of a 15th century Flemish painter. The surprising discovery drives a whole gallery of characters to embark on a risky adventure to unravel the enigma. But this is not an enigma: it is the key to a secret that could have changed the history of Europe. The chess moves mark, step by step, the success or failure of the investigation, always overlooked by the diabolical play of traps and ambiguities, attended not only by painting, but also by music, literature, history and mathematics."

I believe there is a similarity between me and this book, through an uncertainty that throws me in a patch of doubt about the justification with which I confront my destiny expressed in the way of a painter to portray a different reality different from what is known by everyone. If I get deeper into a lifestyle that allows me to be comfy and numb, I cannot turn myself into a puzzle for others. This is also the life of creation, it is the symbol of a paradox: it must be consumed abundantly, but it never runs out.

Man's highest meaning on Earth is to attain perfection. Find the thing that you were born to do and carve it in the sky with the hand of a master. You are about to imagine that you are fully entering the Orient, deep into a dream like "One Thousand and One Nights" and become a prisoner in the depth of a poem written in color instead of words.

Leadership literature should not be dominated by theory, but by art-like sensitivity. This literary genre must exhibit a special predilection for the contrast or depth effect given by an image of man's power in the creative space, by virtue of which man feels enriched after the experience of the space of expression of art in the diversity of its forms and, above all, from the sense with which man is heading towards God through untiring activity.

The image that inspires you to make important changes in life is the fulfillment of an ascension to the heights of the pride of being superior to this world, whose shattering story charms generation after generation of readers.

Self Leadership is the exposure in a visual projection of a message, of an idea, for a period of time long enough for the world's brain to consciously record it as a sort of effect of the "forbidden fruit" temptation. It becomes all the more tempting that the rules of building a meaning given to life are presented as an enigma shrouded in a riddle.

Before you lead others, you have to realize that you are in the great experimental theater of life not only to be read by the rest of the world, but to play a volunteer role in carrying out a riddle called "the motivation of perfection", which the world must not give up on.

I have not always believed in myself, but now I believe with all my strength. Perfection has been given to me because I have made available to the universe a part of me that contemplates "how would it be if..." and always goes on with the plan until the very end.

Self-Raising Flower (II)

Assume the reality you create, without detaching yourself from your own Self.

One man writes and another feels slumped on the pavement when he reads. But in all things there is a connection, and not all people see the same when viewing the same word. So, I think to myself: it's good to limit ourselves to just words. We often pass over in silence the fact that we find it difficult to accept each other, eventually we barely send each other a greeting, believing that everything belongs to the space outside the communication in order to be reconciled with ourselves.

Words are the fiery circle of self-confidence, the miracle of a healing that takes away any pain. Only nature is my best friend, especially when I write with the same hand that nature itself has endowed me with, hoping that in this way I will find my purpose in a space of meditation, silence and self-discovery. This closeness to myself becomes all the more necessary as writing acquires the objective proportions of the evolution of nature, sometimes spreading in unique prefigurations of various horizons, determined by the subjective motivation of supporting different ideas.

No wonder. I understood that life flows like the beating of the delicate wings of the butterfly, and my words cannot stop the natural course of nature. They can take flight like bees to a flower of freedom, or to a flower of purity loaded with pollen from stamens that, in time, will reach maturity. But not all people have reached maturity.

Leadership: Are you able to control your inner conflicts through dedication and order, thanks to an ability to interconnect with nature that can individualize your Creation?

It is not a legend that the flowers that live from the fruit of the earth are hot flowers that, like words, grow only out of love, out of true self-appreciation. There are cases when the butterfly has to let itself be guided by destiny and comes to rest only when it reaches the end of the road, other times it has to wait until the wings dry in order to fly.

But people who write, like people who read, do not all research the words that are eligible to ensure the cross-pollination of beautiful flowers meant to attract and, especially, to retain small living things. The fact that I manage to avoid any inner conflict, to lead the battle from the space of reality, even to produce a hyperbole of an identity corresponding to that of the space of physical reality, but on a spiritual level, is an artist's ability to imitate nature and create a strong illusion.

Each word can have a special, diaphanous, sublime smell, it can have a sweet and aromatic taste, only if you know how to associate it with the flowers from which honey is produced, not only those from which wreaths are woven in which the little creatures sneak in without being taken into account. The basis of my creation is the idea that any terrestrial reality bears in itself in the form of a force of nature rendered with the help of words. Easy to do at first glance, however I'm still looking for my words...

Leadership: Do you orient your bookish approaches towards the authenticity of a world built on the distinctions operated by the intellect and the emotional states coming from the expressions of a language based on visual perception?

One more thing. Words with multiple meanings. Their peculiarity is that they grow from the organs of succulent storage plants. Sometimes words like this emit a special scent, specific to the flowers visited by the female bee Euglossa Cordata, described in only one way: AWESOME. It is the beginning of a fabulous story that only children can embrace. And so, the words escape the onslaught of crooked judgments and innocent condemnations.

In fact, words fill with pollen only when they try to copulate with the flowers, or just by visiting the Anacamptis flowers whose pollination is provided by the bees that populate a colorful image. And the message of a painting that captures the flight of bees sounds something like this: "Beware of the sting of love ! "

How beautifully these words are chosen, how easily they combine to form a bouquet of flowers in which the scent of jasmine and the delicate freshness of the teardrop can be noticed.

Fortunately, we are different, otherwise it would be very boring. Peers, we understand them, we are not obliged to accept them, everyone resonates with what they look like. Understanding is more than acceptance, and if you accept you have a lot to do afterwards. Often people are more beautiful seen from a distance, just like the flight of butterflies, their success having the same lifespan as that of the queen bee. They feed on the book of words with one last drop of honey.

The very words you read here are sweetened with a rich and nourishing rosemary honey, but not everyone feels the taste of honey, just as not everyone feels the vibration of the words that contain me.

Leadership: Can you capture the particularity of an intellectual thinking focused on knowing the reality perceived as an act of the existence of words in a universe tempted by the pleasure of living images?

Nature has included me here as an indirect form of the relationship between spirituality, on the one hand, and matter and form, on the other. Looking at things this way, I end up asking myself questions that seem more and more lockable, words that bring to attention that predilection of a notorious character from the work of Marguerite Yourcenar for everything that is in perpetual change:

"From the universe of ideas, Zeno returned to the more opaque universe of the substance contained and delimited in a form. Crouched in a corner, in his room, he wasted his waking hours in the effort to acquire a fairer conception of the relations between things, or in unformulated meditations on nature, thus correcting that vice of thought which consists in grasping objects, in order to use them, or, on the contrary, of throwing them away without examining more closely the specific substance from which they are made."

In saying this I want to highlight a truth of the Great Knowledge: until man leads his words to probing the connection between the butterfly and the bee, considering their mode of communication to achieve a harmony of creation (which the Creator himself desires and will gradually establish it), nor will the various forms of the dialectical game appear as a necessity in the categories of beauty.

Great knowledge focuses on how to convey feelings or experiences, with the stipulation that anything seen can be an extension of a dream, a vision, a contemplation or a desire.

The great knowledge has as its first consideration the fact that everything can be interpreted differently depending on the visual perception.

Self-Raising Flower is the beginning of an inner change that has its source in the cult of nature, such as earth, wind, water, sunlight, etc. We must learn to introduce into our inner world any element of nature with which to communicate directly, without a teacher and interpreters, but only with the soul. This is the true basis of alchemy that allows the progressive realization of the Great Hermetic Work.

Right now, dear reader, try to give up higher concepts in favor of a more thorough research on the self: what makes the flight of a butterfly influence your soul?

What determines the vibration of your soul knowing that, like a bee, you have to make 3,000 flights a day to bring 100g of water to the hive? How could you express these in just a few words that are closely related to Mother Nature?

Self-Raising Flower (I)

The way you perceive the connection between art and creation is identical to the way you perceive the connection between science and the soul in the context of the requirements of a healthy environment.

I have always liked to write, to let myself be carried away by the rhythm of inexhaustible motivation, hoping that in this way I will find my peace, the discernment of poetic creativity, identical with the relationship between the sublime and the ephemeral. Probably, this is also a virtue, to have a rich inner life, just as is experienced by any brush artist who knows how to identify with what we aesthetically call "the beauty of a work of art".

Sometimes I wrote something for someone special, and even then, the more or less accidental joining of various categories of artistic forms led to the same point, to the agreement between interior and exterior, between intimate conviction and statement, between perception and vision. Because writing appears in the depths of my being as a kind of impulse given by divine enlightenment so that I can embrace the unlimited freedom of expression through artistic means, so as to more easily observe the close connection, or even the perceived identity between interpretive rigor and empirical clarity.

It was so interesting to find out that writing, no matter how varied it may manifest within an Inserifamech(the wise order of the great Creation), especially artistically, coincides with the intimate perception of a knowledge-based memory, as a result of researching competent people in any of the fields of science and life. Even more interesting than that is the interest I took in what concerned me, taking note of the urgent need to meet myself...

Can your leadership be interpreted from another perspective, that of a possible correspondence between the language of an inner calling and the outer language of symbols?

Indeed, most of the time I wrote just for myself, because no one is like me anymore. Rather, we remained the same as when we ran alone in the field in the summer, smelling the scent of colorful petals that, in turn, selected their cohabiting partners in the world of flying insects. The essential thing was for the pollen of the flowers to reach the stigma of other flowers, no matter how this natural beautification was fulfilled, and thus my words to acquire the character of the discovery of a random pollination.

The scientific explanation for this "distance to near" influence was to be given only later, when the mutual affinity of the insect and the plant would have reached an astonishing degree of empathy, and they could no longer live without each other. I leave it to you to decide what the mutual affinity of the insect and the plant symbolizes in the great book of Creation.

There were also cases when the understanding of nature and art, through the act of creation springing from the imitation of nature, somehow intuiting the fact that a creation that can be understood from every level of living things, from every movement of them, was made through a syntheses of the image circumscribed to a type of realism that demands multiple influences, from connectionism to symbolism.

All this was happening at a time of personal transformation, when I was beginning to weigh in on the contribution of nature to the formation of art. In this regard, I looked very much like one of Marquise Yourcenar's characters who had set out in search of the philosopher's stone:

"For I had gone a long way in denying all values to see if anything could be said later on, in the way of decomposing all things, in order to look at them afterwards as they come together again on another plane or in another way."

Leadership: Are you ready to take the time to penetrate a wide variety of environmental conditions and offer a view that brings the outside to the inside, so as to capture the essence of the art that crowns the Work of Creation?

Nature is the mirror of an art that delicately directs its brush, in depth, towards the canvas of the life of some exceptional living miniatures (tender, energetic, curious creatures, also equally faithful to the act of creation). They are also a kind of guide, consolation or help. Relying on this observation, I can say that the writing itself repeats itself as a new specimen of the fruit of the earth, regaining its freedom, not without passing through the ring of flowers of a thorough knowledge of the "sensitive object".

At other times, writing is the possibility of being powerless, because any word is "colorless" like the discreet insect Chrysopa Carnea, which if not projected into the sky with a clear understanding, can inspire some fear in the one who sees it. I continue to write sincerely, in the field of aesthetics, in full accordance with the pleasant-smelling nectar of a wide range of flowers transformed into a dreamlike description of the struggle of desires and plans for the future, a mystical struggle that takes place only in my soul.

When we choose to find out the effect of words we should discern between the peace of feelings and the burning desire to be one with nature, the writer being not only the customs officer of the word, but also a condition of the presence of bees that collect pollen to make honey sweet and full of therapeutic virtues.

Or every word I write here repeats the same operation of pollination of the meanings of language enrichment, producing the fertilization of a special flower: Euphorbia Milii(Crown of Christ). Even the butterfly has in its buccal apparatus a cylindrical notch specially adapted for harvesting plant pollen, and if my words retain anything of its flight, that something is immediately the "Symbol of Metamorphosis." And the only way I can express the fluttering of the butterfly's wings as it flies from place to place is the sum of the following words: Ars longa, vita brevis. (Art is long, life is short).

So, here's the conclusion. Face to face with the splendors of nature, a writer must perceive the integral part of a dynamic, expressive art, which grows and changes and continuously expands its range of meanings, evolving towards new types of exposure of information from the game of metamorphoses.

The Great Work of The Great Creation is a constant interaction between ego and environment, sustained by science and soul. And the essence of the art that crowns the Work of Creation is the concept of plausibility, the non-transfigured imitation of nature and reality.

Self-Raising Flower highlights the beginning of a new form of manifestation of Creation between what happens in nature and what happens in myself. Eventually, I realized that what is happening in nature is happening in myself, nature itself being a reflection of my way of life. And what happens between the act of creation and the revelation of one's own psychological self highlights the comprehensive beginning of a new avant-garde.

Two requirements provide the environment for the completion of the act of creation: to find a logic in any movement in the middle of nature and to be the basis for the emergence of a systematizing criterion of the effects produced by any movement or phenomenon of nature.

Self Searching

On February 11, 2017

Understand your position towards what amounts to be considered "normal" in everything that is not a triumph of human value.

I do not believe that the dread for that island will ever completely leave me, most often it lies somewhere in the bottom of my heart, a simple distant cloud, a memory and vague suspicion. But there are moments when the tiny cloud spreads until it darkens the whole sky. Then, I look around at my smaller fellows. And I am terrified. I see harsh and animated faces, others dark or threatening, others changing, spurious. None to have the calm authority of a rational being. I feel as if the animal within them will have to emerge. That the degradation of all on the island will occur again, but on a larger scale.

*I know that this is just a figment of my imagination, that these appearances of men and women around me are truly men and women, forever, perfectly rational creatures, full of humanly desires and tender worries, freed from instincts, not being the slaves of any fantastical law – beings completely different from Animal-People. And yet, I run away from them, from their curious gazes, from their questions and support, and I wish to be far away from them. Alone. Only with God. **

Leadership: Do you try to prove to yourself that you are sincere in what you believe or do not believe, to prevent mental conflicts that fuel your alienation from everything and everyone?

Everything you imagine as a means of controlling the power to prevent the degradation of your own social condition, is processed at the height of the experience of being put in relationship with a reality that hurts and displeases you. A reality expressed through the fear of being equal to a value of man, exceeded by the requirements of a society in a continuous process of adjustment towards an unknown absolute, which doesn't highlight the purpose of your own creation and existentiality.

The great reward of virtue, the impulse to resist those transformations you do not wish for in your life, which contribute to gaining the authority of a rational-superior being, is the testing of the strength to accept the disappointment caused by attachment to what represents "the ideal man" in the sphere of the natural and normality.

The evolution of the one who experiences "disappointment" by isolating himself from others, abandoning himself repeatedly to divine will, has two forces as the basic resources. The depth of peace of mind and the depth of consciousness in which all things meet in that same unique reality that stimulates the momentum on the endless road of personal training.

Evolution in forming an autonomous personality means to recognize what is manifested within you by escaping from the reality which, by understanding it in its essence, you cannot accept.

Beyond the correctness of assessments made between the causes and effects of changes that contribute to the flow of life, is distinguished that permanent need of man to assume his own story in the context of the courage to follow his own path through the simple test of self searching.

Self Searching can be focused in the following message: understand your position to what amounts to be considered "normal" in everything that is not a triumph of human value. It is an isolated process, in no way a reason for pride, but yet, the only advantage for the absolutely necessary detachment of man from a world that eliminates humanity from man.

This is the essence of the novel "The Island of Dr. Moreau", written by H. G. Wells.

Self-Training In Leadership - From Creation to Practice

On October 15, 2008

Create a self marked by power, a self that will develop and mature over time, without considering yourself more than a simple human.

I really liked the book The Egyptologist, written by Arthur Philips. Why did I like it? Because it is a great history lesson, full of lessons, which is still preserved today in the great field of leadership. The illustrations discussed in this book are not of impressive fidelity by the critical standards of Western art, nor are they who knows what typical of Egyptian art. And yet, how revolting they are !

Analysis: Despite my carefree childhood, the people I most admire in this world are self-made people, a description that seems to fit the king as well. By self-education I don't mean poor people who became rich. I understand, rather, those people who collected the fragments that were made available to them when they were abandoned or oppressed children. And then, through the bubbling, creative force of their own minds, they fashioned a powerful self.

These people create identities that bear absolutely no trace of their dark heritage, no trace of thoughtless parents or dusty childhood towns or wrongs committed against them, no trace of deprivation (of money, affection, food, friendship), absolutely no trace of the source material, but instead an aesthetic and practical creation, divine in its simplicity and perfection. Simplicity: everything comes from this single brain, no parental influence, no local tradition, nothing that does not come from the self-creating mind itself.

Leadership: Do you manifest your inner strength in the course of a self-transformation that limits the contact between what you were and what you have become, under the imprint of an evolution in which you establish your own competences?

Perfection: everything must be created, every attitude, every particularity, every belief and value and distinguished gesture. Nothing inherited can be tolerated from an intolerable past. And yet, paradoxical as our world is, these people are often not respected, while people like me - born with love, with guidance, with all kinds of advantages - are. I admire probably the most of his stanzas, Quatrain 24 (Fragments B C):

You can easily imagine the young man composing these lines not long after learning that he had become the king of Egypt. But how can you imagine him, other than leading a well-equipped army, with solid war chariots, numbering between 20,000-30,000 soldiers who obey only his orders? Can you imagine him mature and brave enough, but too inexperienced in life?

Leadership: Do you give up being satisfied with the superficial aspects of life and try to bring out the light within you, beyond the superiority with which you feed your pride of being an independent spirit?

To shape a reality that does not necessarily favor you, so without being under the empire of a native talent, pay attention to what amazes you around and try to form a clear perspective on the image you build of yourself in a context that allows you to express yourself freely. Clear perspective, an eminently visual, perceptible concept, helps you see things objectively and better understand the context in which you act.

Just as a painter focuses on detail and composition to create a coherent picture, so you must form a clear perspective on your vision and values so that you can direct your thinking and actions toward appropriate decisions that reflect not only what you are now, but also what you aspire to become in the future. Try to bring clarity and direction to the process of shaping reality, try to see beyond the superficial aspects of life, and try to bring out the light from within.

Knowing that every stage of development, from childhood to adulthood, involves a self-transformation in which the bubbling power of one's own mind plays a crucial role, beware of feeding your mind with ideas like "I am somebody because I was born someone", under the guise of unfocused vision.

Be true to yourself and then you can no longer be false to that "someone" you think you are. Stay as far away from the pride of trying to control your life and vulnerability, all by yourself, and especially stay away from the rebellion of thinking that you are above the rest of the world.

Leadership can become a center of strength only if you are able to rise by your own strength to the standard of "God", taking into account the fact that sometimes you have to give up pride to fight against your vain impotence.

Self-Training In Leadership - From Creation to Practice involves changing one's own person and is the result of a unique life experience, without the influence of parents, which shows that everything comes from you, from your inner strength and potential. The way you relate to the reality of the absence of parents helps you to be responsible for the simplicity and uniqueness of your thinking, and even if you develop under parental influence, in the end you will realize that everything comes from yourself, from your inner strength and potential.

Creation is what comes from within, from an unfathomable and inexpressible depth, and not from without, not from the need to overcome the disadvantages of life's hard lessons. While practice is what leads to the development of logical, analytical thinking and creativity, it is what brings results. Or, as someone once said, "Practice isn't what you do once you're good. It's what you do when you're great."

Senianymo

The beauty of art is to always know that you are painted with eyes that cannot be seen, but that can be seen in the background of a view from another world.

I am the mirage of a rose because I see myself reflected in a purer, livelier world, more inclined to good and beautiful, even if I am magnified and often distorted by the nostalgia of a pregnant, repetitive time. They are the power of the rose to be listened to, understood, adored, through the nobility of an artistic, eloquent and perennial authenticity. They are the unspoken history of a rose artistically doubled by the transition from the emotional space to the space of a literary event of great scope and visibility that presupposes, mainly, a concentration on interiority.

I am more than a man, I am a gift of nature, a worshiper of nature, an embodied spirit of nature. That is why, in art, it is so important to aim for the absolute, accepting the symbolic value of a periodic renewal. Because being a man of great refinement, and at the same time a product of nature, is the impeccable combination of imagination and color, between man's openness to the beautification of the soul, the cultivation of taste for the select and beautiful, and the purest sincerity.

I realized in time that painting is the product of nature judged in a human way, clothed in a human language with all its limitations and imperfections, but always rendered by a psychological color code. And the attitude of approaching the portrait in painting can be justified by man's relationship with himself, but also with nature, in an eternity of the feeling of closeness to the divine, of feelings expressed metaphorically, in an expressive way, towards the accuracy of a visual image.

Leadership: Can you engage in an imaginative process that reflects the conceptions, worries, and emotional concerns of the dreamer as part of an artistic endeavor open to the divine nature?

I think that only here, in the world of painting, in the technique of brushing, in this unwritten pact with the divinity, do I feel most at ease, other than I am in real life, with such a large share of the emotional in the decision to develop what is better in a story about the duality of the human soul. The work of an artist is the work created by a divine being after accepting the understanding of nature: eternal, unchanged, perfect.

It is a pride, not a chore to know yourself as uplifting through the expression of the art that throws in front of you the feeling of approaching each touch of the brush and its meticulous reading among impressionistic details. An even greater pride is to turn your art into the expression of an adventure of the soul passed through a mysterious memory of nature. If through death we become a kind of memory of nature, then through life we become the destiny of a painting that is always kept unaltered before the eyes of saints.

Ciò ha portato al suggerimento che tutti i miei ricordi sono fragili in natura.

It is an impulse of great significance. When I write about art, just as when I write about a rose that fascinates me to the point of adoration, making me relive another life, I delight in my image projected in a double space: of endless dreams and astral travels. Certainly, the whole knowledge to which the existence of the dream shaped by art connects me is an imaginative process that reflects the conceptions, worries and emotional concerns of the dreamer as part of an artistic approach with openness to the divine nature.

Leadership: Are you ready to integrate into a world where you can be anything, as long as you take your art to the level of a snapshot of wisdom or an irresistible image?

Thanks to my resonance with the loving intelligence of nature, with its subtle energies, I feel worthy of a spiritual rejuvenation that the rose considers as the miracle of a special artistic expressiveness. The rose itself, as it is, splendid, candid, of landscape, introduces me as if in an artistic current defined by a serious color, in a style of abstract art of the kind of Rayonism, through which the Russian painter Mikhail Larionov proposed to suggest the fourth dimension in painting, to give the impression that the work is timeless and spatial, through a spiritualization of the visual image achieved by the technique of parallel and contrasting colored rays.

Thus I came to believe about myself, dealing with the problem of creation, that I am the author of a new consciousness related not only to the beauty of nature, but also to the theme of nature Athempisyon(an unwritten pact with divinity) captured by an exceptional comparison: I am more than a painter, I am what the painter forgot to draw about himself in a search for the other character that only the literary work can reproduce exactly. I am a visual image in painting because I manage to capture so vividly, eloquently, colorfully, an attempt to come to terms with life.

Sensitive, expressive, vibrant, the rose signals to me that it hears what I say to it, as through a bunch of pure thoughts, as long as I am ready to integrate in a world where I can be anything, in which any soul can fit on a spiritual plane. The divine part of a painter is the reflection of worlds somewhere between near and very far, between heavenly and earthly, between the human soul dimension and the luxury of flowering nature.

If the rose had been an artist of colors in an eternal, pure, instinctive, vibrant world, it would probably have warmly shook my hand like a creator of light suspended between dream and reality. And if the rose had been a writer, writing about life marked by fiction, then I probably would have been adapted to the psychology of a character who dies and returns to earth in a different state of being.

An irresistible image in leadership can appear as an irresistible image of creation divided between what contains you (the spiritual level) and what attracts you (say the horizon of an alternative world).

For that, you have to be an artist who always lives between here and there, between past and present, between space and time, between universal and particular, between life and death.

Senianymo – I gave this name to my rose, meaning the opening of man to the artistic life, because he is the only one who listens to my soul, thoughts, pain or joy, merging in him two forces: creation and divinity. He is the chosen species of the Creator, the symbol of my inner transformation, he is the image of God transposed into a profound lesson of rebirth, transcendence and flourishing reinvention.

I hear his message and then I pay attention to it even if it seems crazy or impossible to me.

Set The World On Fire (II)

If you do not know how to read a person's face very well, in any circumstance, you cannot expect to improve the image that others see in you when you translate into an impressionist painting.

Whenever I tried to create a new personal image in line with the strength of the most enthusiastic thoughts and aspirations, I ended up creating a new identity because of the increased loyalty to small creative activities. The transition to a particular personality is accomplished by a responsible assumption of the artist's condition, only through dialogue with the high purity vibration of the colours gathered from the luminous powder of a kaleidoscope of small, insignificant and ephemeral facts.

The only logic of understanding aesthetic resorts or reference points, enough to deepen the understanding of a connection to the things that looked at me or belonged to me, was associated mostly with the superior optimization of the contrast between the investigated subject and the easel of a psychedelic world. I understand that everything can be changed in me if I basically become aware of the creative act.

The power of an artist consists in the spell of vital and emotional movements, especially suitable for easel painting, which turns world chaos into a masterpiece full of symbols and allusions understood only by alchemy initiates, in the art of philosophy, in the nature of spirituality, in the art of reading faces.

If you do not know how to read a person's face very well, in any circumstance, you cannot expect to improve the image that others see in you when you translate into an impressionist painting.

The effect of art in leadership is the image of a mirror that has acquired life, embellishing the character of a situation to be able to stir emotions, to impress.

And yet, I felt that it was not enough to integrate myself in a vibrant image conceived in a distinctive pictorial space, associated with a quasi-figurative context, close to lyrical abstraction and expressionism. I also had to continuously store the impulses of an absolute intelligence, beyond the chosen theme.

The one who manages to forge from within the beauty of a metaphor, the description of a magical creature, the one who manages to give life and vision to a world in which reality and fiction intertwine to a higher extent, that is the one who achieves the image of reformer of an entire culture.

While retaining a certain image in mind as if it were a map of a future path, the artist closes his eyes and moves into a space of creation, reflection and dream, guided by memory towards alterity.

In my case, because everything seemed to be a mirror that grows stubbornly with the significant force of a new conception about God, about the impact of interactions on nature, the artistic expression of my talent had to highlight the beauty of a high intensity experience of the type: "I'll do anything to be the one ! "

Leadership: Can you engage in an exaltation of what you can express at the highest level through a conceptual plastic language so you become more than you have ever been?

If you do not take a step forward in a certain direction, no one else will do it. In this lies the beauty of a leader's power, at least that is the idea behind a spirit titan's thinking. He wants to master the universe, a symbol of courage, even if he is not in the middle of a Persian poem.

From the point of view of art that captivates through the irresistible attraction of mystery, fascinated by the mixture of hazard and necessity in shaping a mysterious depth, this prerequisite seems untouchable, unlikely if the art relies on the distinction between real and imaginary. I never believed in my own expressiveness to conceive an art nouveau, but I managed to create a new identity, that of an artist who can become an example for everyone by being able to capture that ineffable quelque-chose that marks the difference between the ÊTRE and AVOIR.

The most obvious expression of an incursion into the world of creative individuality is the magic of not letting yourself be defeated by appearances, or vice versa, letting appearances make the difference between a bold, revolutionary art and a trivial, pitiful garbage. And perhaps the only way to explore the depths of an image that wants to be able to incorporate and conjure matter with memory and self-consciousness is to think of yourself as a doppelganger, the protagonist of a universe without temporal-spatial measure.

Leadership: Are you ready to cross the huge fecundity of a vision based on artistic improvisation in order to bring an interpretation of boldness into an explosion of beauty?

Leaving modesty aside, because there is no such thing in leadership, I will most likely live eternally through images that only an exceptional artist can best perform in a subtle language as you would approach a God that suddenly shows up and then disappears mysteriously. One is a wonder !

The man who reveals his symbolic thinking, the way by which he interprets emotions, traits, desires, perceptions, his own character from an unprecedented creation full of beauty and force, is like an artist who amazes by his ability to reinvent himself by trying to give meaning to an idea or experience that he lived to its fullest: Set the world on fire !

Such a man does not evolve over time through a portrait of great chromatic value, but only by experiencing perfection as a fairly successful visual experience, in prolonging a dream of supreme sensitivity, inclined to the continuous dream. The artistic improvisation that dominates his talent, crossing the heights of a purity of great stylistic refinement and symbolic concentration, is identified with the tendency of synthesizing images that give hope and thrills as a powerful demonstration to the magnificence of nature.

Leadership: Can you compose an image to illustrate the story of an insane experience identified in terms of "your adventure with yourself"?

Practically, the ideas and things in which I believed, set apart from those that fascinated through a strange series of circumstances, were like explosions of pure, natural, unstudied creativity, raised from an inate curiosity, carefully compiling unexpected connections between domains or unrelated themes.

The effect of art in terms of energy, excellence, sophistication and beauty, enjoying an adventure of the artistic forces reunited in myself at maximum odds, was complemented by the sense of make-believe or surrealism that I was conveying especially to the uninitiated. Challenges full of rational reasoning were aligned with the following ambition: "I'll do anything to get what I want. Aim even higher. I'll do anything to be the one ! "

The only consistent entities that honoured the art of being at the top of their own train of thoughts, emotions, awareness, opinions, all of which could be quantified in optimal conditions of time and space, sheltering the history of a life full of motion and adrenaline, made up the transfiguration of reality rendering the most truthful account of the impact of a customized picture, determined by a combination of artistic means.

A glimpse of white reappears to me every time I re-read Artur Silvestri. "It seems to me that, in fact, there is a murky matter which, through endless rehearsal, strives to communicate with me and teach me something. Perhaps an impenetrable conclusion? Perhaps a thought without words? And who would have tried to tell me all this, in this enigmatic way that I had never seen since I could not speak anymore to the One who had taught me the voiceless art?"

Leadership is a spiritual power to accept the reality behind a painting after listening to too many voices claiming it's fake.

Set The World On Fire is the representation of a real image, but one so well framed in the heart of an impressive fiction, whose multiple symbolic correspondences meet only on the territory of a fulminating personality able to make its way into the atmosphere of a particular world that belongs exclusively to highly acclaimed artists.

Set The World On Fire (I)

Building a personal style of making art means constantly pursuing the proof of the existence of a Creator who can turn Himself into the mirror of the reality of those around us.

I tried to interpret life and reality through a personality that does not bother to be the prisoner of the highest wishes, one so thirsty for a fertile, superior knowledge, which implies the cultivation of the innovating spirit and the courtesy of becoming God myself. A dreamer who dreams himself to be a world-creator, modeled with the appearance of the hidden meaning and intent that a wizard possesses with a magic wand, who can do anything, especially master matter and order it to do anything.

At that time, I had no idea that there was a fine agreement between the facts that evolved from reality to symbol by the meaning attributed to the word "art", in which one might speculate a certain fascination for the imperative "I am the one and only".

You need a key to penetrate into the intimacy of a progressive thinker, one you would not know otherwise, so in a world tailored to the mind of a single Creator. In all I did, everything had to depend on me, the one who understands the artistic phenomenon of a protagonist from the fiction of the poet Torquato Tasso who wanted to create a unitary structural microcosm, seeking to turn the world into a support of unlimited existence. "So I am what I am and what I feel cannot be wrong. This is the way that I feel and I'm coming on strong."

Leadership: Do you dedicate yourself to the attempt to create a large-scale personality in order to achieve a breakthrough in the plane of art, creating a unique image of your creative Self through a high-performance self-portrait?

So, the key to my whole attempt to create a great personality, with its possible interpretations, was supposed to be a first form of temptation and enchantment, the dynamics of an artistic existence, a whole panoply of certain gestures, attitudes, forms of language, as in a Persian legend rendered with the help of a colorful image, full of meaning, full of continuity.

In order to achieve a breakthrough in the art of creating a unique image of the creating Ego through a self-portrait of great stature, it would have been interesting to first experience the idea of the holographic universe: to sit between two great mirrors and see how my image is multiplied to infinity. That gives us a new perspective. Only in this way can you get the strong feeling: "Only One is a Wonder" !

Leadership: Are you able to produce a visual impression through the excess of Ego so that you adjust the impact of the image that transforms the spectator into hostage due to the unique feelings and experiences that the combination of "mirror-magic" offers?

As for the image of this feeling of safety, the triumph of renewing an existing decoration by changing the usual color, I testify to you that after a great demonstration of brush strokes I managed to know a piece of the life of an exceptional artist and especially to have taken care of how I emphasize the qualities given to me by God.

Art is always close to how nature tells us: "Let the show begin ! " Only magic helped me surf the wave of synchronicity between a question and the astral configuration of the moment when asked the question: "What happens if I look at myself in multiple mirrors simultaneously?"

In fact, the only topic I could find in the absence of an artistic truth or outside the laws of magic seemed to be the "Vitruvian Man" seen from the perspective of my double in a mirror reflecting only beauty and perfection, far different from Michael Ende's Magic Mirror, one of the magic gates I had to go through to recognize myself under the fascination of another identity. Surely the mirrors offer a lot of perspective, but they take away just as much content.

Leadership: Can you see your reflection in a mirror that heightens your perception of reality so that your artistic vision transfigures an ever-changing image?

The mirror-magic combination, whose basic function is to blend the optical values with the exaltation of the fantasy that allows you to transfigure reality and embody it in the most delightful images, intensifies the power of irradiation of currents or personalities seeking new ways of expression.

Undoubtedly, the feeling that anyone who tried to understand me was experiencing was the fascination of an infinity of coloristic combinations that contain more feeling than anyone can imagine. The Ego, conceived as a reflection of a vision situated in the midst of art and magic, was not a stand-alone entity, but rather an inexhaustible resource of interpretation of realities and viewpoints from a sensitive angle of the game of shadows and lights caught up in an image that changes forever.

Leadership is an unequaled art, a show of magic, improvisation and metaphors, supported only by a mind that never misses the agility of youth, a mind that strengthens its perception of performance, often examining its enlarged image in the mirror.

Leadership: The image you put into a perfect plasticity decoration can confirm the validity of a currency that we can attach to art: "unity in diversity"?

The feeling that never loses its intensity is the dream state that accompanies consciousness in front of a power that takes you forward to a different way of understanding the meaning of art and to appreciate the artist who convinces through the subtlety with which he manages the sign, the line, the mark, the color. He who knows how to cherish the color, enhancing his expressive force through the free movement of the brush is a wizard of the subtle means of conquering the world.

The microcosm is like a painting experienced by a viewer through the eyes of an artist whose story you can foresee, but cannot think of by reference to the value of the obligation of making it more beautiful.

Corresponding to the idea of a macrocosm, reflected in an Ego approaching the quality of leadership, pushing yourself into a position of a man who has reached the maximum of artistic expansion, the feeling gets an irresistible, explosive chromatic contrast between red and black, which leads to a resemblance to a deified mystic, or a power of a malevolent, seductive nature that dominates and subjugates matter.

For the one who understood the secrets of painting, while continuously repeating the question "where does action or movement start?", leadership becomes a sort of image that extends endlessly through the reflection of individual reflections of a human subject who knows how to show the conflict between the inner and outer world, between depth and appearances, between Ego and Universe, so as not to exaggerate either with the pathetic nor with the ridiculous.

This was my belief, the feeling of not leaving things like that, but by giving them a grand effect in a space full of symmetry, full of vitality, full of significance and authenticity, which only an artist knows how to conceive through a representation of the connection with a unique plastic universe, through a vibrant chromatic vision and an impressive density of symbols.

"Unity in Diversity" is the motto of art that provides the widening of human experience in an artistic reference framework whose coordinates are comprised of microcosm and macrocosm.

Set The World On Fire reveals the form of a creation to place itself in an area where magic, the beauty of giving life to a vibrant atmosphere, and the feeling of being far more than you are intertwine, so that you can achieve the desired change in your life and that of others.

Shape And Transformation

On November 22, 2015

Continue your quest of defining a new understanding of the notion of "whole", assuming the articulation of the prime or ultimate meaning of creation.

Eisenstein's concept of film is guided by his concern for the study of the forms of bliss. This concern stemmed from the one for the pathetic. From the film "Potemkin" at least, the pathetic was still the purpose of his research. The pathetic can be reached, meditated the artist, through the sudden birth of all passions directed towards a single goal. But explosions don't happen every day and it's not possible for the same "Potemkin" to be remade concerning dozens of other similar riots.

His searches thus had to be directed differently. Towards the creation of the pathetic in relation to everyday life. Meaning polarization, in an anodyne fact, of all passions of men, of all of their hopes. Thus, the image, becoming the fixation of an ideal or of a paroxysm will be able to include bliss, the latter being the highlight of the ideal in cause. Thus, emerges the milk separator in "The Old and The New". It has no importance as an object, but rather only through what it signifies: a moment of transformations of consciousness, of the overturning of the peasants' life meanings.

Jean Mitry, with which Eisenstein spoke about this very thing, recalls as such the ideas presented by the filmmaker: "to transform into pathetic what is not or does not appear to be, to reach bliss, to determine a sort of bliss through which the spectator – with his consciousness seemingly paralyzed – enters a state of immediate responsiveness and participates emotionally (and, hence, mentally) to the presented action. He dreamed of a kind of hypnosis through film..."

Leadership: Is your preoccupation for achieving an artistic ideal subject to the understanding of the complexity of the "integrated whole" of a creation that gains its receptivity through the sudden birth of all passions directed to one purpose?

The process of developing and transforming value judgments that take place in a certain context of research leads to the birth of a work later dealt with objectively, whose deficiencies you manage to expose with the help of artistic reflections. Through this process one can find a junction between what delights you through the contemplation of the complexity of creation and what concerns you by connecting this creating to a higher meaning can be seen.

If spiritual teacher Osho was right when he said that bliss is the goal, and awareness is the path towards it, then creation becomes, by extrapolation, not only a motivational factor that gives meaning to the searches of surpassing yourself, but a sort of experience of using the means of expression that express your unique personality. And the artistic ideal of this personality resonates with the emotional expression of art vibrations as an instrument of expression of significance given to events and experiences that can profoundly shape a reality in time.

Above all, leadership consists of a suite of continuous attempts of finding those meanings of creating something that produce the state of responsiveness, by formulating completely different judgments on the shape and depth of the transmitted messages. In cinematography as well as in leadership, what you are conveying must capture a moment of transformation of consciousness, the overthrow of the meanings of life, which maintains people's receptivity to a particular subject, to their inner being, to a possible revelation, to certain spiritual aspects, etc.

If what the great philosopher Kant said is true, the fact that a judgment is the idea that one thing is known for certain qualities or attributes, then the unmistakable fixation on the notion of "masterpiece" in the universe of creation is the image that you are projecting about a reality that is less known to the world, but which reveals itself clearly in the facts of the present life.

Leadership: Does the vision of the creation you are experiencing capture the memorable moment of each important event that consciousness receives as an attempt to find the meaning of life?

Leadership is subordinated to the understanding of the complexity of the "integrated whole" of a creature that gains receptivity through the sudden birth of all passions directed to one purpose: transforming each event into a memorable moment, an emotional pause, a moment of transformation of consciousness, of the overthrow of the meanings of life.

Leadership is subordinated to the understanding of the complexity of the "integrated whole". Therefore, the assessment of the dimension of producing meanings that facilitate the promotion of creation and a better understanding of the transmitted message is imposed.

To transform into pathetic what is not or does not appear to be, to reach bliss, to determine a sort of bliss through which the spectator – with his consciousness seemingly paralyzed – enters a state of immediate responsiveness and participates emotionally (and, hence, mentally) to the presented action – is an important means of valuing the essence of your own identity, transposed in creation, but in a way that no one expects.

To try and reconfigure a world that only you know, in the great equation of leadership, which corresponds to the overturning of meanings of the promoted creation, later becoming the fixation of an ideal, can be equivalated with arguing something that by its nature can never be demonstrated. Be mindful of what meanings you produce !

To direct an important event that consciousness will receive as an attempt to find the meaning of life is to highlight an image through which viewers can identify themselves as a priority in demonstrating their belonging to the completion of a new reality.

Shape And Transformation highlights the final result of the development of the artist's methods of determining new meanings of transfiguration of creation.

In what direction do you have to direct your searches to define a new understanding of the concept of "whole", or rather, a new understanding of understanding, one that articulates the prime or ultimate meaning of creation?

Shards From The Reality Of A Misunderstood World

On December 31, 2016

Pretend to be blind, but never let yourself be hypnotized.

I had everything I needed to become a poet, except poetry. Another essence of the reality of the poem was love, which crossed like an incandescent thread all the corridors of this palace where the only rule was the game. The unification of forces of different orientations (reactions) manifested at the boundary between the real and the unreal, being almost insensible in an area of responsibility for well thought-out and well-done work. They were filming disparate sequences in which other decors always appeared.

Subject: God does not exist. I was the main character: Nicholas Urfe. The director was: Conchis, under the appearance of a Mephisto who demanded unfaithfulness. He said he could imagine how hard it was to play with him, because he did not have a technique to rely on if he did not get along with the game partners. I replied that when the partners agreed, everything went perfectly. In fact, it was just an occult practice, a form of hypnotism allowed in a realm of magic and costumed characters, in which his life became my life.

James Braid, who invented the term "hypnotism", argued that focusing attention is essential to creating the hypnotic trance. I did not have the right to any extravagance, I had to obey to Conchis's harshness, that of considering myself defeated by a reality invented by a creator who sparked a universal order in a poetics of masks, forgetting to install in it a balance of the eternal. The thought of a young aristocrat, bored, very common, altogether, without irony, like any Englishman in a normal situation, which I have always shown, has changed my mind.

Leadership: Are you ready to believe in a creator who consumes unique game experiences in order to give reality the nuance of an original self-expression that emphasizes the achievement of perfection through characters meant to portray a multiplicity of possible worlds?

Doctor Moreau's spectrum in Wells' work was also visible in every shadow of Conchis: "I might be wrong, but I have seen more than you in the models of the Creator of this world – for I have researched the laws in my own way, all my life, while you were collecting butterflies. And, I say to you, pleasure or pain have nothing to do with heaven or hell."

It can be seen that the world that Conchis had deliberately built to change my world, emphasizing the visibility of another version of reality, a kind of Ecristroterhis, or the peculiarity of wearing a mask in the beautification of a work of art, seemed to be extracted from the effort to reveal the depths of an experience that is both existential and fictional.

And one more thing: a blonde woman in a double role. And a brunette that expands her role through a negative formulation of "forgetting". The bishop is next to me played, following the capture of the queen, through which White hopes to take advantage of the long diagonal. The black king, a kind of perfection, something divine, above his characters, stood hidden behind a splendid charade, something that made sense through a complex collection of different types of masks. All contributing to an atmosphere of hallucination, trance in which things, entrances, surrealistic outings were occurring in which characters, gestures, music appeared and disappeared, without necessarily linking the elements of a construction.

Remarkable was the tact Conchis was capable of. His world was another face of the same character. And the world of other actors in the scene was the exploration of a single character who portrayed a multiplicity of possible worlds. Many threads and processes in the background. A world built from the revelation of hard-to-reach data, for the simple fact that not everyone can penetrate to the depths of magic to exist as a simultaneous witness of the chessboard and a dream too bold to be fulfilled.

Even the queen's gambit (recovered by the transforming power of the modest pawn) was the genius move of a woman, unmatched by her beauty, which Conchis put in front of me to test my ability to concentrate. I escaped only through the actions of the madman, through the situation of the madman between magician and world, starting the other way around, always on the diagonal of an indestructible truth: "no character exists if he does not find himself in another world, and no character escapes the metamorphosis it offers the spectator a new metaphysical universe, resulting from the sublimation of the characters into a reality of double mirrors".

Leadership: How do you manage situations experienced by raising awareness of the momentum of a sense force opposite your essence, manifested at the existential level through a permanent change of the scenery of reality?

Who can find the last verse in the mind of a man lacking poetry? Who else can adapt to a world that hides the key to a poem revealed by: "imaginary perception"? Can you speak a language that holds a brilliant mind trapped in the chess game's trap, under the guise of a magician who follows you like a ruthless storm on your journey to change? There is no soul power that is not active in this process.

Alexander von Humboldt, who contributed to geography as a scientific discipline, said: "Nothing in the intimate nature of man is so deep, so fine and so pervasive that it does not thrive in the realm of language and isn't fed by it."

Eleftheria is a noble word in Greek. It means freedom. Conchis gave me the last blow: "If you forget this word, I will give you eight lives. If you remember it, you will be my prisoner forever."

Poetry is wisdom. The key is freedom. Masks are the exploration of life. And magic is love. The game is the permanent change of the decor. The hunter is me. And the spoil is you. The question is as follows: how long can you stand the great charade before releasing from it? There's only one way to find out: Play !

In all this crystal globe that functions as a German machine, used only for clairvoyance, where God is nowhere, it would fit as a revelation of what Aldous Huxley eventually wanted to make us understand: that people In "The Wonderful New World" do not suffer because they laugh instead of meditating, but because they do not know why they laugh and why they have ceased to meditate.

The application of masks, or the magic of using mirrors that distort reality, is the consequence of introducing a special order, a formula of compromise in the space between director and character, so as to arouse in viewers the curiosity to "scan" each scene in the show of an exalted imagination and to perceive it as an extension of a new vision of life, of the world.

Shards from the Reality of a Misunderstood World are often unbearable.

Leadership that is not much talked about, but which enters into the existential composition of the man who does not content himself with a passive role on the world stage, is actually an extension of the rational understanding of why everything is not the way it is.

Leadership, in the great equation of the unknowns of this world, in which the idea of freedom remains only a hypothesis with a chance of success, a variant of the cause of the original chaos – in the sense that darkness can triumph through the richness of ambivalence and ambiguous images, is the struggle of those who manage to remove the obstacles preventing their fulfillment.

And the process of exploring leadership is similar to the world understanding process, defined as a "cognitive transmission, which can be mastered by the effect of the law that says: "Pretend to be blind, but never let yourself be hypnotized."

Shine Without Burning Out

On December 22, 2011

Help people to intensify their emotional power, by discovering the truth within themselves.

Yesterday, I watched again one of my favorite movies, "Tears of the Sun (2003)". Lieutenant Waters together with his commando's team escorted Doctor Kendricks and the approximately 35 refugees to the point Alpha, on the border with Cameroon. The elite troops of General Mustafa Yakubu were after them. At one point, the doctor sits next to him. She looks at him with a certain wonder, as well as with admiration. She tells him with that warmth of heart that you never find when you are looking for it:

- You did a good thing that you have ignored the orders of your superiors, and you came back to save these poor people.

The lieutenant looked at her maintaining a mysterious silence. However, this unexpected silence, unimaginable, gave him the impression that there was much to say, but that some discretion prevented him from speaking. Even so, he plucks up his courage:

- I don't know how good I was. It's been so long since I haven't done ... a good thing, the right thing.

The lieutenant said these words as if something raised in him old regrets. For the first time, he really understood the man within him - a being full of love for everyone, and this love full of spirit, full of caring and wisdom that never found his place in nobody's heart, who challenged the fate almost with nonchalance, this love whose roots have powers of transformation, this love that makes good even the wicked ones – finally, woke up from hibernation. For the first time, the lieutenant truly felt his soul at peace.

Leadership: Are you capable of creating an emotional foundation from the analysis of the impact of a form of response to the perceptual conditions that a new type of consciousness implies??

The sculptors are choosing the most suitable rocks for their future works, rocks that are far from being perfect, but have visible defects and hidden defects. The sculptor's mastery will manage to annihilate only the visible defects, but not also the hidden ones.

When a leader wants to win people's trust, he must first notify their hidden defects and to annihilate them. Furthermore, for his initiative to be a success, he must choose those emotional resources, which have left mark on their character, and to capture exactly the right moment to make them accessible.

A great deed helped lieutenant Waters to better understand himself. He understood that the most important quality that he had always disregarded was compassion, and that everything was sitting in his power of changing himself. Nevertheless, only Doctor Kendricks somehow managed to bring to light that goodness, which filled also her heart.

His consciousness was renewed by the frontal exploration of an act that was not incriminated in any way, even if it was attracting his suspension from the position of leadership. It became a consciousness freed by the previous tendencies towards violence, a consciousness safeguarded from the unconditional tendencies of alignment of the world with the principles of war, therefore one that manifests itself through the sharing of compassion, which does not mean cold ignorance, but rather an active promotion of good.

The perceptual conditions involved in such a consciousness are formed by reflecting reality in the essence of your being, as a sort of entry in a mirror that shows you not who you are, but who you could be in a crisis situation. What you understand in an event that does not go as you had wished, either marks you spiritually, or marks you for glorious deeds with the price of humiliating moral sufferings.

Leadership: Does your impetus towards maximizing success sustain the awareness of the fact that you belong to a faith with the a "notice before the final decision" value?

Are you capable of recreating an emotional foundation for those who have buried their feelings and emotions? Can you find the main ingredient that must be incorporated into your leadership so that, using your influence to enlighten people's consciences?

Just as a sculptor creates new and interesting models from pieces of stone, even so, a leader, who has built his leadership on some well-chosen values, must shape people according to his fundamental nature, after the positive side of his being. He must change their state of mind enfolding them with that beneficial vibration, with that moral power, with that healing energy, able to activate their inner system of beliefs, and to increase their motivation of changing themselves.

A true leader is not intended to mask and to cover the visible defects of people, but must be an "artist of souls" endowed with that energy, which would allow him to have a great influence on them. This leader shall be owed with the general idea of setting in order interiors, not of decorating exteriors.

A faith with a "notice before the final decision" value is revealed in the form of a valid warning in the situation in which you are determined to contradict a prognosis when the stake of the contradiction exceeds your perception of what happened. This caution comes from the consciousness in order to preserve the integrity of the Ego against the content full of "good" that erupts with force from a pure soul.

To safeguard yourself "sinless" from the world means daring to be part of an event full of undesired consequences that reinvents itself by putting together knowledge, perceptions, and beliefs that paint a new image of your own nature.

Shine without burning out expresses metaphorically that manpower, which continuously produce the energy needed for supplying the positive emotions and feelings of the emotional "system" of people. In order to raise your leadership to the rank of art, you must entertain the brilliance of people by aiming more towards the character that defines them, researching with a sensitivity of an artist their feelings, setting their "composition" of spiritual qualities - such as compassion, generosity and good conscience.

If you want to change people's beliefs, you have to use a more delicate molding, on several plans (emotionally and mentally, not just professionally) and also you must provide an inexhaustible source of stimuli that would fit perfectly in their emotional and cognitive system.

Are you capable of calibrating your leadership with this kind of energy, with that extraordinary finesse of rendering to people their true nature? Are you helping people to increase their emotional power by discovering the truth within themselves?

Conclusion: In leadership, the Human Resources are having a special role. People are different in terms of thinking, concepts and methods of action. The role of a leader is to bring to the same common denominator all those who have chosen him. Of course, this is sometimes very difficult to achieve if there is not that kindness, goodness of mind, and that availability of both parties.

If a leader manages to combine harmoniously the "spiritual modeling" along with improving performances, he "will shine without being consumed".

Sight Always Has The Gratitude Of The Eyes

On March 13, 2023

What animates you is what you notice about yourself when your target is the expansion of reality to validate a remarkable creation.

And this time the weather was totally unfavorable: rain and sleet. Dropping out was a plausible alternative, it was a kind of cover necessary to withdraw from the responsibility I had assumed before the half-marathon, where I wanted to rank in a leading position. The most subtle nuances of the states of mind that tried me at that moment, especially the state of self-contemplation that seemed to try to migrate into a painting with a fabulous and real aspect, projected their power of affirmation into a bizarre and unsettling universe, making me feel as disoriented as the hero of a G. Wells novel:

"I was just a toy in the will of chance. I had, in myself, the absolute certainty that I was involved in a maturation process caused by the deepest self-knowledge that allowed me to propel my creation into a new horizon. Ma contained a strange conviction that, apart from the grotesqueness of the laws, forms and irregular phenomena of nature, I had before me the whole scale of human life in miniature, the whole play of instincts, reason and destiny in its simplest form."

Truly. What I experienced during the half-marathon, in miserable weather, was the creation of an artist competing with himself. I won't say that I was demoralized as long as this turn of the situation lasted, I won't say that I lost that artist's quality of seeing a world in colors beyond the temporality of obscurity, in the pale light of a dynamic, of a permanent transformation that revealed, as it were, the end sewn with the white thread of the improbable. I'll just say this: the mood of the runner in me was the reaction of the painter in front of a work of art, called abstractly: "a return to myself in a backwards world".

Leadership: Does the context in which you find yourself try to tell you something about a creation on the border between the inside and the outside, to the extent that you have to recover the steps taken in a wrong direction?

I told myself that everything will be fine, that everything comes and goes, even the slightest feeling of bitterness can turn into a game of colors and shapes that the brilliant artist arranges in a mosaic designed to increase expressiveness of the images that represent him, that steal him and hold him captive in their story, on the other side of the torrential rain. Which was not funny at all in that gray weather. Yes, I know that, I know very well that the very context I was in was trying to tell me something about a painting that invites creative activity, making me feel as if I had divided a drawing into dozens, hundreds other smaller designs. But I knew just as well that the painting is on the border between the interior and the exterior.

Not only that. Trying to recover countless steps taken in a wrong direction, with all the attributes of a feeling passed through a Sartanopmys Sytlucsas Amhes, a feeling that made me look at what is around with different eyes, I realized a long time ago how important it is to let everything go, to be as it was. And to focus only on the gray present, full of uncertainty, throwing myself rather into a tireless agitation where the unrestrained soul seemed to be detached from an echo of the fact that every aspect of the real world destroys everything but a painting in which the colors merge over the entire surface.

A painting that is not balanced creates a sense of unease, doesn't it? And it was in this painting that I integrated my existence to immortalize a moment extracted from the eternity of a hidden inner universe, for which even a single moment means an Endlessness. It was like a kind of mental experiment, because the painting did not manage the organization of the visible in an imaginary capable of constantly helping me in difficult moments, and in this case my only way out of a setting full of mud, hops and puddles, was to let myself at the will of thoughts.

Leadership: Can you see yourself in the pose of an artist struggling to create a meaningful setting, to the point of changing the overall design of a larger abstract painting?

Seconds, unapproachable, precious minutes of my human time, dwindling before one's eyes, made me feel the color inside a brush that covers all types of painting. The rainy weather was to blame, which led me to accelerate only on the descent, not on the ascent. Obviously, I had confused the echoes of my own jerky, backwards, cold breathing, with the mixture of vapors coming from a mixture of paints and varnishes that nature seemed to illustrate in a living picture, especially in an artistic image that translated, maybe, a kind of inner battle that you can't get rid of too easily.

Of course, no observer has ever gone so far as to notice a runner like me in the pose of an artist struggling to create a meaningful, imaginative, generous setting that changes the overall design of a larger abstract painting. It was not for nothing that I thought of the possibility of giving up, betraying my own faith in a constant threat: abandonment.

Could the abandonment of an expanding universe have caused a disturbing expansion of my imaginary world? Because in art, as in running, there is a constant law: "what animates you is what you notice in yourself when your target is the expansion of reality to validate a remarkable creation".

Makes sense, doesn't it? The style in which I painted my way to the finish line is quite abstract, especially because I imagined and created under the power of momentary impressions, of the states I was passing through, letting the colors and the setting convey something of the image of the personality of an exceptional runner who knows how to evaluate his sensitivity before demonstrating the uniqueness of his athletic values.

If you want to be inspired exclusively by art, you have to face the challenge of deciding in which direction you should go, so that the image that represents you is close to your soul.

Sight Always Has The Gratitude Of The Eyes if I take into account the fact that the image that my soul unfolded throughout the half-marathon is the result of the vision of an exceptional artist, and an equally good athlete, who knows how to depict eternal beauty in any circumstance, the beautiful embraced by the feelings well hidden inside.

In fact, this is how things are in art: the natural emotion, aroused by a certain circumstance, does not pass into the work as such unless it is under the impetus of the challenge to give an unforgettable experience.

Sight Follows Its Eyes Wherever There Is A Figurative Image

On August 24, 2022

The eyes cannot always distinguish the shape necessary for an intuitive representation, but they can more easily tolerate the comprehensive meaning of an upright key figure.

My eyes have not yet forgotten to see the idealized aspects of the visible world, just as they have not forgotten to see the real or logical environment in which things are arranged in pictorial space, as vision improves from observation to observation, from generalization to generalization, with the help of a penetrating and unified vision.

And as the artist's eye perceives even the slightest alteration of the diamond's luster, as well as the smallest spot of color in an abstract painting, even a sliver of congealed light straying on the ground, I am quite willing to devote myself the attention of a much more difficult task: to feel by sight the beauty of a blade of grass. Just that, to feel, to see, to taste that technique of suggestion generating vague emotions, by observing this image full of sensitivity.

Fragile, soft and pleasing to the artistic eye, this blade of grass walks the line of truth, not imitation, and its spirit remains free. It is always caught in a vertical position, like a syringe needle that does not need to be sterilized with an insistent look in order to feel useful in someone's observation. His simple presence silences any tumult, any torrent of arguments and feelings. Looked at closely, stripped of its appearance, moving away from the sphere of chiaroscuro, it is preserved only in the sphere of a simple and banal coloring, a fact that reminds me of the scrutinizing gaze on a monument of contemplation when man rediscovers the world and finds himself, improbably modified in time.

Leadership: Can you improve your ability to grasp a whole and also register significant details by placing close-up elements in perceptual relation to the content of a partially figurative image?

Through twisted lines and reflected by the sunlight, regarding the activity of ensuring the transparency and uniformity of a diverse ANONYMITY, the eyes cannot distinguish the verisimilitude of an artistic effect, the form necessary for an intuitive representation, but they can more easily tolerate the comprehensive meaning of a figure key in direct correspondence with the vertical line within the plane geometry.

And this time, the ability to grasp a whole and at the same time to record the significant details, sometimes overestimating the proportion between imagination and the spark of a longing for the beauties of unspoiled nature, repeatedly changes my vision and engages it in a kind of interrogation or investigation, from far to near and back.

In a way I feel pursued by the artistic duty to see the blade of grass as a kind of eternal, living force, imbued with a mysticism whose beginning was Arab alchemy, a mysticism whose secret no one dares to penetrate. I am, am I not, the author of a painting that surpasses human works through subtle speculations. And, it can be seen that more and more I assume the strength to glimpse the beauty where no one expects to find it naturally.

After these considerations I can reduce the image of a blade of grass oriented to feeling, not to form, to that nobility of calmness, of health, of openness to the concerns of the Impressionists, more by means of light than of shadow. Possessing a superior power of expressing the real, far from the violent contrasts of other colors, hasty and strident, the blade of grass can be attributed not only to the calm in its majesty, but also to that symbolic side that acquires a painting signed by Pablo Picasso.

Leadership: Can you penetrate through the sensible into the intelligible with the help of the projection of a horizon left at the mercy of geometry, but also of mirages chained by chromatic reveries?

With the depth given by the admiring stupor in a space reduced to a reverie of infinity, placing the elements from close-up in a perceptive relationship with the content of a partially figurative image, I will try through the sensible to penetrate into the intelligible, with the help of the projection of a horizon left to the will of geometry, but also of mirages chained by chromatic reveries.

Even if for some this painting seems lifeless, or not attracting anyone's attention, it is nevertheless designed in the sense of tranquility, as a kind of mandala that acts with the effect of psychotherapy, self-hypnosis, self-conversation. It is a kind of Sondirthimia, something is of a noble nature, determined by forms of an intellectual nature in this picture in which a ray of sunlight shines, descended from the sky, from the unseen but felt hand of the great God, it gives you good news: "All that is beautiful is actually a new visual way to organize ideas, to create connections and relationships between things".

At the same time, on the line drawn by the artist's eye due to sufficient visual stimulation, I must see in the field of grass the main elements of the beauty of mathematics: order, symmetry and determination, as they are expressed by Proclus in "Commentaries on Euclid":

"ORDER is found in the genesis of the secondary and the multiple from what is primordial and simple. For the following always depends on the antecedent and one has the value of principle, the other has the value of consequence from the highest assumptions. SYMMETRY is observed in the mutual agreement of the demonstrations. And DETERMINATION is observed in invariable and lasting ideas, because its knowledge is not constantly changing as it happens with simple opinions and with the perceptions of the senses, but it is always exposed through forms of intellectual existence. If beauty rests especially on these points, and mathematics acquires its profile precisely through this, then it is obvious that beauty can also be attributed to mathematics."

When leadership comes from the awareness of specific aspects of perception, concentrating in a small space the totality of the universe, only then the space of art (in which life or the cramp of it gathers) acquires autonomous virtues of expression and meaning.

Having said that, I conclude that what I consider to be pleasing to the sensitive eye of the artist, who wants to master reality, not modify or exploit it, is that perfect aesthetic solidarity when every point, every line and every individual form harmoniously integrates with the whole, creating the impression of totality.

The Sight Follows Its Eyes Wherever There Is A Figurative Image, proving that the role of the illustrator-artist is not that of a neutral observer of reality, but to assimilate the visuality of an unlimited set of shapes, colors, plastic elements, especially to express a visuality whose beauty is more difficult to discover, to turn it into a spiritual act.

The overarching meaning of an upright key figure is this: no matter how much I raise my vibration to the dimensional frequencies of the Earth, the gaze will not cease to oscillate between reality and fiction.

Sight Gives You A Way, But Only The Spirit Can Show You The Direction

On October 16, 2024

The place from which you look gives you a new perspective, only if you make that distant place a symbol of your unconquerable greatness.

In the moments when you feel you are being tested to your limits, that's when you find out how far you can go, and the mountain becomes the symbol of that inner call that challenges you to grow beyond what you thought possible. My sister, Oana Fântânaru, knows this best, when she experiences the freedom of running, with every opportunity to assert her inner strength. Every detail of the race, from the topography of the terrain to its heartbeat, becomes a piece in a puzzle of the universal connection, of the synergy between man and nature, the final image of which reveals the true nature of his existence.

Creation involves a constant dialogue between physical effort and spiritual understanding. At the last race, the 22 km half-marathon at "Curtea Domnească", Oana ran a long way ahead of many runners, reaching almost the top of the mountain alone, in a space of reconnection with herself, a space of a freedom impossible elsewhere. Dignity does not depend on where you are, but on the spirit with which you animate it. Something in it seemed to constantly attract his attention: "Open your soul to the mysterious call of the mountain, understanding that every step on its paths becomes a revelation of self."

In this context, creation is not only the act of making running an art, an "Atinursum Insumaton", a unique way of expression through movement, through the grace and constancy through which the sustained rhythm reveals the inner harmony, but it is the form in which the mind and the body comes together to express a message of oneness with nature. And if I were to give an artistic form to Oana's journey, as an artist would do when painting an ideal, I would say that beyond the canvas of fatigue, an unnoticed elegance emerges, because every movement expresses a unity with nature.

Leadership: Can your inner revelation be interpreted as a "window to greatness", considering that your gaze becomes an instrument of artistic perception of a second reality?

Oana's silence was more eloquent than any words she could have uttered, but her thoughts were telling her, assaulting her with a single deep, unexpected message, elevated to the sublime inner truth, of which only the heart seemed to be aware:

"I had something on my soul, something was grinding me deeply, as if the mountain was calling me to discover its secrets, every step on its paths becoming a silent dialogue between the effort of my body and the breathing of nature's soul. There, far from the other runners, in an almost sacred seclusion, my running was no longer just a physical act, but an inward journey, a subtle balance between grace and determination. At every turn, at every stone bypassed, it was as if I heard the call of the mountain, an ancient and mysterious call, whispering to me to open my heart, to let my thoughts flow freely, like a river winding through the rocks. In those moments, I was no longer just a runner, but felt like I had become part of a vibrant and living landscape, an extension of nature, as body and soul harmonized in a single breath, in a single revelation. "

All this fragment of soul expressed so clearly in words, through the voice of an artist whose grace is manifested in the field of running, immediately refers to a fragment of the "Portrait of the Emperor", described by the talented writer Wilhelm Hauff:

"Son," replied the general, "how can you be great in a department of knowledge greater than any other man of the century, without being a great man? Not a machine, not the body makes you great, but the spirit. Those forms the antiquated systems of Europe, conceived by wise men thousands of years ago, have collapsed because they were empty forms of spirit. Eyes unenlightened by the living spirit see only the surface of things, and the gaze becomes a window to greatness only when you use it to see beyond forms."

Leadership: Can nature become a unique setting, in which your body integrates perfectly, generating a figurative composition that combines grace with inner strength?

Oana's thoughts turned to her once more in those momentos de triunfo , when the top of the mountain revealed to her what her heart already knew, with the same clarity of an artist who, arriving in front of the white canvas, already sees the finished work:

"Arriving at the top of the mountain, I felt everything around me expand, letting my thoughts dissipate into the vastness of the horizon. The view was not just a landscape, but a reflection of my own journey, a silent symbol of the inner greatness I was discovering with every step. This summit was not a destination, but a confirmation that I had overcome the limits imposed by doubts and weaknesses. In that moment I understood that I was not there just to look down, but to transform the height into my own power, a manifestation of the indomitable spirit that refuses to be brought down."

The final time is the result of a complex process of synchronization between physical effort and inner motivation, where every movement is a reaction to the mental challenges of the race. And because the final time is also an expression of Oana's power to reinvent herself, in apparent isolation, then the manifestation of her spirit becomes a transforming force, a kind of revelation in motion. Therefore, true clarity of vision is not physical, but a result of your unconquered inner vision.

The manifestation of continuous determination harmonizes the physical pulse with the rhythm of the soul, transforming isolation into moving revelations of the spirit unbowed by external challenges. In this sense, leadership becomes a balancing act between vision, determination, and the ability to relentlessly propel yourself to great heights.

Sight gives you a way, but only the spirit can show you the direction when you are at the crossroads, in the idea that every choice defines who you become, correlated with the constant evolution of the self. Only in apparent isolation can you discover the true essence of life, finding your ultimate freedom through the silence of your thoughts, as an affirmation of your unconquered spirit in the face of challenges.

Sight Has So Much To Say To The Eyes

On April 24, 2023

The artist's eye looks through a frame and sees the world as it is, but, being as it is, it is actually otherwise.

Last night I read the Italian story "What the sun and the wind tell". My vision, open, rigorous, characterized by the imaginative process, used the stimuli necessary for a good cognitive work to discover what is undiscoverable in the real world, so that I myself become part of a miraculous Asheravceda Uidem, an exit from myself, a penetration beyond the boundaries of normality and objectivity.

No wonder my vision is still assaulted by the images of an unadulterated experience of expansion of the Self towards otherness, because suddenly I feel that I am another person.

Sublimely, reading the story ensured my place in the epic of a man transfigured by the revelation of his unconscious, lost in the dizzying destiny of "high flight" carried out in pursuit of the images of the soul, vibrating on the same wavelength as the work of a painter who tries to represent "the soul of things", their resonance, without falling into exaggeration. Shy, curious, with many hopes, such a painter creates the suggestion of a landscape ambience in the direct reflection of sunlight by the mirror of an imaginary which, wearing various forms, operating a selection of the convenient experience, establishes the presence of an a priori consciousness.

When the Sun saw that the Wind was at the top of the mountain, he ran to hide behind a cloud. But the Wind called him again, saying: "Sun, Sun, come here ! Both the greenery and the flowers miss you. Oh, don't be afraid of me. You know that I am good and gentle. However, the Sun didn't want to come out from behind the cloud. Then the Wind blew, drove the cloud away and revealed the beautiful face of the bright Sun.

Leadership: Does your vision preserve that acquired greatness of reduction to the essence, to which you give the meaning of revealing another side of existence, always denied?

Obviously, this account is clothed in the mantle of a particularly rich imagination. If the observer were forced to postulate some form of "memory" in the sap of a vivid imagination, and if this lukewarm memory were contained within the field of vision of a brilliant painter, then my contact with art would be an exit from time into a world about which I no longer know if it is real or a dream.

All I know is that my eyes often dream that they are painted in a fantastic picture where the dream itself becomes sight. In this way, another side of my existence, always denied during the transition from the real to the unreal, becomes nuanced: the possibility appears to experience the individual trajectories of the artists, to follow the diversity of media approached and to understand the meanings of an endless work.

I sense that sight has much more to say to my eyes, especially if the sun does not blind the dreaming eye, and especially if the sharp wind of early spring evenings does not carry my thoughts to cloudy distances where there is neither life nor death, but only an immense dark and cold chaos. After all, I would like to be a drop of light, a drop of immortality, or just a drop of ether, so that I can penetrate the space of a modern metaphysical vision that I can spread on the canvas with just the force of thought.

Leadership: Do you follow the model of symbolic representations whose image is preserved throughout a vision capable of materializing in a work of art?

When you paint on a tangible plane, then the size and shape of the brush are oriented to correspond to the perspective of the plane, with the mention that this plane represents the place where the "horizontal" world finds its meaning deep around a vertical world made up of entities of language and visions, engaged in quasi-manipulable "adventures".

This is why, reading the story of the Sun and the Wind, I recognized in myself the talent of the painter to highlight the character portrayed by projecting him in a uniform monochrome background, which traverses time.

I'll put it in simpler terms. What the eye mirrors in another universe, in a way full of flavor and sensitivity, derives from the expansion of the frontier that delimits reality from fiction, through a symbolic character who tries to make his very life a work of art. For this reason I am inclined to take the place of the sun and talk to the wind as if I were talking to an old friend, with much appreciation, with accuracy, with respect, throughout a vision that materializes in a painting.

Everywhere I could observe this distinct consistency in the joining of parts in direct relation, so far as they can be obtained by reading and reliving in the imagination a story that becomes reality. In fact, the artist who puts his eyes to the test to obtain the true "sight" in strong outlines of landscapes, characters or objects, all of which are on a neutral background, must first consider himself the master model of a symbolic representations in a moment of mirroring the real in the imaginary.

The great power of art requires entering into the intimacy of a world of which you have only a vague idea, focusing your vision on the ideal-real duality, where the appearance of an unfocused vision is complemented by imagination.

Modern leadership calls on such art to change the worldview.

Sight Has So Much To Say To The Eyes when it knows that it can encompass, artistically, a fabulous world from which the artist can only come out enchanted and changed. And the artist's eye looks through a frame and sees the world as it is, but, being as it is, it is actually different. It is a concentrated world, essentialized on the images of a world that deserves to stand the test of time in a landscape from a work of art.

Sight Is Not Solely Satisfied With The Decor That Pleases The Eye

In leadership, as in art, it is not just a question of seeing something with your eyes, but of feeling everything with the help of peripheral vision.

The sight of my eyes, as a defining element in an artistic creation whose main feature is authenticity, captures again and again, like a photograph brought to life in a much too hasty present, that reality that painters approach through a stato d 'animo chiamato grandezza, so that my own world seems to defy possible affinities with the challenges of a generation between experiment and entertainment. And how could the creation of a sensitive nature be stimulated other than by following carefully, with soul and mind, the destiny of minor or major transformations in the plane of the evolution of forms of visual expression.

I gaze into the distance as we speak. An unimaginable image, pleasing to the eye, with the blue sea shining like a bright carpet, which I find difficult to distinguish from the symbol of the fulfillment of an unusual dream: Serintoyphia Cuseffer , the dream of eternity from which you never wake up to die. And look how the sea appears to me: like the picture of a solitary and quiet life far from the everyday hustle and bustle of society. For others, it appears as a symbol of secular infinity, but also as a multilateral element that makes an abstract connection between the terrestrial and the cosmic plane, by the fact that it touches the horizon line that seems to separate the sky from the Earth's surface.

In turn, the dream created from the primordial sense itself (through which the shape, size, height and length of a private space, unoccupied by the profane decays of becoming are determined) tends to enclose me in a Bermuda triangle where things disappear without being able to find an explanation. It seems that I saw my dream kidnapped by another look, from another world, thrown into a vast work of the painter Jim Warren, and I realized that what is disappearing before my eyes is not only reality consumed by melancholy or adoration, but also the act of scholarly imitation of nature. I cannot copy something that is invisible to a view that judges everything by shape and color...

Leadership: Is it possible to define a more suggestive image by making a JOIN between an aesthetic view and a view of oneself, including the GROUP BY "unidirectional interaction" clause?

Behind the waves, at the other end of the view, is hidden an immense force of attraction: the wealth, beauty and great diversity of life forms that nature has created. Colorful fish and amazing coral reefs, all housed in a relatively small space of my being. I close my eyes and feel them, feel them in the center of my heart. But time will slowly erase them all and nothing will remain, just as the nature of sensations and visual acuity deteriorate as we age, and eventually all disappear from the field of immediate artistic utility.

It's not just about catching something with my eyes, it's about sensing with the help of peripheral vision which refers to the side vision of the eye, allowing me to see objects around me without having to turn my head or move my eyes. An attempt, otherwise, far too reckless. Somehow, the sea itself, with its sparkling waves in the light of the sky, eclipses my vision with its wonders that cannot always be captured in images, causing an expansion of my inner world, of the being in which struggles, with so much doubt, the depth of a metaphysical knowledge.

If there was no flight of imagination, opening the space of the depths of a world that arranges its course in the depths of man, then the viewer would be completely disoriented at the sight of things spinning in all directions, brought by the waves to the shore, in the games of light and shadows that are tasked with highlighting freshly laid tracks of bizarre and disconcerting contours, tracing them with a finger to find out where they lead and why they were opened.

Aren't the eyes the ultimate validation of the depth of the spirit? Moreover, peripheral thinking means to perceive the reality that is revealed in front of you, only what exists in the foreground, this "now" so magical and full of possibilities, without losing your focus on the symbiosis between form and color in while adhering to a vision that at first seems to have a utopian character.

So, I can say that the one-way interaction between aesthetic and useful vision can be achieved by creating a double image: an image in which you yourself are reflected in everything that surrounds you, and an image in which everything looks different from reality. As an artist, you will have to form from this double image another image in which the colors are next to each other, but without combining with each other, just like in an impressionist painting.

Leadership: Can your vision, passed through the isolation of the Self from the world, be synchronized simultaneously with the reflection on an image that continues to persist in the subconscious?

And just as light directly influences darkness, so too the way I look at waves, through the act of recasting the ideal in the real, prompts me to initiate quite independently the representation of a form of comparison to the natural and artistic effects of colors. Especially the combination of blue and green. But can my vision, passed through the isolation of the self from the world, be synchronized simultaneously with the reflection on an image that continues to persist in the subconscious?

Look at how this inner universe is manifested in the character of Miranda, from a famous novel by John Fowles:

"Darkness, darkness and more darkness. Not only have I never had this feeling before, but I didn't even imagine it was possible. It's more than hate, more than despair. You can't hate what you can't touch. You can't even feel what most people consider despair. It is something beyond despair. It's as if I couldn't feel anything at all. I see, but I cannot feel. Oh God, if there is a God. I hate beyond hate."

Yes, as you can see, I like the sea. I look at it as I would an inner fire, a blaze that consumes my soul, but I don't always look at it with joy, inspiration and longing. Sometimes it happens that I look at her with pain and suffering, feeling how she is moving away from me, fading into a blue shadow on the distant horizon, like a kind of uncertainty of pictorial art. Yes, I see the sea, but I cannot always feel its happy mood for painting, even if it is the background image of my artistic model of the universe.

A view passed through the isolation of my Self from the world refers to that area of reality that has not yet been glimpsed, has not been brought out due to the fact that I am deeply rooted in a mixture of an "ideal difficult to translate into image" and that fluttering of the heart much stronger than the memory itself.

Sight Is Not Solely Satisfied With The Decor That Pleases The Eye, but must be stimulated by that inner strength and the assumption that is needed to recognize that you cannot fight with the shadow of things that cannot be seen in a colorful painting.

Remember ! Your life houses the most frequent images of your dreams, in a relatively small space that the mind can use in inner guidance as an artistic exercise, or as a heavenly privilege, or as a kind of symbolic transformer that changes all the information from the paradise of memories.

Sight Speaks Only In The Language Of The Eyes

On January 01, 2023

Only a creator of great visual sensitivity can dominate the chaos that results from a world that disappears and another that is established.

You only have to notice a blade of grass to produce an innovation of great proportions in any field, especially in medicine, physics, art, biology, chemistry. And precisely the so-called "learned" do not know how to notice a blade of grass, just as they are not aware of the basic principles or theories that unify all fields of biology: cell theory, gene theory, homeostasis and the theory of evolution. In other words, you look at the things around you in vain, if your gaze does not take into account those scientific data that explain and condition the phenomena of nature.

I do more than that. I look at the things around me with a lot of soul, they seem randomly arranged in an image made up of points, lines, shapes and various colors. And what gives the eye a moment's respite, without exercising any choice about the color background on which the shape of each thing is established, is the freedom to compose a detailed story based on a concrete image, but one that has the depth corresponding to a rich and at the same time independent spirit.

Thus an exceptional quality of the vigorous eye is established, for example, he may prefer the drawing as a real form within the painting, or he may prefer the chiaroscuro as a simple form of detachment from the events of the world. Above all, those who know all the secrets of art know how to talk about the gift of sight as the main function of the perception of particularity contained in the absolute, without including chiaroscuro in the sphere of continuous light.

A great artist can capture, for example, the vault of a sky that almost merges with the earth, or the blue of a sky that is no longer stained with yellow. Or a sky that, although blue, looks colorless, sunless. Or, a sky glow that can put out the stars. Or a blade of grass constituted as a fragment in a boundless universe. Or a blade of grass constituted as an Alter-Ego prisoner in a parallel universe, raised to the rank of symbol through the surrealist imaginary.

Leadership: Are you willing to accept the finite nature of your world when it appears to accept the authority of a higher nature that can only be mastered by the idea that "the whole is made up of isolated fragments"?

The harmonious impression given by the eyes, especially the brown ones (perhaps because they are the most beautiful eyes in the world), keeps the soul in the highest zone of subjectivity. Here, the detail must be given the right to complete a reality subject to change, based on the decorative dimension, so that the harmonious effect does not rely at all on the intensity of a fixed image, as I would have been tempted to rely, but on the quality of the composition to constitute a coherent whole capable of challenging me to discover myself while rediscovering the parallel space in which all the elements of nature are valued.

Yes. As the eternal basis of all vision, the artistic eye can prove its power to encompass the horizon line in the triple ratio of the light drawn from external reality that makes pictorial representation possible, even if it finds it difficult to capture the Supreme Beauty in "all that is mortal". In fact, the artistic eye attaches itself to the particular even in the smallest proportions of the form that each individual thing takes, making possible the idea that the whole is made up of isolated fragments of beauty that, if we know how to collect them, delight our being.

Not only that. Art is constantly asking for new characters with a strong Ego. Walking along this line, focusing my attention on the surrounding elements, the words of a character from a novel written by Alexandre Dumas echo in my mind: "I will be strong, I will be what I want, I will dominate the chaos resulting from a world that disappears and another that is established."

Leadership: Is the purpose of your creation that of validating isolated images of nature, as a distinct form of validating the duality between the sensible and the intelligible, on the way to establishing an autonomous universe?

If the eye is the catalyst for the representation of things illuminated excessively by the solar disk, without actually tending to the representation of the surrounding space (as is the landscape in the painting) then it will not be able to highlight the significance of what can be experienced by reality. Is it not that the mind, the more it tries to memorize more elements, looking at them with the eyes of an artist, ends up focusing on shapes and colors rather than on their availability to validate the duality between the sensible and the intelligible, starting from the premise that nature is basically unpredictable?

And if the purpose of the eye is fulfilled by the supreme purpose of color within the whole landscape, light itself becoming an active subject in modifying the form of things (in accumulations of reverberations of suggestiveness), then he will depend on so many random things that it will be difficult for him to capture that intensity of life, of emotion, which spills over the whole. And just like that, thanks to the eyes that observe everything, I myself managed to look at myself as an autonomous universe, located beyond the immediate perception of the real, and to consider myself as a revealer of the totalizing vision that illuminates the soul of the world and nature.

Of course, the eye needs a vision based on sensitivity, compassion, empathy, not just imagination. For this reason, to show how great the visual sensitivity is, you have to raise the surrounding things (and various elements of nature) to the rank of symbols with a greater importance than what is apparent at first glance. Each of them must represent emotions, explore weaknesses and feelings of fragility, having the destination of representing or transmitting a secret information...

Art is an exploration of the galaxy of symbols that emanate from seemingly mundane things. And the leadership is inspired by these symbols to create some background images that support "what is missing" from a global and subjective perspective.

Sight Speaks Only In The Language Of The Eyes when the eyes are overwhelmed by the feelings that accompany sight in the process of immortalizing an image that tries through the sensible to penetrate the intelligible. And if my eyes, willing to look at such an image for a long time, will reconstruct the effects of meaning manifested in the figurative plane, maybe I will succeed in creating another reality for myself again and again, artistically transfigured, imagined by spiritual energy.

Sign Your Name Across My Heart

Embellish your soul with the purest sincerity before accepting to be part of the reality of the artwork.

Everyone respects it as a place of God, this splendid garden full of roses, in which the time so rushed sometimes, like a constantly heard divine voice, has the value of nobility the reality of a painting painted with delicacy and romance. The only thing that matters now, through the use of plastic language elements, in intentional expressive representations, is that the rose chooses the right time to reveal some of the experience of its opening to the humanist horizon.

We started out as friends. The rose was there, in those depths of judgment, when the painter tried to probe the image of a little girl that kept crying and crying, without her tears reaching the heart of a parent, or hearing any good news. Making figurations by nature and imagined as alive, using elements of artistic language, often requires an exacerbation of a human trait, such as solidarity or compassion, in a symbolic representation of the soul descended into hell.

It was there, present in a moment of great intimidation, when the little girl grew up, she became beautiful, so natural, yet so closely united with the souvenirs of childhood, admiring herself in the innocence of an unparalleled skill: to express that something of a warm, but hurt and confused heart, like a stain of color on a gray canvas, feeling so alien to everything going on around her. Swept away by every stroke of the brush, that you would have said that she no longer knows what is the right path to the cosmic enigma that hovers over her existence, she has always kept a mark of delicacy in the field of manifestation of the spiritual experience, precious and hope-giving, which is called: liveliness.

She has before her an unfinished battle, begun long ago, the symptoms are so deep, and she will not find her peace until she gains that gentle, charming, embrace of the perfect artist who makes the joyful landscapes of her majestic, unfinished dream story.

Leadership: Can you obtain a suggestive picture of a topic with long-lasting impact through your life experiences, so that you can outline a new vision of reality through means of expression specific to artistic language?

Fortunately you have got someone who relies on you. When I write about her, disturbing and mysterious, with extracts from the leaves of the rose, I also think of that energetic little boy, a true troublemaker, who knew from then on that one day he would succeed in immortalizing the sensitivity of a mystical spirituality, of unique beauty, on his own painting board. It is a pleasure for the soul to know how to choose your art even before it is learned fully.

The dialogue directed on the topic of communication in artistic language communicates in some way the experience of the deep knowledge of the concept of presence-absence, conjugated with other symbolic elements, such as fir branches, the tree of life, the powerful motif of the golden flower, the solar rosette, the eye of Horus, birds never look into the sun, in the chromatic combination: red, green, yellow.

Time I'm sure will bring disappointments in so many things. But neither he, nor she, nor the Master, nor Margareta, nor after so much sealing away from souls within a fabulous life, are left swallowed up by the profound mystery of canceling consciousness by the pursuing and pursuer hypostasis of the rose, in contrast to the sharp character of some long-ago days. Times full of tenderness of hugs that no one wanted to offer, to none of them.

We shared the emotions of the revision through the refinement of the drawing, a beautiful way by which we could heal the wounds of the past, esprimendoci in modo naturale e suggestivo, embodying one and the same thing, one being the double, the reflection of the other.

Leadership: Can you obtain a copy of supreme fidelity of a previous version of personality that can be noticed with a purely subjective construction, under the impression of an image seen from the angle of a signed reminder: "Remain as you are..."?

It seems to be the way. Destiny, the spiritual consistency of the rose, brought us together, ever since, when we were collecting dreams and hopes in our small universes, corners of nature away from the eyes of the world, often shattered by the prejudices and conventionalism acquired through living controlled by the effects of other realities.

It was a kind of wish that was to be fulfilled at any price, beyond any illusion, beyond any judgment about taste, beyond any dogma, in all the meanings of a possible symbolic world, but which emphasized the values of the human spirit and sensibility. In art, imagination matters more than the predictable.

Not understanding anything at first, imagining ourselves the same exiles in a hostile world, better said in a moment of vitriolic memory, concealed by false illusions, we timidly approached each other, after so bitter weather, with a kind of constraint, as if we were converted into a fiction that shatters the myth of childhood, the spectrum of insignificance seeking its cure in the symbolic representation of the virtue of belonging to an identical aesthetic orientation.

The rose is the same I who reflects on it, and you understand why, as a sort of identity argument against kitsch, as a kind of gateway to the fantasy world inside a delicate book, without opening it. The chromatic dominance of a reunion On a peaceful day, Oh the light shines brighter, can be noticed with a purely subjective construction, under the impression of an image seen from the angle of a Proustian type reminder: "Seek to remain as you are, always blurring the facts and your words with creative thinking."

Leadership: Does the content side of your personality reveal the strength to refer to those visual images in which the being revealed through the essence of a work of art engages in intensifying the connection with a past life?

The very image of those times, on which on which only the rose links its name, Nostalgic Artemis, makes you see, as in the light of a candle, the shadows of a love not experienced when its time was due, but later won by relaying on canvas the magnificent chromatic spectacle offered by the mysterious phenomenon called "Recovery", a balm for the soul.

All alone with you makes the butterflies in me arise, as the very fact that everything I cared for behind the words, full of colored spots thrown on a damp cloth, turned into the Tail of a Swallow, this butterfly so misunderstood and beautifully threatening that no one has the opportunity to immortalize in its true splendor.

I want you to be my baby. This image could be reached if, identifying the calm of a great and careless nature, we would take seriously the words of writer Dora Pavel, through the odyssey of returning to the world of an art restaurateur, as a poetic connection with an

Apollo of great emotions:

"There he had learned that re-painting means, above all, to curb your impulse to paint. It is important not to give the devitalized color a glow it never had, but to brighten it within the limits of its color. To represent your temperance with which the master applied paste on canvas once."

The rose, with a glance at the past, has the power to bind a hopeful promise to an avant-garde thought, along a long search, animated by the grace of highlighting the most beautiful qualities of understanding of art: patience, tenderness, spiritual unity, sincerity, likeness, dreams and attraction.

Leadership is the echo of the powerful encounter between the artist and his muse, opening up to the world as a delicate knock on the door of the heart that does not dare call us to set up a crystallized painting by juxtaposing two structures: the suspense around the subject and the expressiveness of a vision suggestively called "The Renewal of Man".

Sign Your Name Across My Heart marks the moment of a long-awaited reunion that holds the echo of a tear, of that hope that has not been lost, of that delicate beating at the door of the heart that does not contain calling us inside it through an eternal voice that seems to emphasize the speaking of a painting: "Adorn your soul with the purest sincerity before accepting to be part of another reality, of the work of art."

Significant Words Spoken From The Perspective Of A Leaf (II)

On February 27, 2021

Change your beliefs that govern your inner universe, without stopping to experience the reality you have never seen before.

I told you in the previous article that while I was on my way home, a leaf lay before my feet, and it stopped there as if it had been attracted by a magnet stronger than the earth, because it did not move even after I kicked it. It stuck there, like a nail, so I didn't insist on moving it from its place. My thoughts were overwhelmed by a voice inside me that kept repeating, over and over: "Try not to be indifferent to the events that took you by surprise."

Another argument that can be invoked in favor of this interpretation of thoughts can be deduced from the very double structure of the leaf observation process: first that it exists as a kind of circularity in the dynamics of the relationship between spirit and nature, then that it exists as a kind of reversal of a situation in which the absurd is increasingly insinuated in everyday life.

It was a moment of double significance. For when the leaf suddenly lay before me, unwilling to move, not even in my attempt to kick it, I felt that I was experiencing the bitterness of voluntary exile in no man's land, in a gloomy and desolate landscape, accepted with the pride of that pure spirit which does not want to submit to either the stranger in me nor to the neighbor in me, which could have made me reach the heights of despair.

Although, the leaf brought me news about the extent to which internal needs are (or are not) met emotionally, spiritually, intellectually or socially.

Leadership: Can you distinguish the reflection of an image external to you in the form of subjective experience of the effects of the action of an impact stimulus from an environment that is not always predictable?

Is it time to for me to change I wonder? Will I be able to bear the fall of the leaf at my feet in the future as a distinct moment after creation, or as a harbinger?

The leaf looks fragile at first glance, you think you can crush it with a small gesture. However, it doesn't despair, it does not resist, does not play the victim, it doesn't show signs of the disease in which some seem absent from the surrounding reality. It allows itself to be influenced, not conquered. It lets itself be carried away by the wave of your behavior, it lets itself be studied, lets itself be lost in the thoughts of the one who looks at it, but it does not let itself be easily convinced by your attempts to appreciate reality.

The words of the writer Mesa Selimovic, from the novel "The Dervish and Death", catch my eye again:

"I walked from one darkness to another, neither form nor place, because I saw nothing and I was preoccupied only with myself, preoccupied with imaginations in which I was lost and what I could have recognized. I was changing the darkness, I knew that because I was moving, and because time was passing, even though I didn't feel it passing."

I, too, was troubled by that stoicism of the invincible attitude in the face of an imaginary existential storm, for that ruined, trembling, but stubborn leaf in its determination not to move, inspired a single vision: the transformation of life in the scene of a work by Caravaggio. It inspired a lack of brilliance in that vivid and vibrant something of my becoming, as if I had been through it a few more times and had no other expectations from life.

Indeed, there is a restlessness that characterizes any creator who is never satisfied with his own work, an unpredictable reaction to the reception of a new facet of the mosaic of the vast experience of understanding another dimension of his being. A state of agitation, of turmoil, of restlessness. After all, I believe that some independent syndromes, with associations in everyday life, retain the swept shape of the leaf over a longer period of time.

Leadership: Are you ready to change the way you perceive every moment of your life by performing a self-examination that allows you to customize the shape of symmetry to something that you've overlooked?

One aspect is clear. The effect of educating my character results from the specificity of the situation I faced, nullifying my omniscient qualities, nullifying part of my happiness, part of my sadness, part of my dilemmas, so I never hoped to know myself as well as I thought.

In fact, I overlooked something: the essence of the consumed event, the imposing requirement of consciousness to create the inner representation of the outside. The leaf made me understand that any character can be represented by its association with a supposed maturation experience that does not lack dilemmas or disappointments, but also the idea that they are part of an experiment called doubt, inner helplessness or equivocal determinism.

Even then. I felt something in the specific context of a psychology of the creator who judges his mistakes in his own creation, isolating himself from the reality of those around him. Perhaps this fact is under the constraint of the relentless need to transpose myself into a representation of the anthropomorphized spirit of nature, in the form of an intense and plenary subjective experience that reflects my relationship with the world around me.

Rather, the leaf reflects a narrow world, which absorbs all the others. Contact with it doubled the light in an artist of metamorphoses, nullified my concern of not making any mistakes, and strengthened my efforts to straighten myself out. At the same time, the leaf has changed the intentions of a man who looks beyond the appearance of a known world, reversed the reality that his brain has built on oppositions to everything that is integrated within the boundaries of normalcy.

Therefore, the leaf is an anchor that holds time in place, it is a cut of my own image from one reality and then transposed into another reality. It is a tender and instructive foray through the life, story, career and soul of an artist. It is a symbol of regret, of restrictions of all kinds, which turns into a symbol of hope, because it showed me that I can be a different man than I was, with other perceptions about me, about life, about the passion to capture emotions from any trifle.

Leadership is the result of an accumulation of experiences from which you must enrich your soul, to draw some conclusions, meditating on what happens to them with that quality of the Creator to manifest within everything.

Significant Words Spoken From The Perspective Of A Leaf can be formed and linked by a reflection on the self that summarizes the essence of the teaching from which we must remember: nothing happens without a reason.

Significant Words Spoken From The Perspective Of A Leaf (I)

On February 25, 2021

Try to give meaning to an experience of life full of lessons, before extending your perspectives of existence for the benefit of a more accurate understanding of your evolution.

Whenever I walk around the city, especially at night, when the city is quieter basically, I notice the most interesting things that can be observed with the naked eye, in an analysis of the tendency of impenetrable shadows and mysteries. The silence itself is interesting, less when things stand out, but rather when the night admits its guilt of being a good counselor in the face of the glory of a clear moonlight.

And hence my reasoning for saying this, for if I were not to say it, it would mean keeping to myself the thought with which the night covers its darkness, with the inherent dynamics of a pendulum that oscillates between back and forth, between something that can be seen with the naked eye and something that spins continuously in my life, but always goes unnoticed in the silence of a clear moonlight.

And so, as I walked, a leaf lay before my feet, taking advantage of a moment when my mind was about to explode, when my thoughts ran like crazy in all directions. I don't know what wind put it there, because there were no trees in my immediate vicinity. And it stopped there, as if it had been drawn to a magnet stronger than the earth, because it didn't move even after I kicked it. It stuck there, like a nail, so I didn't insist on moving it from its place.

So too must be the case with people. Some appear in your life without your expecting of their presence, they are so small and insignificant, but they stand there like leaves to which you do not know how to respond, you do not even know how to approach them. But you can see that these leaves are far outdated, they have kept a bit of that autumn color that announces the possibility of their disintegration with the cooling of the weather.

Leadership: Is the tendency of your personality to attach knowledge value to random moments, with which you would agree to merge as "another person"?

Yes, we are all human, and at some point, each of us resembles a leaf in the lives of others. But no matter how much we appear as leaves to others, and no matter how much others appear as leaves to us, let us never forget that any leaf, even a completely dry one, can become a tool for understanding our own experiences and feelings.

Another thing. What you feel truly represents you is sometimes what you feel you've kicked with your foot, but hasn't budged. And what you feel presses and dominates you in a way that is hard to describe in words, may be the moment when you realize that something small and insignificant was much more stable and resilient than you.

And I had no choice, I felt like someone else entirely, probably resembling a blindfolded giant who stumbles on his own strength on the way to the answers to the question: "What am I and why do I do what it is that I do?"

Leadership: Can you bring about a significant improvement in self-perception as a result of managing a moment of maximum lucidity, when you realize that you have become a man of other worlds?

Therefore, let us reflect on every detail that life lays in our way, in order to discover ourselves as being more understanding of ourselves. That is why I understand the writer Mesa Selimovic too well when he wrote the following in the novel "The Dervish and Death":

"Easy. There is time for everything, I gave it to myself, and there will be appearances and testimonies on the thread of judgment, I will not avoid them, and I will finally be able to pronounce my own sentence, because this is about me and me alone. Suddenly the world became a mystery to me, and I to the world. We sat face to face and looked at each other in amazement, we no longer knew each other, we no longer understood each other."

Even the world of writers, like the world of artists, like the world of ordinary people, is sometimes concentrated in the universe of a leaf that is part of the category of landscape paintings that leaves you speechless, making you marvel at how many thoughts you need to invest in a single moment (given by an image treated broadly, figuratively) just to better understand your nature, reactions, physical, mental, emotional and spiritual level.

And if in a single moment of maximum lucidity, I myself became a man of other worlds, first artistically, then from a storytelling standpoint, finally living (by contemplating the sensible and the concrete), it is due to the fact that within me lies that power that no one else has: the power to recognize a lesson in life when I experience it simultaneously on several planes of my being. First of all, on a spiritual level and on a level of consciousness.

Your evolution in leadership is dependent on how you manage the moments that surprise you and urge you to change your self-perception.

The strongest self-perception is the result of your attitude and mentality that manifests itself in distinct behaviors and actions that depend on a random event constituted in a life lesson from which you come out wiser.

Significant Words Spoken From The Perspective Of A Leaf actually convey those fleeting moods or impressions connected to each other by dominant relationships between man and nature, with the specification that anything minor gets in your way actually manifests itself to make you more focused and more aware of the beautiful things around you, of the present time.

Silence Must Be Heard

On June 05, 2017

Express the greatness of your reason of being everything you particularly represent, venturing into an infinite exodus towards the grand heights of the spirit.

I was losing myself in the virtue of the moment of not being the same, imagining myself alone and belonging to no one in the face of the greatness of the idea of getting stuck on one stage of development of the human spirit. It was a peculiarity of the need to look for myself elsewhere, supported by exorbitant will to create the essence of a new existence, of which I am bound to even now by a non-consequential solidarity.

Always the way of seeing the world, toward which the essential difference between the artist's talent to play with ingredients arts and the meditation of the thinker to venture into an infinite exodus towards grand heights of the spirit tends to, beyond the limits of my own observations, accompanies the hidden of a unique meaning of life, as in a labyrinth without beginning or end.

Like a painter who with several brush strokes manages to portray the essences of a great complexity, I was living the experience of being gripped by something stronger than myself, something that people call God, interpreted with thirsty curiosity through a unique representation of omniscient providence, through the eye that keeps watch forever.

It was a kind of variant of the conversation I was having with myself, where everything came out of the lights of a time laid out on the cover of a novel of becoming, the formation of a new consciousness. A conversation in which instead of talking about what I already knew, I would cast myself into the ridiculous of forgetting who I am. Pay attention, you're playing with fire !

Leadership: Are you defined by a particular way of receiving yourself and understanding your creative potential through the viewfinder of a reason that has power over the plurality of worlds you choose to retreat in?

Silence is the greatness of reason that builds a philosophy indispensable to the experience of being someone else, beyond what you yourself feel that you are, which forces the rediscovery of yourself only within the framework of unprecedented knowledge springing from meditation on spiritual actions, callings from beyond the world and the ordinary mind, no words just vibrations.

I still continue to undo conversations with myself, hidden truths, to recall my remembrance weathered by time and not remain trapped in the "fantasy" area. Scientific research could identify within my brain some resonance phenomena leading to the activation of mechanisms of self-determination, an intense electrical activity of neurons responsible for coordinating inspiration towards the space of Revelation.

Silence is lost in the distance of a large sea and suddenly cropped up in imagination, swaying in the mirage of an inaccessible world and immersed in the territory filled with challenges of a subjective perception of reality and interpretations you give to events, on which you begin to know with a relative accuracy what to expect from yourself.

Leaning on the basis of "diamonds will burn, friendly cards will turn" I concluded that the only authentic knowledge, the essence of spiritual maturity is the expression of a profound judgment of the self, materialized in a learning context. How much finesse to sneak a good idea in the content of a reason capable of continuous flexibility through a creative energy, as if before a painting that reveals its beauty only if you step away from it. The time has come to learn, that silence...

Silence is a non-verbal manifestation of a particular experience generated by the courage of a self-uttering that gives birth to a believable world outside of the world you experience.

No wonder the hero of the novel "Lolita" confessed his beliefs full of passion in relation to the modality of increasing his experience of the inner world, cause silence has the right to be heard:

"I always preferred the mental hygiene of "don't hear, don't see". Now when I am troubled with past events, trying to plead my cause, I remember that in circumstances such as that narrated before I would always adopt the method to not take into account the moods of the being I associated myself with. But at the same time, I tried to reassure my despicable Ego."

One glance directed at myself in an excess of curiosity, back to the greatness of a time read through the lines of such a powerful representation of life, preserves the creative force that opens the door to the secrets of infinite fulfillment. The same force underlying the depiction of a being that wouldn't be recognized in the world, but only in relation to what can be delivered through the soul, by exalting experiences that inspire, accompany and mobilize the cognitive approach.

Leadership can at any time join the response sprang from what you learn to be in a position of inaction. At a peak time of meditation. This position, which blocks the wounds of reality, requires good concentration on how you govern your individuality.

Silence Must Be Heard reveals that moment of infinite inspiration needed to create and transmit new contents of consciousness that contributes to the requirement to become aware of how you manage your life purpose and meaning.

Do you particularly represent a symbol of silence from which springs the meaning of another reality?

Silent Realms Of Power

On October 06, 2010

Measure well your own value, by fragmenting each element of your own personality and eliminating those factors that influence your character in a negative way.

A growing worship was accumulating around the Nizam who ruled with his brother, the Persian king Sharaman, following the principles of loyalty and brotherhood. But no one suspected that, in fact, Nizam was a man with no faith, eager for power, whose greatest desire was to be not only the king, but also the most powerful man in Persia.

Finding that in the holy city of Alamut there is a magic object, a sacred dagger - whose haft was filled with the legendary sand of time, and if throwing the sand can turn back time for changing events, Nizam, very old and wise, but knave, implemented the diabolical plan.

Leadership: Does looking for the meaning of life become a top priority when you give incessant attention to everything you think about when around a predestination that makes you irresponsible?

Most effective weapon. To succeed in leadership you must resort to the power of charm, of pure seduction, but sometimes have to resort to cunning or even "manipulation" of behind the scenes and discover constantly in people's minds, in the consciousness of the masses, to step into the world's soul and modify it to your will.

As any impostor, Nizam had the most interest to spread his influence in the widest circles, and especially to his three grandchildren, who were unsurpassed in bravery and courage, to increase his possibilities of success. He won their absolute confidence, printing in their hearts and minds a very clear image of him: as not only a wise man, but overly affectionate and protective. What he said remained true, what he did was always fair.

There was no difficult to deceive the vigilance of his grandchildren and also of the other Persians. He knew people like this: physically well-prepared, trained to fight, to react quickly and accurately, which scanned each face, watched every move and even sought danger.

The instinct and inclination to evil were cheating him only rarely. While he stayed with an eye on everyone, no one stayed with an eye on him. So he could take every precaution to pass as innocent after he killed his brother, King Sharaman, and after being put in danger a whole kingdom.

Leadership: Can you afford to destroy a world, as to rebuilds yours?

The value undertaken by the level of significance of the decision to reach others' expectations, correlated with the anticipation of any deviation from the normal, approaches the principle of subjective judgment in matters of faith. To be vertical means to lose your "insanity" to believe in a reality that only expresses mood changes, disorganized images and unbelievably ephemeral intruding thoughts.

No one noticed what was happening around them, excepting Prince Dastan. At the end of the movie "Prince of Persia: The Sands of Time (2010)", Dastan, with the beautiful and brave princess Tamina, managed to "change time" and to prevent Nizam from reaching his stingy purposes.

But the question that must be asked from the very beginning is: what would have happened if the Nizam's diabolical plans were implemented? A man who destroys a world would be capable of anything, including destroying universes, but it worth it? I don't know. But I firmly believe that a man who feeds his soul only with the burning desire to have absolute power, which cannot be determined to stop his evil plans, who believes more in material than in spiritual values, has always good reasons to do it.

If you could, would you destroy a world as to rebuilds yours? Or you have the power to accept your fate and let things take its natural course, even if it is not as you wanted?

Leadership: Does the subtlety with which you mask the strong tension of a past life coincide with your ability to manifest what you want in a state of uncertainty towards your own identity?

Power is in good hands when the one who leads is more loved than feared !

Someone said: "Who serves on a bad man, beggar will remain." Power, whether it is in the hands of an unscrupulous man, ambitious, ruthless and greedy, becomes a serious problem - because all people will suffer. A fearful man is capable of destroying not just a world, but an entire universe, and therefore, he will get the same answer: that no one will open their heart in front of him.

If, on the other hand, the leader is susceptible to people and their needs, then all will serve him with faith. There will be no riots, protests, complaints, and thus power of the leader will be safe.

Just as two heterogeneous elements like saltpetre and coal, mixed in proper proportions, are giving us the powder from which may result a huge explosive energy - so cooperation between people and their leader can give a more usable power than could have the leader by alone.

To manifest a concern for the seizing and maximizing of power, in a state of uncertainty towards your own identity, indicates that you are not sure what suits you and that you are not sure of what you claim you can do when you do not have access to the true values and virtues that you must represent.

On the silent lands of power, the things are not always pink, and there is no marking to indicate the true nature of those who want to lead and their maneuvers that they undertake to acquire and maintain power.

But "the silent land of power" is on quicksand, and those who enter this area and remains true to some principles and unhealthy ideals, unfair and unethical, using trickery, manipulation, indoctrination in order to create their own world, will never find their balance and no one will stretch a hand to help them. And the more they will struggle to achieve mean goals, the more they will sink faster...

Measure well your own value, by fragmenting each element of your own personality and eliminating those factors that influence your character in a negative way.

P.S. To hold the power by any means should not be the goal of any leader.

Sin Will Be The Rest Of Reason

On July 14, 2020

Show interest in grasping with your mind and soul the broad realm of knowledge based on the synchronization of "myself" with "myself more than myself".

Something in me demanded more of me than others, no matter how hard I resisted. It was a ruthless and unshakable command, but I didn't know where it came from and I didn't want to give up. So be it, I thought, let this be my science and thwart all my efforts. By comparison, any other sin I have committed or will commit is nothing but a ridiculous trifle, because I have not done too much harm to anyone by sinning. The sins of the flesh and the senses are nothing but the pleasure of forgetting. A dream of sin, a sleep from which I must wake up bitterly every time to find my guilt. Who knows, maybe the taste for books, the study of the Greek language, the interest in profane science, maybe even Homer and Plato represent for me the same desire to forget and are a more serious sin than the insignificant sins of the flesh and the senses.

*Sin is only a word, but for me, from now on, it will only mean the desperate desire to forget at least for a moment my highest knowledge, to forget God in me. Sin is the rest and sleep of the soul, just as the sleep of the body is its rest, because without it the body could not live, being bound to the finite world. That is why man, in his weakness and limitation, could not live without the rest of the soul. From now on, I will not blame anyone for my sins. Let all their sins be forgiven, that is the nature of man. For me, the rest of reason will be sin and sin will be the rest of reason, but the fact that I am aware of this makes me desperate and I will never have peace with myself again. **

Leadership: Are you able to find your inner peace through the experience of oscillating between the rest of reason and the sin of eating from the fruit of knowledge, so that you deserve to be the same you at all times?

From the above passage, taken from the book "Young Johannes" I learned one thing, that from sin to holiness there is only one step: knowledge. And here one can identify several kinds of knowledge, such as: self-knowledge, knowledge of good, knowledge based on observed facts, knowledge based on discernment (combined with praiseworthy thinking), knowledge based on self-evident data of experience, knowledge based on comparative observation, knowledge based on biblical revelation, knowledge based on emotional experience, which is then fully embedded in the emotional memory of your being.

Because of the knowledge that more and more people were interested in, some spread the idea of sin and subtly and cowardly inserted this into the Bible: "Believe and do not search". Whereas nowadays, knowledge has gained such momentum that people actually depend on technology much more than on the fear of the words preached to them from the pulpit. I understood this very well, and I understood it better than anyone, because knowledge is indeed the most powerful weapon, and whoever has it leads the whole world.

I, Fântânăru Neculai-Ioan, am one of those for whom knowledge will be fulfilled in concrete, not in abstract. I believe in God through the knowledge I have developed in my writings, with much discernment, with much soul, with much thought, so that I have come to consider myself a good connoisseur of concrete reality, perceiving and expressing spiritual feelings in this way.

My true knowledge is the result of the individual contemplation that the soul addresses to the world of Ideas in the doctrine of a Universal Deity, but also in the doctrine of an individualistic consciousness, for the freedom demanded by the act of thought must bear fruit from everyone's effort to observe carefully, to invent, to discover, to make a better world with the help of what I have in me.

Leadership: In order to recognize yourself as a superior person, do you have to prove a knowledge that has the audacity not to recognize its limits?

Something in me demands more from me than others, due to the side of my creative compositional personality, and asks me to express my point of view on the observations I have collected from life experience, deepening more and more the soul side of human behavior, but also my relationship with God.

One word stops me from being my best: ignorance. Only the thoughts and scenarios I make between my two ears and my two eyes can increase my chances of finding myself in the pages of a life that contemplates itself at every moment and that in other lives sees only mirrors.

The very pages of the books I write abound in the charming presence of creative thinking, like a life born of a God who teaches me not to take seriously the sins attributed to me by the desire to know myself above all by knowledge. By comparison with faith, I identify as a righteous man, of great character, good at heart, and even this fact of describing myself highlights the fertile ground of self-knowledge.

Life born before the eyes of God is an infinite source of fullness obtained by virtue of knowledge. In order to know yourself as a superior man, you must prove a knowledge that has the audacity not to recognize its limits, putting in your center of attention the merit of inserting yourself into a world full of superheroes. At the same time, you must consider the merit of stirring yourself up through the introspection caused by that refined dissection of your soul and self seen as an inexhaustible source of creation and revelation.

If for a continuous validation of self-knowledge it is necessary to identify the means necessary for good observation (this is probably a basic component of emotional intelligence), then for the completion of large amounts of emotional and intellectual content there is the difficulty of extensibility of views which make up the essence of a new spirituality.

Leadership is the result of the knowledge you have gained through the power of "yourself" elevated to the relatively positive superlative: "I am always open to the new and I am always above my expectations."

And I believe one more thing. I believe that the essence of a new spirituality resonates with man's effort to make his knowledge an intense experience of the important events he goes through during his life, so that he is visible to all those who seek to differentiate themselves from what holds them captive: insecurity in finding people capable of overcoming their passions and ignorance.

Sin Will Be The Rest Of Reason for all those people who believe they can be better than others because of the knowledge taken from the lessons of ascension to absolute power. It is a great pity to know yourself above all, because everyone will look at you with envy and contempt, not necessarily with admiration. But your reason must triumph through the subtlety of erudition, through the subtlety of suggestion, through the subtlety of ideas, and at the same time it must bow to the faith which says: "Nothing is impossible."

Sincerity Confesses All Its Thoughts

On April 22, 2002

Learn to manage your feelings by proving that you can follow your intuition in terms of their expression, with that sense of measure that underlies your realistic adaptation to a world where fragility meets fear.

It had happened that the love that had greeted her was exactly the one that matched her mood perfectly. It was a kind of adoration from afar, a silent contemplation, a deification of the unknown. Adolescence appeared before adolescence, the dream of the nights became a novel and remained a dream, the desired shadow was finally real, made flesh, still without a name, without a mistake, without a stain, without desires and without flaws. In a word, the distant lover who remained in the world of the ideal, a chimera that had taken on a form. Any other more real and close encounter would have frightened Cosette as she was half immersed in the murky mists of the monastery. He had, mixed up, all the fears of the child and all the fears of the nun. The air of the monastery, which she had soaked in for five years, slowly dissipated and made everything around her look unsafe. In her condition, she did not need a lover, but a vision. She began to adore Marius as something charming, bright, unnatural.

She smiled openly at him, for boundless innocence touches boundless coquetry.

She looked forward daily to the hour of the walk; She found Marius, felt exceedingly happy, and sincerely believed that she was confessing all his thoughts, saying to Jean Valjean:

- What a wonderful garden Luxembourg is !

Marius and Cosette were secretly wrapped around each other. They did not speak to each other, they did not greet each other, they did not know each other; they saw each other and lived thanks to the fact that they looked at each other, like stars in the sky, separated by millions of leagues.

*Little by little, Cosette became a woman, and she blossomed beautiful and in love, with the consciousness of her beauty and the ignorance of love. And on top of that she's chic, out of innocence.

Leadership: Have you reached that maturity in which you fully appreciate what you have and thus are able to meet the conditions of opening your heart to external manifestations?

Before relating to the purpose of your life you must reach that maturity in which you begin to appreciate to the fullest what you have and thus be able to meet the conditions of opening the heart in the face of external manifestations that accompany the experience of feeling a deep connection with the spiritual world. To the extent of this, I must define spirituality as the openness of man's soul to the affective structures of the personality of those around him, which appear as essential emotional constituents of his character.

Of course, spirituality is found in any spiritual connection, in any manifestation of nature. Think of an animal, such as a dog. Have you noticed when he approaches you, wagging his tail, how he sniffs at you, how he waits to be petted when he jumps on your chest? The dog feels that you are a good man, you instinctively feel that he likes you, and you both rejoice.

Or when you paint a flower, how it opens its petals and shows its grace in your garden, shining under the caress of the sun's rays. Spirituality is found in your freedom to experience color and brush, under the influence of the feeling of brotherhood, of communion with nature. A flower is an accompaniment to your "flowering" in an artistic image. At the moment of creation, the connection between you and nature is created, a real delight, because you can outline and apply your mirror in a space proposed by you.

Thus, you feel the connection of the friendship between the giver and the gifted, you find your mirror in the soul of nature, and this mirror carries something divine because you see with an open soul a fairytale world, full of color.

Leadership: Have you reached that maturity in which you can fully appreciate what you have and thus are able to meet the conditions of opening your heart to external manifestations?

Before you relate to the purpose of your life you must reach that maturity in which you begin to fully appreciate what you have and thus are able to meet the conditions of open heart in the face of external manifestations that accompany the experience of feeling a deep connection with the spiritual world. To the extent of this, we must define spirituality as the openness of man's soul to the affective structures of the personality of those around him, which appear as essential emotional constituents of his character.

It must also be said that spirituality is found in every connection of the soul, in every manifestation of nature. Think of an animal, such as a dog. Have you noticed when he approaches you, wagging his tail, how he huddles next to you, how he waits to be caressed when he jumps on your chest? The dog feels that you are a good man, you instinctively feel like he likes you, and you both rejoice.

Or when you paint a flower, how it opens its petals and shows its grace in your garden, shining under the caress of the sun's rays. Spirituality is found in the artist's freedom to experience color and brush, under the influence of the feeling of brotherhood, of communion with nature. A flower is an accompaniment to your "flowering" in an artistic image. At the moment of creation, the connection between you and nature is created, a real delight, because you can outline and apply your mirror in a space proposed by you.

Thus, you feel the connection between the giver and the gifted. You find your mirror in the soul of nature, and this mirror carries something divine because you see with an open soul a fairytale world, full of color.

Leadership: Can you position yourself in all the feelings given to the closeness to someone or something, giving them generously as if a connection had been established between two totally separate worlds?

Through spirituality, man positions himself in all the feelings given to the approach to someone or something, feelings that he generously gives, as if a connection had been established between two totally separate worlds. And for this reason, the way we have to face and overcome the obstacles of life, with dignity and nobility of soul, for relief and comfort, is related to how feelings are generated or amplified by a realistic attitude, open to the feelings of others.

One more thing. Your external image and experiences may reflect the conditions of a mature relationship between reason and feeling, between sympathy and adversity, between poetry and reality, between dream and responsibility, between fulfillment and legend, but it depends on the maximum of your own originality to manifest as "a vision of feelings" from the perspective of an expression of the call from a metaphysical, transcendent plane, through which the consciousness feels invested with the responsibility of an accomplishment in reality (exteriority).

When it comes to interpersonal, affective, and emotional relationships, spirituality is found in the depths of nostalgia and feelings of loss, or in your willingness to experience the depth of the feelings you nurture for someone. Spirituality is found in the richness of your heart and the tenderness of your way of thinking, dreaming of that love that can be only one, that can give you wings and meaning forever. And the opening of the heart in front of the other creates the necessary conditions to build a mutual trust.

True spirituality is the gateway to the soul in the light of a destiny that shines through credibility, through an experience of unity. And this experience of unity is completely aligned with the Creator in our being and in the universe of Creation.

Sincerity Confesses All Its Thoughts when it comes to life experiences, of hope and longing, of those who truly believe in the hand of destiny and in the motto: "Time solves everything".

A life lived in truth, through good and beautiful, through the sincerity of those who share and assume their daily experiences, must go through the hope of a permanent change of destiny, From chance to passion, from Creation and Creator.

Situational Leadership

Attempt to combat the feeling of failure of the operation by the force of nature, putting at stake the ability to directly come to the fore in any situation.

The director Serghei Eisenstein will be proposed a novel adaptation of HG Wells' "War of the Worlds", project will be subsequently abandoned as too expensive. Negotiations are extended, but, because it is needed to obtain also Sovkino's agreement and the permission for Eisenstein to extend the stay beyond the borders of his homeland. Meanwhile Eisenstein also discusses about the material terms of the contract: Lasky wants only his cooperation, giving him a $ 500 weekly during the film subject is selected and then, from starting to produce it, $ 3,000 per week.

*But Eisenstein categorically refuses to accept any agreement without the participation of Tisse and Alexandrov, whose presence was not interesting for Lasky. His condition leads almost to the breaking negotiations until finally Paramount initially gives him $ 900 a week, and he will pay himself its cooperators. It is a lovely friendly solidarity. **

Leadership: Do you manifest your receptivity towards the demands of confirming a new content that you can only carry out by using an external source of content?

A leader will never accept to carry out a project, if that project is not designed as a mechanism with two speeds: a work of propagating arbitrary pulses (own judgment) and a regrouping of the forces of intervention for the optimization of response offers (judgment of others).

The situation when you are exposed to a set of orientations, with many feedback collections, stimulates receptiveness to the demands of confirming a new content that you can only carry out by using an external source of content. An external source of content can be a brilliant mind that goes beyond the appearance of things, a bearer of great values and qualities, a spirit of first-rank artistry, a unique example of virtuosity, a powerful writer or a man whose story impressed you enormously.

The situation in which you relate to a variety of experiences of partnership, exposed to the conditions of approval of certain amendments and supplements for a certain custom product, reflects not only a dependency on achievements entered on the line of an assumed ownership. But rather dependence on an external source of control of the way in which you evaluate yourself in the totality of a work from scratch to the completion stage.

Are you the owner of a knowledge that depends on the nature of its material, derived from experience and images that populate your senses and intelligence? Or are you the owner of a knowledge that depends on stimulation offered by feeding yourself with another vision?

Leadership: Can you give a more pronounced note of authenticity to your creative experience according to the qualities and evolution of a pattern of your status that has conquered the audience by the simplicity and charisma with which it approached the values in which it believes strongly?

The man who imposes respect through experience and knowledge always stands as the final decision prominent factor in victories in battles won with various situations of vocational guidance. He gives a riposte to those who think they have the right to sabotage its authority.

The basic value of such a man, whose broad recognition status is based on the criterion "I know best what performance is", is not given by the usefulness of the vast knowledge he possesses, but also by the constant contribution of empathy and the determination he brings to the completion of a point of view that clarifies and supports its position on the influences around.

This is a kind of self-sustaining against the potential to change all of the other variables of interest by imposing new requirements, requests or rules, in favor of alliances that would guarantee independence to choose your own ways of achieving goals. The feeling of impaired functioning before aggressive factors of influence can be combated only through the force of character that commands respect, admiration, gratitude, professionalism.

Leadership is a demonstration of the difference between what you manage to plant in the hearts of the people around you and what they discover in you. All the time you pay the individual "insurance" contribution to professional progress in the account of your vision about world and business, in a way that does not violate anybody's rights, but that'll bring more freedom of action. This is the only way to rise above the condition of "limited".

A supreme proof of solidarity can be accepted as a sign that one that makes himself understood in terms of "I control the whole project" is about to recognize his value. How? To assimilate experiences from the exigency of restoring as soon as possible the full unity between what is given in an original manner (personal content) and the manner in which that something (that content) is presented in the form of other consciousnesses.

The content that gives value to your solidarity is related to what you manage to accomplish when others deviate from the course of your vision (jointly and mutually agreed), without diminishing the merits that have provided you with means of validation of creation representatively called: REPUTATION.

Situational Leadership is linked to leader's traits or abilities with respect to various stakeholders. It mainly concerns the professional development stages where you are involved, enrolling more in the form of direct steps to assert or through "third party contractors" to achieve common goals.

It is about managing different situations to which you are exposed throughout career, which could cause your professional independence, or rather, your dependence on a particular approach, a foreign way of thinking, or another authority.

In different business circumstances you can acquire a sense of belonging to a common cause, or a sense of belonging to the outer, authoritative, thinking, which puts beyond any control, selfishness and constraints. Often we do not realize and we wonder why things do not work.

Slave To His Own Rebellion

On February 14, 2011

What you are willing to see depends on what you are prepared to interpret with reference to your own expectations.

The Russian director, Sergei Eisenstein, made a categorical statement: "To build cinema starting from the idea of cinematography and from abstract principles is barbarism and stupidity."

It should also be added that the film "October" tries, in an original way, to compensate visually, in several cases, the absence of sound in the film. The echo of the cannon shot of the cruiser "Aurora" echoes through the halls of the Winter Palace, which are filmed by a rhythmic opening and closing of the diaphragm. Thus, the echo is "seen". As the noises of machine guns in the assault of the same palace are "seen", signaled by the corresponding movements of a crystal chandelier, violently shaken. In the latter case, it is obviously an associative equivalent (the shaking of the crystal directly evokes the noise), while in the former case, we are dealing with a graphic equivalent of the sound.

For all its obvious big misses, the film "October" remains an experience of great proportions. Eisenstein always thinks big. That's why his mistakes are also amazing: they take your breath away. Like a fearless Achilles in his iconoclastic fight against traditionalism, but also a strange Don Quixote, haunted by his own hallucinations, Eisenstein sometimes becomes a slave to his own rebellion.

Leadership: How do the expressive equivalents in your creation reveal the possibility of a purely visual message, so that the echo of "seen" is followed by the echo of the "as seen" image?

In the study of cinema, visual experiences propagate like sound waves, undergoing creative transformations and modulations. The cannon's echo and reverberation phenomena are translated into visual language through the bold pacing of the diaphragm, transforming the abstract energy of sound into palpable cinematic representations. Visual structures, such as the vibrating chandelier, become mediums for the transmission of absent sounds, in an experimental rebellion against technical limitations. Like a physicist studying sound waves, Eisenstein transforms these artistic hallucinations into graphic equivalents of acoustic reality. In this attempt to build a new form of expression, he overcomes the barriers of traditionalism, even if he sometimes becomes a slave to his own visual experiments.

As noted, Eisenstein categorically rejects the idea of building cinema on abstract principles, considering it nonsense, just as the psychology of perception explains that the lack of a stimulus can only be compensated for by concrete associations.

In the film "October", the director tries to compensate for the absence of sound with an original visual language: the echo of the cannon shot of the cruiser "Aurora" travels through the halls of the Winter Palace through a rhythmic opening and closing of the diaphragm, making the "echo" visible. The sound of assault machine guns is also visually transposed through the image of a violently shaking crystal chandelier, a graphic equivalent meant to evoke the absent sound.

Thus, Eisenstein creates a visual equivalent of auditory perception, trying to provide a unitary experience to the viewer. This ambitious approach, of adding visual dimensions to compensate for missing sound, makes "October" an experience of impressive scope, but also one of stunning failure resulting from its iconoclastic and sometimes hallucinatory approach. Eisenstein thus becomes a prisoner of his own rebellion, oscillating between the role of a daring Achilles in the fight against traditionalism and a Don Quixote pursued by his artistic hallucinations.

Leadership means turning absence into creative presence. How do you transform apparent limitation into a triumph of the visual, where absence becomes presence and silence takes visible form in your creation?

the slave of his own rebellion who creates fascinating, but sometimes difficult to understand works by reference to his own standards and radical visions, resulting in both masterpieces and spectacular errors. I say this because in "October" you can see a combination of innovative genius and stylistic excess, with reference to the novel way of visually equating sound, in the idea that constant experimentation can sometimes exceed the limits of the viewer's comprehension.

Slave To Love

On October 21, 2018

Concentrate your efforts on exploring a reality beyond immediate reach, directing your attention to contemplation of a painting centered on the fine-grained chromaticity of human existence available in its many aspects.

Any gesture of hers seems an invitation to read. Everything, in the precise lines of her delightful gaze, in the grace of her body's movements, seems confident in life, the result of wise choices. The eyes betray the most hidden thoughts, signs and symptoms of the presence of a gentle and quiet spirit, but who wants to keep in servitude, in the darkness of a living labyrinth, all those who live in an image of perfection. This is how the artistic form of an enlivening writing is born.

The expressionist phenomenon is infinitely more differentiated when updating an "expectation". Our encounter seems to be the response of her mind to a life situation she has not encountered before, an attempt to explore how emotion has shaped her artistic thinking, just like experiencing a play filled with the unexpected from which a masterpiece of drama can emerge. Delirium or exaltation?

A story that draws all eyes is a painting that can only be read from up close. Preponderantly creative, I am tempted to think of her as a limitless challenge, that of an irreversible falling in love, looking at her as from the reflection of a mirror without end and hidden things. But at the same time, I look at her with the fear with which the artist experiences a new combination of colors to enhance the effect of space.

In an act of deep creation, true influence lies in the ability to transform a simple decision into a masterpiece that reveals hidden truths.

The living impulse that asks to be exteriorized, based on the added value of a painting that wants itself discovered to the smallest detail, in the serene economy of tonal subtlety, denotes something mortgaged to the unknown, the mysterious, the enigmatic. She does not seem to be absorbed merely by the obsessive thought of some ardent passion, encouraged by the attachment to the particular way of dealing with a different story, in an aspect of the feelings embraced by the concept of aesthetic experience. Rather she seems to betray a weakness, an unusual attraction to the beautiful artistic that overcomes that relativity of the young girl's beauty.

Perhaps, in her mind full of desires, Proust's words concerning me torment: "Your work turns out to be an infinitely more real thing than the rest, as a renewal of the world, as a surprise in the universe, offering that joy you experience when you see a work of your favorite painter that differs from what you know."

Leadership: Can you successfully demonstrate that the reality increased by adding unpredictable elements can help you expand the story of an artistic creation without compromising the image of an emotion immortalized in all its splendor?

Thanks to you, especially to what my imagination invents in the target of all the gazed you give me with such sincerity, I reconstituted my name and life. Yes, from these letters, from this word pronounced in an English fashion: "in private". No wonder my art tends to correlate with the increase in the concentration of hidden challenges that only a compiler of new universes is experiencing.

My efforts to probe a psychic that I will never really truly know, seem to be oriented towards a painting centered on the finely chromated chromaticity of human existence available in its many aspects, from loneliness to happiness, to rivalry of friendship, from low affinity to high.

Much more important is the soul that you have carefully read to me, looking at me as when you have to enrich the content of a pastel aesthetic with the very imaginary content of a nostalgic narrative, to make sense of a sensibility inspired by the faithful film of a possible but intangible reality.

Leadership: Do you have the ability to notice and capitalize on subtle details, avoiding the superficiality caused by inattention to the complexity of a deep content in an uninterrupted "present"?

I am not amazed because you have mastered an image, but because you have taken that image to the forefront of a universe that has emerged from nothing, that continues to expand.

For a moment, you turned your attention to the rustic landscape in my mother's painting, with small houses covered with snow, sprinkled here and there in the way of the one who traverses the wide plain into the persistent and infinite azure of a sky without clouds and without... pain. No, I did not paint it, but you would've wanted me to give it to you as a memory of a world that fascinates you, as a content representation of an area of knowledge thrilling in the heart of a dream creation.

There are poets of great virtuosity and plastic fantasy who do not seek to be just a memory but want to live in an eternal "today", in an uninterrupted "present" in which the colors, their contrasts and their bold combinations, create inspiration for all beings who come in contact with them.

Leadership: Can you vibrate with the pregnancy of an image filled with hidden meanings, having previously been exalted by participating in its visual content in the cause of a spiritual wound?

It is still hard for me, same as when we met daily, to accept a praise from her for the sake of flattery. Still, she lived an intense inner life, with fantasies and dreams of a rebellious poet who seems to want to revive that contrast of colors and forms unrecognizable to the reticent eye of the creation of an Art Nouveau. Nothing in the world could contradict her convictions surrounded only by the hidden truth behind appearances.

She wouldn't allow me the respite to feel full of energy, often suppressing my temptation to aspire to any glory I could capitalize upon through creation, obviously mocking me with every addition (with a hint of criticism) that she brought to the force of my imagination. When you want to search a drop of blood, first find out who stabs who with the knife. I can hear your laughter. I can see your smile.

She seemed to be overcome by a knowledge she could not bear. It was a kind of envy that drove her to make me feel inferior to her, a sorrow for her well-being, the more dangerous as from her would emerge an entire chain of circumstances that would worsen one-another. Here the limit of the impossible was drawn by a drop of irony at a time, a less honest appreciation, seeking to cancel my self-esteem from the emotional sphere of the word written with the stamp of the colors that flood spring. You've got to know how the strong get weak.

"Nicu, I hoped you would only be an artist of the beautiful, but you rather look like a summary of the personal details you collect in a formula that does not tell the world the story of a sense-seeking imagination."

Leadership: In what category could you include, in extenso, the whole area of your artistic creation whose meaningful content refers implicitly to an act of transcendence and symbolizing of a moment that is never forgotten?

I have not seen her since that day, but she still lives in my memory. And I'm sure she's still silencing my inner vibe in the emotional sphere of my words that accompany the colors of a poetic art.

The beauty of a memory corresponds to the decipherment of a mystery found between the delicate fading of contrasts that seem to find peace under the grace of the expressiveness of a supersensible experience, making you wonder with that sweet reluctance of writer Anais Nin: "How many times have we rebuilt the way from the beginning? Where is the beginning? The beginning of memory or the beginning of suffering..."

If you are still reading these lines, dear reader, I feel obliged to tell you something. If you ever meet this young and beautiful girl whom I have sincerely spoken of to you as a good friend who knows how to listen to the story of a living artist, please tell her the following:

Tell her I'll be waiting in the usual place, with the tired and weary. There's no escape. We are too young to reason in the belief of a painting that came from an unknown sender. Your life will always be a perfect reflection of my state of mind and heart, and my true identity.

The image of a memory that is never lost is included in the category of a realism of soul essences, profoundly crafted by a literature capable of rising to the level of the sublime only by analogy with a Creator who never separates from His creation.

Slave To Love is the beginning of memory or the beginning of suffering, depending on the experience you are offered by the telling of a story with a deep, hard-to-reach subject, but which offers an intense relationship with your neighbor.

Solar Wind

Learn to create the environment necessary to reveal deep feelings, giving credibility and consistency to a reality that shapes you on the basis of a universal connection.

A hand from the shadows spreads the key to the only path in the dynamics of multiple caustics, just as the gods put before me the boundlessness of judgment. But not in the version of communication between planetary bodies by an energy system, and neither as an alternative destination to another level of knowledge, but as an interesting read that can be traveled in one clearly defined unit of time.

Without fail, I focus all my senses on this invisible arm, pierced by a boundless enigma interwoven between me and the text that the strength of immortality brings, projecting my depth on the page of a cosmic consciousness along with the signs of an original purity. Crossing the absurd? Real fiction? It is as if I were to propose a discovery of reality by myself, behind the concept of life after death, by using a combination of colors that does not talk about perfection but about the triumph of a sublime convenience between the need to overcome my own limits and the state of confusion of divided thoughts.

I am not all-knowing, but I can feel everything. Free in the totality of a spark of inspiration, to an image that wants itself to be real but it is actually not, I lay down my most expressive feelings regarding the effects of the world and that of darkness, as if hypnotized by the very spectacle of divine intervention. As with artists, they accept the reason for a despair of the nature of the spirit of interpreting the mysteries of the universe through chromatic contrasts that create depth and variety in an austere setting as a normality, situated at the boundary between dream and reality.

The colors that enlighten my destiny in God's eternity, as an infinity of cosmic essences moving continually in all directions are contained in the written form of an understanding that goes beyond any frontier of time and space in the great dictionary of figurative language. They seem to take care of the profound implications of a chiaroscuro that only Caravaggio could have seen without too much difficulty.

Leadership: Do you expose an important part of what you are on the continuous line of an original work of art, as you agree to be in competition with yourself?

As two hands together, text and painting mysteriously intertwine in a crazy game of hide and seek with life and death together, between the white of a paper converted into a confessor and the black as the tomb of a prophecy of centuries. The sensible basis of artistic construction, firmly supported by a play of close quality contrasts that give rise to tense rhythms, capable of suggesting emotional states and vital movements, fits the act of reporting the subject to a reality where nothing is as it was before.

The viewer of the painting whose essence is confused with the notion of gambling I insert in this unparalleled page, an essence that you have not yet guessed, seems left without an answer to a secular question: how do you have to interpret a labyrinth that constantly sets you new destinations, most of the time making you wander and you fail to reach any conclusion?

A window to another world is left open by the confession of a reflex of the true spiritual entity to which an artist's image belongs on the creative scene of a burst of surging emotion, the division of a constant of infinity as a boundary of confidential scribblings. Inevitably, I accept to be in the face of a competition with myself as long as the immediate reality in which I believe with all my existence confirms the truths of a world that uncovers its boundlessness by constantly practicing the light and shadow mixing operation in a space of communication with God.

The truth seems more disorganized than ever. The landscape of dreams born of the chromatic palette of an impressionist style interwoven in front of the sky and the sunlight, which gives the feeling of a mystical encounter with God, falls within the fixed limits of a painting that is worthy of me alone.

Leadership: Do you do everything to convince the erudite spectator of the number one quality of your genius, giving him the opportunity to enjoy a painting in the absence of his "understanding"?

I would ask the forger of the "moon and sun States" without disturbing anything from the hazard of a matchless inspiration: Tell me honestly, is it conceivable that something can come out of nothing?

Cyrano De Bergerac's genius would answer me in writing with invisible ink on a white sheet like a spell that keeps you in place and does not frighten you: "Between nothing and a simple atom there is such an endlessness that even the sharpest mind cannot penetrate it. To get out of this unexplained maze, you must admit that matter is eternal, as is God, and then there will be no need for us to admit a God, because the world could have existed without Him."

The hand from the shadows withdraws its presence, but not before taking on the white garb of a page filled with thoughts turned to the tragedies of ancient missing libraries. Finally, here I separate myself from the contrast between appearance and essence, modeled by the chiaroscuro of a magic mirror in which I once again see my universe. My genius surpasses any expectations in that it leaves room for any interpretation when it comes to the visual perception of images, illusions of images and optical illusions that show that what is seen does not always coincide with reality.

Probably, I will never be able to reach the same God-like power, and the body of the angel in me is no exception even if it is immortalized in the universal literature under the immortal pen of Cyrano de Bergerac. But what is remarkable in this area of the painting that I have added to your experiences in the last 5 minutes is that no matter how much you try to give me a grade of "naivete", I'm sure that you will only find spiritual joy with Me. And nowhere else.

In a game of words in which the Moon actually covers the Sun's disc, as a spell of hiding parts of the universal table, perhaps deeper than it seems at first glance, the image of the great clock that will cease to tell the time. Then I will become the altar dedicated to an unnamed God.

The exceptional creator status is suggested within the image itself through a figurative aspect. He is at the same time both within the image and somewhere else, in the way in which the story is told.

Solar Wind is an expression that is well-grounded in the literature of a minority that does not decompose itself by the lack of a thorough and deep understanding of the work itself, combining the gray color of an unpredictable universe with no rules, with the white of a page written in the language of feelings and desires.

In this way, I have to quote the gracious words of a great scholar, named Wilhelm Hauff, whose echo crossed the enormous distances of the universe and returned to me, as to all immortals, for a microscopic fraction of the immensity of an astral second:

"I am merely a young man forced to make his way through the world with his quill. I belong to all, I belong to myself, but I do not belong to any school... I do not feel over me any master nor teacher to whom I owe obedience, apart from the eternal laws of good and beauty, to which they tend, even so, in an imperfect manner. I may not be able to keep the form away from the influence of time, but my spirit will remain immeasurable."

Some Lessons About Painting

On December 25, 2012

The vision that takes you out of the patterns is the creation that transforms from feeling to representation.

The painter who wants to enjoy honor must indeed study the haste and natural gestures made by people without thought and springing from the depths of their feeling — mark them on their sketch-book, and then, in their own time, use them, placing a man in the same way, to see how his limbs look in such an attitude. That thing or that face will have the most distinct and precise features, which will be nearest to the eye.

For this painter, putting her hand behind the apprentice, she draws a head seen close up with contoured brushstrokes, also obtaining rough and cruel features, know that you are mistaken, at any distance you will draw this face, wherever it is found, he will have to be well finished, although by removal their contours are lost. So try to paint in such a way that a smoky outline appears rather than harsh and contrasting contours and profiles.

It can therefore be said: for that work that the eye can approach, all the parts of the painting are completed in their details with the greatest diligence. Apart from this, the first ones are finished by the contour, pressed and smooth, and the furthest sinews also finished, but by darker contours — that is, more indistinct or, less pressed: as regards the most distant parts, observe one by one what was said above, that is: the less visible contours, then the limbs, and finally all that is less distinct in face and color.

Do you want to know how the first painting was? Well, the first painting emerged from a feature that surrounded the shadow of the man cast by the sun on the walls.

Leadership: Can the feeling that animates your vision materialize in an art totally different from the initial image where the art of abstraction dominates?

Leonardo Da Vinci was right when he wrote the lines above, specifying that what takes shape in a painting should not be distinguished as a protest against "distance", and should not diminish the reciprocity of feelings between the artist and the viewer of the painting. So, the vision that the painting conveys must prove a certain detachment from other interpretations, a certain continuity from the previous moment captured in the image, so the painting must reproduce that depth of distance characteristic of a landscape or an out-of-the-ordinary portrait, something abstract in bolder colors.

On about that I have to mention something else. The balance between art and painting, especially between brushwork and impregnation, is important if we want to understand the painters' vision from the perspective of those eyes that never sleep, because they are always dreaming of another reality. Now let's assume that pictorial art, seen as an activity of the eyes to perceive contours, images, shapes, particularities of the body, is constituted as a kind of transformation of a figure into another figure, starting from feeling to representation.

In this case, we must take as a starting point the attitude of the man, especially his face or body, because the eyes betray the emotions of the man, while the body betrays the thoughts, the essence of the desires of its owner. In a large number in the same painting, light colors make facial expression (through mimicry and the shape of facial features) convey positive moods, while dark colors convey authority, just as dark red makes you appear assertive or violent. On the other hand, in the painting, the human body presents the particularity of abandoning the immediate reference to man, which is highlighted in that of "man's creation".

The art of abstraction, which accompanies leadership throughout the development of the vision, involves processing the concrete and transforming it into a new product that reflects three properties of a chromatic sensation: chromatic tone, saturation and brightness.

I say this because, just like in art, leadership must unite three main elements: the ability to deduce a general meaning from a few particular strings, the ability to reduce an object or another to a few essential features of it or of the group from which it is part, and the attempt to move your gaze from the outer reality to a so-called inner reality that has never been outlined.

A Few Lessons About Painting I want you to remember. First of all, as Edgar Degas said, in painting you have to give the impression of truth by means of false means.

Then, the painting must contain and convey the tenderness and emotion of positive feelings and must be "read" from left to right, not just from right to left, like a kind of diary, a kind of perpetual invitation to reminisce, as a kind of experiment, a thought exercise, a stimulus and an attempt to turn thought into an event, a force with potential for transformation and change.

Don't forget a valid leadership lesson in the field of art: by moving away, their "contours" are lost.

Special Effects

On March 05, 2016

Learn to build a visual image of all the elements that make up a reality so that what you want to highlight is a huge synergy effect.

The collaboration between the two titans also continues during the synchronized recording of the music. Eisenstein passionately watches the painstaking and of maximum exigency of the composer. The recording is being done in a festive atmosphere. Prokofiev's music amazes and marvels Eisenstein.

Prokofiev works on the recording with an absorbing passion. He starts by inquiring about all the technical problems of the recording. He listens to all the noise-producing instruments the studio has available, including some of them in the score.

For example, for the fragment "The square", along five percussion instruments, there exists denoted in the orchestration also... the bathtub from Mosfilm. He notices the deformations the microphones produce. He solves the problem by using the defects of the apparatus to obtain original effects. Thus, he records the Teutonic trumpets very close to the microphone, amplifying the appearing deformities and this way obtaining a "gigantic dramatic effect". He seeks special effects also through the unusual distribution of instruments, through a "reversed" orchestration, inconceivable in the field of regular symphonic works.

*He attempts solutions – since then universally applied – by placing the orchestra in one studio and the choir in a different one, dosing them afterwards during recording, from the cabin, depending on the dramatic needs of the action.

Leadership: Can you give your creation a content of authenticity so as to amaze the world through the "essence of thinking through contrasts" expressed in a form of accentuation of a detached and receptive state of mind to novelty?

The process of making a composition, whose outlines burst from the random "noises" produced by various cues (instruments, voices, the vibration of bodies in motion, etc.) is much more complicated, nuanced through a series of numerous associations, and refers to the entire scientific, emotion, visionary and creative reserve the director has at his disposal. This process reveals to us the essence of the phenomenon of "thinking through contrasts" – aiming at a carefully selection of auditory inputs, later assembled into a fanciful combination.

Each sound or mix of sounds, everything entering the perimeter of the map of am inventing mind, can be considered a type of "translator" that issues high level instructions in a code which, in order for it to be deciphered, requires an effort of unitary thinking. A good director anticipates the form that the essence of such a special effect order takes before promoting his version of reality through a microcosm of feelings, thoughts, and ideas.

Then, during materialization in different patterns of frequency, with the introduction of certain suggestions, the entire code transforms into a visual image: content and message.

A director whose mood is detached and receptive to novelty knows how to stage as eloquently as possible a scenario that highlights his relationship with a world much wider than the scene of an experiment in which viewers have to relate everything they see on screen with the environment, with other people, rules and meanings. The script should emphasize the very nature of being the director, not only to move the hearts of the audience but to represent the reality of his own existence, his own mind, his own consciousness.

The essence of thinking through contrasts can be found in relation to the things, actions, conditions, events and attitudes that can always be changed according to the causes and effects that lead to changing the framework of representing knowledge that seeking to explain the world.

Only directors gifted with a very good ear for music can capture "extraordinary outputs" from random noises. They are the best at managing to optimize the flux of special effects corresponding to the conditions of perceiving deep and meaningful sounds from the totality of "noises", to validate the various elements of film screenplays.

What makes leadership a kind of cup with an increasingly more comprehensive volume, giving the impression that its own is endowed with supernatural powers, is related to the skill with which are localized and used the "defects of the apparatus to obtain original effects". Thanks to the defects, representing hidden treasures behind noises, echoes, interferences, confusion and distortions, under which is reunited the art of capturing subtle essences, anything and everything takes on a new identity, namely language and unity.

To be able to turn defects of apparatus into the leverage that can move the universe, this is what it means to be a director. To seek special effects through the unusual distribution of instruments, through a "reverse" orchestration, inconceivable in the field of regular symphonic works, this is what it means to be a composer. To be able to translate any defects through purity, serenity or brilliance, activating in people a certain state of mind, this is the quality of a leader.

To give your creation a content of authenticity means to assimilate the idea of "deformation" of the most appropriate medium through which communication is made, with a huge effect of complete realism - capable of putting on a good show.

Special Effects are the most important contribution a director can bring to the world through the apparatus, serving to enrich and add value to his vision.

Spiritual Intelligence

On January 29, 2017

Try to give life a higher meaning, acting in accordance with the experiencing of a present that decides its future through the will of an infinite power.

Caderousse was visibly losing his powers. The bastard Benedetto, who fatally wounded me, he will escape though, he groaned with his last breaths.

- No one will escape, I'm telling you. Like you, Benedetto will also receive his punishment. Like you, he carries deep within his being the seed of betrayal, as the snake carries its venom within it.

- Then, you will also be punished, said Caderousse. Because you have not done your duty as a priest. You should've stopped Benedetto from killing me.

- Me? Said Monte-Cristo with a smile that terrified the dying. Me, to prevent Benedetto from killing you, in the moment you struck your knife into the armor that covered my chest? Yes, maybe if I'd have found you humble and penitent, I wouldn't have let Benedetto kill you. But I saw you arrogant and with a bloodlust, and I let the will of God be fulfilled.

Leadership: What skills should we gain ourselves, or should we make others gain, so that the meaning we give to our own life takes precedence over God?

- I do not believe in God ! – howled Caderousse. And neither do you. You lie... you lie ! I will not repent. There is no God, there is no providence, there is only chance !

- But there is providence, and there is a God, said Monte-Cristo, shadowed by his priestly robe that hid his true identity. And the proof is that you are here, lying in despair, denying Him. Whereas I, untouched by the evil you wanted to inflict upon me, stand before you rich, happy, unharmed, and joining my hands together in the face of this God in which you try not to believe, however believing, in the bottom of your heart.

- Who are you, really, Father? I find that I have met you, once... Why do you let me die?

- Because nothing can save you now, Caderousse, for you are mortally wounded. If you could've been saved, I would've seen in this one last mercy of the Lord, and, I swear on my father's grave, I would've still tried to give you back your life and repentance. *

Leadership: Do you treat reality according to the unique way of seeing things practiced through a form of association with what you do not know, or through the lens of what you already do know?

Always the man who aims to reveal the truths that make up his existence sees himself in relation with all those unknown, of which he is not yet aware of, but to which contributed multiple and varied experiences. And only some of these are fundamental to his becoming. And perhaps that is why the significance of these truths on which human character is based, truths such as "I am not God" or "any evil is punished", have as a margin of appreciation the strength to resist temptations, responsibilities and trials adjacent to circumstances that often prevented you from rising to the height of the potential of a good, soulful, righteous man.

The first unknown is God, whom we do not see, so we might think it does not exist. Another unknown is temperance, which we only take into account when we are in trouble. Another unknown is gratitude or remorse, which we do not give the correct interpretation due to lack of values, lack of thinking, lack of spiritual progress. Many of these unknowns, along with endless questions that seek their answers, represent potential "unfortunates" of relative experiences from the past, expressions of states that have come and gone after a moment of despair or wandering, which have isolated you or made you feel alone for the moment.

But other unknowns, imposed by the variety of protective and providential factors that have conditioned the appearance of exceptional life situations, which you would've have experienced otherwise, are revealed to you in the position of the man who apparently doesn't mean much in the general course of things, but who, from an intellectual standpoint, has the ability to penetrate into the ends of the universe. Where are you in this story?

The ability to rise over what you do not know, born out of the tendency to obey chaining that eventually leads towards that new, privileged state, called by some "spiritual revival", is fueled from the experience of a living that is simultaneously illumination and darkening.

If you treat reality according to the unique way of seeing things, practiced through a form of association with what you do not know, in situations caused by hazard, with a revealing potential, then you will benefit from the experience of exiting the normal accepted by the beliefs that accompany you. And you will experience a new reason: that of existing as an echo of a higher meaning of life. Otherwise, you will perceive yourself as being a victim of life's circumstances.

One of the basic faculties of the leader is that of spiritual intelligence through which he acts and harmonizes with all events (apparently chaotic, absurd) around a universal algebra. Here we perceive God as the savior of an imperfect world, so constantly subject to error, and this God leaves us free will to decide our own fate, but he who lacks faith will surely be lost in a labyrinth called "Chaos", because nothing in his life will acquire the coherence of a destiny capable of defying the inherent ephemerality.

This faculty resides from that continuity of experience suggested by faith, not of knowledge and not of "recommendations" of the moment, therefore, that of the experience that supports the intervention of a reasoning placed higher than your own beliefs in an existential-worldly context, where everything has its pay and reward, causes and effects.

Leadership is largely about controlling the skills you develop in the absence of divine intervention in your life, that is, by exercising free will at the level of what it means to be the true "yourself" in the circumstances of an unexpected ascent.

Spiritual Intelligence, according to the experiencing of a present that decides its future through the will of an infinite power, is assigned to the leader who evolves as a servant of Providence, who has turned faith into the cornerstone of his purpose and existence. Such a man will himself lead the "happening" by unreservedly accepting the force of an unlimited, superior intervention.

Stars Communicate Only With Stars

On October 30, 2010

By exaggerating the importance of mobilizing moments and living in the present, we risk losing the true measure of performance and the virtues that underlie a meaningful existence.

Some individuals "finally" find a preoccupation, more or less conjunctural, but without really excelling in one direction or another. Or these individuals are somewhat like the 7-year-old kid who is very happy to receive a toy, such as a remote-controlled car. As soon as he gets his hands on it, he turns it around, examines it as a work of art, being a super okay alternative to the poor Lego set. Finally, the child experiences intensely the moment of a new beginning.

And the fun begins, a new horizon stretches forward, dreaming of a happy world in a whirlwind of gloomy realities. And just to see the owner of the car so happy, so proud of his toy, as if only he had access to the "unseen face" of a world descended from unattainable dreams. Sometimes he reveals the selfishness and possessiveness in him: "Don't touch my toy. It's mine and mine alone ! " Most of the time, he competes with other children, with other cars...

So, whole days, whole nights, whole weeks, whole months, the 7-year-old is so happy because he has finally discovered an interesting occupation, being so proud, so haughty, so delighted with his new acquisition in front of the other children who also have remote-controlled cars, maybe not as fast as his. The child is left with the car, but not with the knowledge of reaching great heights.

Leadership: Can you balance your energy to go forward permanently, but without letting yourself be guided by it, in such a way as to unleash your potential and maximize your performance in your continuous journey?

At some point in life, I suppose that's how all 7-year-olds are, trapped in a moment that life calls childhood. Only one detail is stubborn not to fit at all in the overall picture. Well, children are rarely attentive to the multitude of conditionings that determine the external reality, they experience the present moment without looking through the bars of reality. Few benefit from the amazing life experience that is subject to a grand destiny.

Children do not take into account that, in time, that car will break down or be thrown in a closet with other toys. They also do not take into account the fact that other more interesting games and activities will appear, such games you can play on your laptop, and as we well know, emotions manifest themselves differently from a certain age. That car is an act of spectacle, a sign of pride to be equal to other well-seen and well-positioned children, next to the scene called WOW (your play is a wow).

And in the end, that car doesn't bring them to any podium, it doesn't teach them anything about life, about all faces of life, it doesn't teach them about art-specific concepts, how science and techniques advance, and it doesn't guide their steps to make the right choices. Life does not teach them anything, until science takes them ahead, and instead of guiding their efforts towards the world of art and technology that in the future could place them on a podium of the great winners, they only limit themselves to experiencing the present moment, in all of its splendor.

Leadership: Does the image you build and display in the world depend on capturing moments that will soon come to pass, or on the amazing experience of reorganizing life from which you have no expectation of it taking you too far ahead?

Well, that's exactly the way it is with some people who think they excel in an activity. They are so happy that they have found a job, as a kind of toy, belonging only to them, something unique that they know how to relate to, to have something to be proud of, right? But, after all, they don't realize that they are just robots that light up like a toy, one that can be replaced with another toy. And how many of them end up creators at a toy factory? How many of them end up being high-performance electric car manufacturers at the Tesla factory?

And, ironically, the one who runs the Tesla car company may never have had a remote-controlled car as a child. Perhaps he was looking insistently at the starry sky after a football game his father took him to from time to time, and he was looking at the starry sky with the terrible prophecy of the astrologer who can predict the future of a car industry without even understanding the basics of mechanics.

The stars speak only with the souls of those who know how to look at them, to listen to them, to see their brightness, and they are closer to an invincible attitude in the face of existential storms. The bold and dreamy man is much more important than a source of fun. And he has the patience for the stars to guarantee his success. The true "Future Hero" is the one who identifies with the stars, the one who knows how to read in every little glow a fulfillment of his prophecy.

And, to get back to what I was saying. There are people who have "finally" found an occupation. This occupation may be their only toy to be proud of, but they may also never know how to drive a brand-new Tesla car that has just left a Tesla factory.

So, be careful what you are proud of, lest you remain a prisoner of a small, endangered world, while someone else becomes the doer of a global, cosmic world. Maybe, however, the stars communicate only with stars...

To reach a high level of leadership, you must benefit from an interweaving of God's plan with your determination to be firm in re-prioritizing things that are fleeting.

The Stars Communicate Only With Stars only when man realizes that he is favored by providence in anticipation of a future that deserves to be experienced only by the brightness of faith to find the truth hidden under the guise of things, or to change the appearance of things that neglect the meaning of the true "target" of life.

Stealing Time

On August 22, 2015

Make a commitment to give life to the hidden aspects of navigating in an undetermined direction, controlling the admissibility of returning to the starting point.

My youthful stage of life represented a strange copy of the one I was about to experience my future in, from a hidden tendency towards researching the analogy between the circuits of the real and unenterable, by agreement with the distribution of my energy of a traveler in the spectrum of finitude.

I was never sure about this déjà-vu phenomenon, of this feeling that I've already experience what had yet to happen, within the limits of a cause for emancipation, in accordance with the margin of error that I've abused – which, tentatively I had assumed fully eventually. "And I know I'm living out of line." I believe that the interest that awakens the memory of the past, the memory of a search for what I have been, which draws attention through the vivid colors of the sentimentality with which I experience every moment of the present, captures the revelation of another reality than that in which I participate through my everyday existence.

Unmistakably. I was influenced by that impetuosity of thought, under the double pressure of the self framed within the conditions of the anterior and the ulterior, through a detachment from the real. I was stirred by the insatiable thirst for self-knowledge of a kind of Francis Bacon in an attempt to create a theory about induction or a method of classification of sciences, only through that fascination for the areas yet unexplored of the humane subscribed to the arbitration of science. Moreover, I gave in to my inclination towards anticipation.

Basically, I was overwhelmed by the obvious pleasure of tasting the rest of privacy, thr hidden parts of my memory springing up as a necessity of thinking in a bright triumph: "I'm stealing time from my own life."

Leadership: Do you want to know the significance of your existence in the revelation of a past that stubbornly stops going by assigning it a certain priority in the context of a permanent confrontation with what is immediately there?

Important was the creation of the moment of tension that was measured in the void. I was entering a film that played out somewhere in front of me, in favor of a past that wanted itself extended in the consciousness of actuality, of the present I kept moving away from, of the future I didn't think of myself capable of reproducing. Without the obvious grief, I was being detached from myself, like a demon, like a fugitive spirit that only enters where it finds an opening for manifestation and expression, among the intellectuality that experiences the darkness and tries to rise to the light.

In a way, I found myself in the shoes of this fisherman from 2000 Leagues Under the Sea. The man sank in the shallow part of the ocean holding his feet on a stone in the shape of a sugar loaf, tied with a boat rope. This was his only tool. Once at the bottom, at around five meters deep, he would fall to his knees and fill his bag with shells collected at random. Then he would climb up, empty his bang, pull up the rick and restarted the operation, which did not take more than 30 seconds.

Specifically, in my mind there was only one of those two alternatives: leaving or staying, going or turning back, outside the normal duration of time, "All the hours that God sends", in a Spartan ignorance of any rational weaknesses – I relied on but one, in the moments in which to others they seemed to be exaggerations or fabrications.

Leadership: Do you put new foundation stones at the creation of a generic "living out of line" creation, performing a certain operation to capitalize on the self-remembrance experience that keeps track of your life?

Even now, my existence carries the significance of a query of the past from which I am trying to figure out what's going on with me on earth. It is a kind of attempt to give a voice to an understanding of the present where I cannot find my place, taking part in the pain, the dissatisfaction or the contradictions of a reality that has dominated me, marked me and loaded my soul, from which I must somehow go out more powerful, more complete, more purified.

Time is an open system of human training, monitoring its evolution from subjective to objective, or vice versa, which is a permanent exchange of data and information with the context in which it is located. As man moves from a lower level to a higher level of knowledge, the way in which he perceives the world and interprets life situations, based on the tendency to control what happens to him, changes absolutely. He begins to see things in the light of scientific concepts, and not only in the light of individual exposures to different factors of success or failure.

Putting new foundation stones at making a creation generically called living out of line, performing, like any system, a certain operation of capitalizing on the self-remembrance experience that follows you all your life, is to take over from your evolution those episodes that you enlighten, inspire, motivate, and adapt to a wider scenario that presumes to the extreme including a complete detachment of the way you are.

Leadership: Do you meditate on your overall significance as a form of travel in time by building a parallel present and re-evaluating a past known only partially due to the organization of memory in an archetypal approach?

When I say that leadership is also a tool for measuring time used with the purpose of building a richer identity, assessed through the formation of the self – framed in the conditions of the anterior and ulterior, actually I am trying to represent the idealistic landmarks that occur within the access to a new experience of using the phenomenon of "déjà-vu."

If you often cling to that sensation that you've already experienced something that hasn't happened yet, due to the insatiable thirst for knowledge, you are already one step closer to that potential of visionary that transforms you from a traveler in the spectrum of finitude into a manipulator of time. The more knowledge reaches deeper levels, the easier it is for you to manage to imagine the fantastic picture as being more real and, as someone said on a blog, the more your lifetime becomes extended.

Memory is based on an archetypal approach when you have the means to rebuild the past into a present that continues to be the subject of preferential examinations of various ways of defining the EGO caught between the adventure of pluri-perspectival knowledge and the grip of emotional challenges.

Leadership takes into account the commitment of man to give a total meaning to the hidden aspects of navigating towards an undetermined direction and returning to the starting point, in a past that he will never be able to separate because his roots are concentrated there.

Stealing Time highlights that existence of man outside of time, obtained through a knowledge of the "déjà-vu" type, born out of play, from exercised creation and imagination.

In order to give added value to leadership you must take into account the "back-and-forth" phenomenon: follow what appears when "it happens that you return", so that you do things better than "last time."

Stop For A Minute (II)

On May 14, 2018

Increase the depth of your art by imagining reality as a great concession to divine authority.

An incessant search for answers to the many questions surrounding the "quasi-figurative" context is rendered eternal in the mirror of an exceptional work, what is left to you, regarding a confession in the deepest realism transfigured through music in pictorial art, whose full reflection of all the mysteries of a time defying its laws, locked in a material density, is the most demanding alchemical knowledge.

Once again, you are tempted to assume a history of God's presence in the world of a stretched easel that awaits its infusion of colors.

Convincing arguments by association with the aesthetics of language subjected to subjectivity, mirrors in which the universe looks at itself from the height of healing sounds: the resonance, the rhythm, the melody, the harmony, the tone, the stamp, taken as the energy of acting of the most intense experiences, are finally included in the order of the optical and mentally-associative exploration of the work of art.

The color green is used to adjust the visual perception of the entire visibility space of consciousness' intentionality. Even you can try !

Authentic leadership involves a deep understanding of the ephemeral nature of life, orienting to essence, not just appearances, and preparing the vision for a destiny larger than immediate boundaries.

What follows is the magnitude of the alchemical elements: matter, space and time, absorbed by a possible representation of God's Eye. The conjunction of two unmeasured stars, that secret down, as a subtle artist would call the process of obtaining the color shades necessary for processing a memorable photo, is a testimony to Victor Hugo's words about the starry transfiguration of an ecstasy in agony, the heavenly breath of the air from heaven:

"Deep hearts, wise spirits, take life as God made it. It is a long trial, a preparation for an unknown destiny that is not understood. This true destiny begins with the first step inside the grave. Then it is revealed before the eyes and eternity can be glimpsed. Think of this word: eternity. But, until then, love and suffer, hope and contemplate. Woe to the one who loved naught but his body, shapes, appearances. Death will take everything away from him. Try to love souls, only this way will you find them again."

Leadership: Do you remember yourself at a moment of inspiration beyond the border between the boundless and the infinite, in an expression of your own identification with the divine plan?

I believe there is a distinct superiority in bringing to the world the rhythms, the images and the sensuality of a lost experience in the memory of the past. You better change your heart in time !

Remember yourself at a moment of inspiration beyond the border between the boundless and the infinite, in an expression of your own identification with the divine plan that came from the art of the painter that you can intuitively create and create the vibrations of the most intense experiences in his paintings. Their direct expression, without appealing to the fireworks of effect, which become immortals of spirituality regarded as a confirmation of the unexpected discovery of a colossal idea, enhances the mystery of a reality that announces a sign of significance within the authenticity of the description of life.

You become the adept of the tonal equilibrium of organizing the configuration of an art stemming from the need for attention from the random – in relation to the rationality of a preference for the slow change of the pure, sensitive and attached visuals to the states of consciousness of the experiences of studying the outer world at the primary level. Influenced by the success of colors on the psychology of feelings, you find yourself in relations of range subtly harmonized as a dominance whose conceptual impact is conditioned by the symbolic function. I rely on your chance to know !

When a writing is gradually defined as self-expression, a conceptual interpretation underlying a new artistic stream, then the magical power of your entire work gets the character of a "tipping point" epidemic that causes major changes in the eternal logos. The divine is the world viewed from above, from a far point, but explored from below, from the depths of expression attributed to the attempt to render a reality from a logic that escapes common understanding. Where are you going to?

The musical arrangements that surround you from the dream dimension, accompanying the interface of a new version of the endless experience of infinity, is like an addictive drug, a graph that stretches over the wilderness, a passage cut from a dense matter, building the idea to formally define an objectual content.

Leadership: Is the effect inserted into your confessions such that it can identify the artist's intention of portraying the destiny of a long life accomplished by modulation of distant minor tones?

The electronic intro complements the energy of the play by referring to another facet of reality, from the artistic area of the meditative confession, to the beginning of a universal philosophy, to the constructions referring to the abstract and the existential conceptual, constituting the result of an empirical reaction in symbolic images.

The landscape of a moment suspended in infinity and an entity characterized by four attributes: height, duration, intensity and stamp. All seem to be detached from the art of the painter who imagines reality differently, as a great concession to divine authority, fulfilling a high metaphysical-idealistic tension in a great work in which the lyric shudders at the great questions of existence and knowledge.

You start to become aware of what you feel in the coordinates of an intrigue loaded with suspense, in the form of a story that flows smoothly, at the same time succeeding to be close to the spirit of legendary characters, almost reaching an intimate relationship with them, as if constituting the secret symbol of an affinity for romanticism: You and I Could feel as once !

The aesthetics of harmony loves to remain open to the painter's desire to place moment by moment, through his work, questions whose answer is hard to utter: What did you come to be now?

The depth leadership has at its disposal is aimed at the art of positively charging the expression of subjective content from the gaps of the faithful representation of the most beautiful clothing that the soul takes on, in the colors perceived by the eye of the perfect artist.

Stop For A Minute and listen to the sound of the music pulsating in the rhythm of your dreams, feel the pure love, the impulse to accomplishment, the mystical shudder, the aesthetic emotion, that sorrow in your life, with which the artist records touches of chromatic and vocal nature, animated by the power to reinvent the language of the universe, and with it, the harsh reality of the world.

Stop For A Minute (I)

On May 08, 2018

The science of experiencing a song is made whole through man's ability to break away from the real to enliven the unreal a little.

A long sonic root is torn from the past and emerges as a spark of giant celestial fire mingled with the artist's various scriptures about origin, destiny and a reality that multiplies the images of a world seen only in white and red, of what is meant to be a comparison between the source of eternal life and the finitude of a work of art.

It spreads among the mirrors of universal memory as an echo of a vibrant masterpiece that astonishes the viewers and makes listeners think, in a promise made to eternity that is constantly beyond all that is ephemeral and fading: "What have you come to be, to be now?" Do you still wonder why the experience of listening born from an inner motivation that finds the ideal means of expression is important?

Chimeric, you hear a voice full of expressiveness in a cloud of star dust, colorful flashes of a tactile sense of rhythm, you meet without wanting a look of a much different world that touches you to the bottom of your heart that seems to want to say: "I'll be protecting you from what you run into." It scares you through the naturalness and authenticity with which a part of a privileged experience is hastily rendered, of a confession that helps you build your own truths in an artistic form that continues its overflow of pure passion. You can believe that part of mine !

The science of experiencing a song is a matter of man's ability to break away from the real to enliven the unreal a little. You know deeply that you have overcome the strand that allows you to achieve the ambitions of a long, captivating thought, an invitation to a mysterious journey into infinity, that secret down, perfectly blending the mastery and the skill of a relentless visionary alternation in a magnificent clarity of harmony between content and form, under the sign of what might be called "the impulse to inspiration".

Leadership: Do you consider that the most coherent approach to a theme from multiple perspectives would be to extend the significance of the quality and value concepts identified in the depth effects of the process of "seeing" separate from that of "understanding"?

Inexplicably, you feel like you are floating around mysterious lights that shine of pure happiness, like a continual transformation into an eternal world, towards the act of creating new horizons of time. Along the line of this area of imagination and poetic language, you find yourself in the form of a story that flows smoothly, while at the same time succeeding in being close to the spirit of characters in Borges' work, almost reaching an intimate relationship with them.

The auditory is seen to be potentially loaded with a double semantic overflow – one to enhance the expression of emotional content and another to reveal the expressive purity of dominant effects by intense and repeated modulations tailored to distant minor tones. Press Repeat and Open your eyes again to recognize yourself as being someone else in another story frame.

Locked in a certain material density, the variations born out of the prolongation of sounds in a text full of crafty words, crooked and inspired at the same time, are designed in such a way that any of them can become the music of a movie. Each piece is a universe. Each music is an adventure fitting of a story.

The artist exposes the differences between seeing and looking, between perception and true archeology of the image, in a universe whose story is related to the chromaticity of a photo or the personalization of a video, applying uniform and gradual filters. He sees the final picture of a separate building to understand its role and its use in favor of the chosen theme.

First you compose the song (remembering a picture), then you write the lyrics.

When Michelangelo bought a white Carrara marble block abandoned after the failure of other sculptors, he visualized the model of a separate ideal man to assign him the biblical theme of David's victory.

"Seeing" means believing in the virtue of a fabulous achievement, while "understanding" means to decipher or reveal what is hidden beyond a general impression.

Leadership: Can you reveal the importance and originality of an image that moves freely around a "frozen" action over time, through the imagination that enlivens a vast curiosity about life?

And if all the sounds and frequencies are tightly bound in the universe, then the letters transposed into words form a galaxy, a form of organization of matter moving in space and time, when everything is strange. Every song plays, imaginary or real, a certain scene of life, the cause of a future nostalgia or future haunting, another decoration of the mind that seeks its meanings on the verge of refusing to see the truth given by God. Try not to lose your own !

It is said that the famous American engineer, Washington Roebling, suffered an accident immediately after the Brooklyn Bridge. Everyone thought he had renounced his work. Being disabled, all that remains for him is to follow with a telescope the progress made on the bridge's construction, from the last floor of the building he lived in.

Writer Paul Auster said of Roebling: "The most remarkable thing was that the entire bridge was literally in his head: each piece was memorated down to the tiny pieces of steel and stone. And even if he never put his foot on the bridge, it was already inside him, as though, after so many years, that structure had grown somewhat inside his body."

Every engineer hits a barrier that strongly supports his vision before building a bridge. Thus, every artist faces doubt. What do you prefer to know that you are: a creator of matter or an explicative model of its nature?

Leadership is given by the creator who believes in the virtue of a fabulous achievement, while revealing what is hidden beyond a general impression.

Stop For A Minute is a gentle effort to reflect on the composition of a theme that gives value to an image that many do not notice, or look at it without wondering what it expresses.

Strange Personality

On October 09, 2017

In confronting yourself, you can only be victorious if the truths you are reporting are not blurred by the acute sense of a guilty conscience.

I have everything in me, scattered, unanswered, from a knowledge that only God understands, which doctors could diagnose wrongly as a nervous system disorder that cries or screams of despair. A knowledge that the saints would take as self-condemnation, an idea that should not be encouraged, being dismissed from the outset as unfounded.

But one that artists, tried by the battle between lights and shadows, in which there is always a middle way to combine the two opposites, giving roundness to the figures, welcomes it with respect as valid in its own originality.

When you try to understand yourself, like an artist involved in a crazy project, taking on an existential and creative bet, recovering the questions and answers lost within you, you are loading your imagination and the reality of the presence of an obstacle called: bias. This explains the anxiety, the fever, the agitation of the soul.

A true leader, like a visionary architect, integrates into his vision the levels of manifestation of his thoughts to build a harmonious whole, refining every detail to its essence.

Vulnerable in the direction of natural imaginations, the measure of which goes beyond the neurotic disposition, in the direction of minimal resistance to nerves, unrelated to the gentle comparison between empirical and illusory reality, I feel with all the warmth that sweet show of the dream made by the lucidity of a fantastic mind. A small confession of a thought of the Creator, where the impossibility reigns, leaving his original replica footprints at all levels of manifestation.

Only a pencil trail achieves a sublime surprise of the state of chaos inside, where the struggle for an art oriented towards a construction of life begins and where resignation ends in the face of pure reason. Hidden identity that I take, stuffed in a trembling inside is an implicit self-condemnation to hell to see my little own limits, feeling like an orphan, alone in front of nothingness.

Leadership: Can you ensure the relevance of your own self-exploring experiences to clarify the meaning of confidentiality, as the message of your art will be deepened in the consciousness of a reasonable observer?

The unknown that is preparing the written word for a long time is the experience of a misdirected assumption, the starting line of a troubled race under a cloudy sky, a gesture of utopian performance with many meanings, an overwhelming search for the Mystery that will once again be revealing tensions, restlessness, negative impregnations, and blockages, like the depth of an agonizing gap.

Finally, here I am, the model of the consciousness charged with the power with which the Divine Force endowed me from birth, to my heart's content, but not according to the rules of coherent reason that guides you only after what the mind can explain.

To reason is added a coherent and well-defined vision for the future, modeling the rules explained with the help of art related to the Divine consciousness, the power of my creative power, starting from the heart and uniting with the mind so full of ideas, but not programming. Here I am, finally, endowed with the mind lusting for the gift of being elevated to the rank of a creative experience, but trapped in a blockage called "confidentiality", that is, the inability to give the world more than the heart can bring to the foreground of a spiritual awakening.

Confidentiality is a confession of an intense and profound life experience, by reference to a transcendent "esoteric", taking inspiration from a strong motivation coming from another level of reality. A level that can be produced profound changes moral, psychological, spiritual or intellectual in an imaginative interpretation, such as: "I feel touched by a mystical shiver."

Leadership: Do you want to have some pertinence for thinking promoted as an indulgence of the psyche and spirit in the middle of an art that finds its correspondence within a monologue of a particular existential poetics?

I have always considered the symbolism of the creation of the great writer Victor Hugo, who has always dedicated a monologue to the being absent or present in the great spiritual Whole, appealing to the conceptualized or oblivious emotions, a monologue about the poet's isolation in the world of his thoughts. I do not cease to deepen my thoughts as I would refer to the greatness of divine creation, adopting a technique of rendering the importance of art through a symbolism of surrounding things and, above all, through a surprising affective communication with the landscape of a scorching sun, a mountain peak, or a beautiful fairy tale.

A great writer is like a brilliant artist who, by dedicating his time to the formation of emotions in the uniqueness of color, must first isolate himself in a monologue addressed to posterity, far from the various objectified values that eliminate his presence from the whole new light of the ensemble of creation, destroying any communion with God. Color is the heroic struggle of a soul that can withstand all half measures.

Recognizing that next to man's right, or at least near it, is the right of the soul, Hugo has focused all his power of mind to the mysterious ways of the natural stages of the deepest existence, of good will, of spiritual life, of Providence, this long line is the only rhythm of its realities. In his opinion, at the core of every phenomenon there is always a law and a personality:

"Crushing fanaticism and the deep respect for infinity, that's what the law is following. Let us not limit ourselves to worship the tree of creation and to contemplate its huge branches full of stars. We have a duty: to process man's soul, to defend the mystery against miracles, to admire the incomprehensible and to reject the absurd, not to admit from what cannot be explained only what we need, to heal faith, to remove the superstitions of religion, to cleanse God of caterpillars."

Leadership: Are you able to judge yourself by the rhythm of thinking and the degree of understanding of each limitation that gives you its own power of appreciation of the interpretive art, along with "ingenium"?

If someone judged me only on the rhythm of thinking and the degree of understanding of each limitation, along with ingenium, and not after the doings of fidelity to the ideal equilibrium, accepted as a value in itself, autonomous, pleading for the imaginative freedom of the artist, he probably would feel worthy and free to create a law. To tie together "yes" and "no" as he likes. The yes of a good conscience toward God and the No of a lucid criticism, of a nonconformist mind.

But first he must have some pertinence for thinking promoted as an indulgence of psyche and spirit to judge good and evil, distinguishing them by what you witness on behalf of something greater than yourself. A pertinence that, in my opinion, everyone must try to experience in the face of truths revealed by this chapter of life, afferent to the level of artistic maturity: Destiny Coherence or "To be nobody but yourself."

The mistake that can constantly bring you down has as a defining characteristic the tendency to judge its own background "exception", raising it to the rank of cause. But without knowing, without having the patience of understanding, without passing through the filter of consciousness and psyche the aspects that push you to draw conclusions quickly. Here, we must remember the term "ingenium", denoting the immense talent of an artist, who has become a writer, who has the patience and duty to evaluate himself according to the monologue he builds around the perennial beauty of art.

The power of appreciation of the interpretive art lies in the expressiveness of the creation that you can raise to the rank of consciousness by the presence of the lyrical monologue addressed to a character that intrigues or fascinates you, reflected in the form of appeals to posterity.

According to Wikipedia, in the lyrical genre the artistic vision and transfiguration dominate, the author resorting to allusive and associative techniques, creating a universe of great suggestion force that addresses the reader's sensitivity.

Strange Personality has the meaning of a conclusion to what happens to you when you are placed in the difficulty to judge your own authenticity, limits, qualities, values, and reality. Your reaction against any below expectations can be either from indifference to an explosion of emotion overpowering one like "I am surely wrong" or simply "I cannot believe it."

In confronting yourself, you can only be victorious if the truths you are relating to are not blurred by the acute sense of consciousness.

Sun For Your Harvest

On March 13, 2010

Enhance your power of conviction, by conferring your leadership the meaning that others are envisioning.

The French writer George Sand was so overreached by the works of a German composer, that she hastily made an opera libretto for him.

But the musician didn't know a word of French, so that – being unable to feel his way in the text – put even the indications of direction (instructions) on the notes.

Thus, it happened that, at the end of the first act, the chorus of villagers sang, on the allegro of a German dance:

"The crowd exits through the back door,

The crowd exits through the back door…"

From that moment on, George Sand gave up music forever. [1]

Leadership: Do you practice accepting yourself while accessing a certain version of the others' requests?

Leadership applies like a consensus between what you say and think when you inspire a certain feeling, a certain attitude, suggesting a certain invitation towards what you perceive differently. Altogether, it involves a certain radical change of what you are, of the way in which you communicate a novelty. Is an art of the way in which you manage to accomplish a transformation of the concrete, reshaping yourself in the context of a reception block of what others expect of you.

A kind of confusion and uncertainty to access a certain version of the others' requests – hard to fulfill, that condition an important part of your professional success. Others' high pretenses are an extension of the way in which you present yourself and experience yourself in relation to what you can take upon yourself through knowledge, through authentic art consumption, but especially through control actions over the "uncertainty" that can attenuate the fear of failure.

Everything that represents you as an artistic human, crossing the training and transformation stages that produce a certain resonance in relation to others, a reciprocity that doesn't let anyone down in its expectations, should fit in a way to the "theme" submitted by others.

The theme targets the way in which you pass something on, a fast and simple way to give a professional aspect of your experience, but through which your way of thinking, your attitudes towards yourself and others are evaluated.

Openness through dialogue towards new horizons of perception, representation, and interpretation of reality must function as a combination between what represents you as an "artist" and what the public accepts as being their equivalent. Self-acceptance is an undertaking of the mistake of not having proposed a viable alternative to the sense of depth of composition that you try to organize and value in an absolutely personal manner.

Leadership: Do you express your vision by taking into account the meaning that you give to your words, starting from the fact that every experience you live is an opening to accepting a way of being different?

Often, even people who don't know you are able to say a lot about you, based on simple observation. Your true leadership skills emerge when you publicly express your vision, opinions, ideas and feelings. Your success as a leader depends on how you manage to make yourself understood, attract others' attention, but especially if you are fully in line with what they want, with their reality, requirements and expectations.

Just like a child recites lines learned by heart, without knowing that the line is composed of words, that every word has a precise meaning, so some leaders express their vision, ideas and thoughts, without taking into account the meaning that they give to their experience, activities, words, messages they send in relation to people's expectations and needs.

The meaning you give to your words represents new possibilities of "modulating" the beautiful through correlations or convergences with your other values, such as creativity, communication, understanding, without turning them into redundant "assets".

Leadership: Can other people to penetrate the meanings and the modalities of expression of your art, inspired by a "line" of your own composition?

Leadership means to create a relationship for the benefit of both you and others. The way your leadership evolves depends on the way you make yourself understood and if you manage to convince people of your abilities. The way you express your points of view influences their perception of you and the manner they should organize their work.

Everything depends on the background with deep meaning that lies on your leadership. In other words, what people expect from you might be the exact opposite of what you offer to them. So, enhance your power of conviction by conferring your leadership the meaning that others are envisioning.

Add credibility to your leadership, trying to meet people's expectations, making them understand what your leadership expresses. So adapt to their reality before imposing them your own vision.

The verse of your own composition must suggest that exit from a frame of experience, without having to change your horizon and vision over the field in which you work.

Sun for your harvest serves to designate the leadership that promises quality and performance, the message of which does not digress backwards. If the meaning you give your vision will coincide with people's expectations and will be correct, undistorted and functional, then your leadership will bear fruit, flourish and develop harmoniously.

Just as flowers turn to the sun as it moves across the sky, so people will turn to you depending on what you offer to them and according to the perception of the meaning your leadership bears.

Conclusion: A professional leader expresses himself clearly, unambiguously and without leaving room for interpretation. It resembles a sun that fosters the growth and the development of living beings on Earth. They say that "we pick what we sow", meaning that we befall in vain of the sun, if the seeds are of inferior quality and they don't bear fruit. Therefore, the quality of the "harvest" depends both on the sun and... the seeds.

The Supreme Guiding Of Leadership

On June 21, 2011

Give a mobilizing impetus to people, by expressing those feelings that correspond with your values and horizons.

On March 16, Akihito, the Emperor of Japan, in a televised speech described as "unprecedented". Reuters said he was extremely concerned by the nuclear crisis and urged people to help each other.

With a very sober mime, Akihito, aged 77 years, said that the problems at the Fukushima's plant nuclear reactors have been impossible to predict.

"I hope from the bottom of my heart that, hand in hand, people will treat each other with compassion and will overcome these difficult times ! " said the Emperor of Japan, who urged his fellow citizens not to lose hope. Akihito also said that he prays that every victim of the earthquake and tsunami could be saved." *****

Leadership: Do you tend to use the "guarding" function to the extreme, in the case of an exit from the partial limits of the right to act at your own will?

The attitude that the leader adopts towards what represents him as a hero and as a model of moral resistance, exerting a highly suggestive influence at the level of event, is filled with different echoes. These echoes reflect on his image", but also on the other links of his value's amplification chain as a source of positive thinking.

The role of initiator for an important cause that requires not only broad support, but also funds allotted to superiority, falls on the person who benefits from certain exclusivity in tracing the guidelines of high-society. He recognizes the importance of life and the way in which each of us can contribute to enhancing its quality, but first and foremost he must be able to defeat his own barriers, his own troubles with respect to setting himself apart of what others can't change.

Your intention to make a change begins and ends where you are conditioned to obedience and obedience. In such a situation, you can no longer act as you please, but by a sudden activation of emotional states such as anxiety, sadness or guilt, under the influence of situations that can make it easier for you to be locked into a defeated position.

Difficult times are the answer given to the honor of carrying to the end a duty that commands you to do a much more painful thing than to die, namely, to live with the pain of leaving behind what you have built.

Putting leadership in an objective and realistic light, conscious of his own duties, treating him as a personal matter and not as a significant mission, actually means to be conscious of yourself and of the acceptance of what you can control.

Be conscious of the possibilities that await ahead, but also of the limited time that you have available to change something which makes you responsible.

A leader has to be supported along his mission which requires bravery, big efforts, a lot of perseverance and causes him anxiety, worries and enough stress. So, it is compelled to align more in the direction of forces contrary to its own expectations. But out of which he can extract the benefits of an authentic emotion which, unexteriorized, would remain mute, making him see in a whole new light what he has lived until then. That happens only in moments of great pressure and great impact.

Using the "guarding" function to the extreme actually means to serve others or a great purpose when you're at a crossroads, without omitting your true responsibility towards your own self, towards your own conscience and intelligence, towards the action that conforms to them.

Leadership: Are you approaching the fulfillment of your purpose, reconsidering what defines you as a reaction to the confrontation with yourself?

Someone once said: "I care what you think, but I care even more to believe in something and to organize your plans according to that thing."

The Emperor Akihito put all his trust in his fellow citizens. They must believe in him more than ever, and to organize their plans and actions in response to his message. The unit was paramount priority at that time, on it depended the success of the whole process of rebuilding the country.

Just as scientists love science for the good part resulting from it and its practical applications for the benefit of humanity - so people will support you in your efforts for your character, for your morality, for your good side, for your decisions you make in their benefit and for their support. The message you send it is crucial to strengthen co-operation. You must communicate a feeling, an emotion, an idea that can be understood and accepted by others with complacency, with enthusiasm and faith, leading them to engage in an effective partnership and to align at the priorities that are really necessary.

At a time when the concern weighs on the whole nation, Akihito, Emperor of Japan, convinced the citizens not to lose hope.

His words were reactions of consciousness, designating virtues such as responsibility, justice, wisdom, compassion. But at the same time, they were a version of reality: "I refuse to regard myself as a helpless victim of fate." They had as an important element a fundamental renewal presented as a quality of self-image that meets certain expectations and which recommends it as a protagonist of the struggle for honor.

Leadership: Are you really worthy of what you have to do even when the background of your vision darkens under the effect of a constraint of integrity?

Even if you have doubts about success, you must always strive to find a "foothold" from which to cling and to argue it with interest in your efforts if you want people to be with you. Your mission as a leader is to your guide and to exploit your capabilities to the benefit of those around you. Give a mobilizing impetus to people by expressing those feelings that correspond with your values and horizons.

Imagine a runner being at the starting-block. He is ready for the sound of the gun, concentrated at maximum to the finish line located at one hundred meters away. He knows that only the top finishers are awarded. He knows that if he will lose a millisecond, will return home without medal. There should be no thoughts of doubt and to spurt rapidly to the sound of gun.

In leadership things are just the same as at a hundred meters race. You have to orient your thinking, vision and vibration to the "finish line" getting in this way to the hearts of people, without wasting valuable time on doubts and fears. You must be guided by the sense of responsibility, fairness, by calling of your soul to fulfill a common goal.

Integrity means to be aligned with the highest moral values even when you face the risk of losing your authority.

Supreme guiding of leadership is the faith that you, as a leader, must instill to people, a belief that will help them morally to overcome difficult situations. It is the hope that you plant in people's hearts. But you have to analyze beliefs underlying on their values before instilling them trust and guiding them towards the serious way of their attempt.

Survival Mission

On March 11, 2009

Help people externalize things they hide in themselves, without falling under their power.

On New Year's Eve, a man was sitting in a bar, looking at his cup of drink. He was sitting like that for over half an hour, when a brawler truck driver comes near him, takes his drink and drinks it up.

The man starts crying, and the driver tells him:

- Come on now, I was just kidding. Calm down, I'll buy you another drink. I simply cannot stand to see a man crying.

- But that's not why I am crying. This is the worst day of my life. First, I overslept and got late to work. My boss got furious and fired me. When I left the building to get in my car, I discovered that it had been stolen. The police said they could not do anything. Having no choice, I took a taxi back home. After I got off the taxi, I realized that I forgot in it my wallet and my credit cards, but it was too late. I went into the house and, when I got into the bedroom, I found my wife in bed with the gardener. Eventually, I left home and entered this bar. And, just when I was thinking to end my life, you have appeared and have drunk my poison.

Leadership: Does the image with which you present yourself in the world change its angle of view as it passes from one person to another, without taking into account anything other than your own unavailability to attach yourself to something destined to change?

The goal of a leader is to lead people, and for that, he must produce a noticeable change in their lives. His impact is even greater as people's change is more significant. The biggest problem is that, if you do not know when and how to intervene in people's lives, you may have a surprise – to get a strong strike below the belt. Namely, instead of you changing them, they will end up changing you. You may suddenly wake up in a position of subordination, while others take full control over your destiny.

Do you let your guard down when you expand your influence? Do you want to get in the truck driver's place, which had alone "poisoned" himself because of his unexpected involvement in people's lives?

When you aim at the people's core, when you intervene in their lives, make sure to never let your guard down, to never turn into a victim of your own ridiculous excesses of interference into their lives. Before sending them your own vision, first strive to deeply understand their essence. You will fall under their power if the impact of your leadership does not precede a very good understanding of the feelings filling their lives.

Help people externalize things they hide in themselves, without falling under their power of influence. The viewing angle of your image corresponds to the plans of the people around you when what displays your personality (especially the physiognomy of your face) agrees with their aspiration, their status, their preferences for change.

Just as a doctor, who faces a patient whose disease he can't determine, reads avidly about it, looking for reports of cases of other patients with similar symptoms – so you, when you deal with people whose feelings, thoughts, psychological conditions you can't determine or you haven't understood very well, must resist the desire to suddenly create an impact in their lives.

Try to restrain your urge to enter unexpectedly in people's lives, until you feel confident enough about what they are feeling.

The Survival Mission expresses metaphorically the dimension of your leadership. Having an impact in people's lives means knowing how to respond to their attack; you must conceal your intention, and on other occasions, you simply must not involve at all. Your leadership can turn into a threat even against you and can drain all your power if you follow those decisions that have an offensive character / with a boomerang effect.

Conclusion: Your superiority in leadership depends largely, on one side, on the leader's tact and tactics to establish relationships, on the other side, on people's "quality" concerning their level of understanding, receptivity to change and how much they are "anchored" in reality. The work of a leader in terms of adult education is sometimes very difficult. He must have appropriate methods to change their thinking and mentality. Any unexpected intervention can result in total failure.

Sustain People's Effort

On January 04, 2009

Try to exercise constant control over the reality you live with, so that the efforts to respond to its demands can reach the level of excellence.

More than a year and six months ago I have finished writing my first book. It's called "Leadership for Dummies", and took me almost seven months to write it. I have never written a book or worked at a newspaper or magazine, so I had no experience in writing. That's why I offered a book to six persons, a book for each one, who were quite important persons, who I known and who where having high level jobs in different institutions and famous companies in Romania. I asked them to send me a feedback about the quality of the paper. I knew there were a lot of aspects that I had to improve, a lot of things that should be modified or things that should be added.

Do you know how many persons helped me?

None. That much they were disinterested in me, in my efforts and my realizations. My luck was that I had an intuition from the start that nobody would even bother with my paper and this is why I didn't even put too much hope in their help. But I had to convince myself that my intuition regarding human psychology is working well.

Leadership: Could you expand your horizons beyond what you think are your limits as to make known your personal value beyond the price you have to pay?

A lot of people are making a lot of effort to realize valuable things, and in the end they have to take at least one difficult decision. If you don't encourage them, if you don't sustain them moral when they most need you, you will never succeed in becoming a true leader. If you really want people to esteem you, you have to show them that you sincerely are interested in their faith, their career and their realisations.

Many years ago, the American philosopher William James was saying: "The most profound principle of human nature is the thirst of being appreciated." Appreciate people's efforts, sustain them when they doubt and wake their enthusiasm when they are desolated. If you want to create an enviable reputation and if you hope to become an efficient leader, you have to learn to be more generous with people, especially with those who believe in you and have the hope that you will help them.

The price I paid was to continue to find reasons for planting a tree where I think it is appropriate, not where every cottage has its own. The tree did not suddenly grow up a lot and did not make fruit almost in the early years. But it has developed strong roots that have given it strength and self-confidence when it has reached its height. It anchored me, giving me an edge and meaning of life.

Leadership: Are you able to think BIG in terms of a value obtained from nothing?

The true magic of a leap to a whole new level is to be able to think BIG from the point of view of a value obtained from nothing. You practically start with the end and then do everything you need to get to it. This principle is best expressed by writer Roger Dawson:

The Cadillac automobile company once made an ad worth seeing again even after one hundred years.

It began in black and white and showed a young man dressed in a golf suit in the 1930s, being the boy who gathered the balls in a very elegant and exclusive club. He gathered the golf clubs and put them in one among the first models of Cadillac. A voice offscreen said: "You'd known ever since that one day you will be driving a Cadillac."

Then the image suddenly became colorful and I saw the young man, who had grown up in the meantime, coming out of the same club in his bright, brand new Cadillac.

Your value is not given by the experience you are experiencing, namely the inability to overcome a gulf of favors you never gain, but the power to believe in the ability to build a staircase allow you to reach the heights you desire.

The second lesson you have to learn, if you want to step a stair up in your career is this: "Don't put all the eggs in one basket." As many times you confront a problem, a situation in which you need help, it is good to not count on the help from a single person, because you might have a surprise. This why it's important that in every situation to have prepared a plan B.

You probable know how things are in our country. Who hasn't high level relations or who hasn't enough money to appeal at a specialist, a step forward can be made with a lot of difficulty. With some rare exceptions it's possible that nobody will help you, so you have to manage yourself, without counting on the other people help. Don't forget that for the most talented leaders any problem can hide a new challenge. And the biggest challenge is to confront your problems with optimism and to get over them.

Leadership is the responsibility of assuming reluctance from those around you, believing that the reasons that push you forward are more important than the weights that pull you back.

Sustainable Leadership

On September 28, 2015

Strive to constantly generate new frames from several angles, through a speculation of your own mind.

Eisenstein sees cinema not only as a continuation of theater, but as a denial of it. He enters cinema considering it as a yet nonexistent field. The great director would later recall:

"We came as Bedouins or seekers of gold to a place with unimaginably huge possibilities, from which only a small sector had just been developed. We have secured our tents and introduced within the camp our experiences in various fields. Intimate concerns, accidental profession from the past, un-assumed skills, unexpected eruditions – all of them were channeled towards building something that was yet to have written traditions, neither precise stylistic forms, and not even formulated demands."

*Later, this intolerance will burn out. We shall find, apart from a strong influence of theater in his cinematic art, even a late comeback to his first live: theater. And in his pedagogical work, he will declare: "The study of cinema must always begin with the study of theater."***

Leadership: Do you see the fusion between science and art as a continuation of the approach of experiencing new directions of orientation, or as a denial of any expressible content through visual effects?

The production capacity of new lines of montage, frequently encountered during the period of relating to an ideal that must be assumed and asserted, of course, in a form that later allows for substantial improvements, is an important trait of the director. The one who seeks and observes this trait in a man of great culture, will never object the stylistic procedures that take into account the true aspect of his work, but will calculate the information transmitted on an evaluation criteria plan of an experimental content resulting from events, attitudes, contrasting situations that create surprise of overlapping visual plans.

Denying expressible content through visual effects means not having memorable moments used as a showroom to produce novelty effects. And to experience new directions in film or theater is to continue a story from the moment prior to the experience you want to convey to the world – so you can always relive it.

Montage is a process of joining together several frames from as many angles as possible, dominated by complex themes of research completed in a product of reference – an excellent support of information gathered over time. But the informational material forming the content of various frames has in no way the claim of exhausting the issue, so ample, in the face of which are found the innovating initiatives of today. Because there will always be new means of transmitting experience and knowledge.

These frames are in fact targets that need to be reached, extensions of your intellectual and cultural horizon, encompassing the concept of the world and life that invites others to know you. They are answers to the questions you ask yourself, synthesized in your own vision.

Leadership: Can you support emotions with the support of an image representation that is not a rehearsal of a vision from a reality simulated by an exceptional screening?

The expressible content integrates everything you are willing to show to the world through your own vision. Who never reveals his vision in a way that will inspire, will never receive feedback, and thus, will fail to clarify his doubts concerning what he has accomplished, gained and achieved through knowledge and self-investigation.

But in leadership, vision must not be detached from within a reality simulated by an exceptional screening, but must fit into a logical, ingenious and plausible dialogue. Film is not a fixed landmark, and vision must not necessarily be something "dazzling" to the world. What counts is the emotion translated into an ideal image that meets the basic requirement to achieve a particular purpose.

Within these frames is inserted everything that comprises a reforming thinking, in the form of people, things, processes, ideas, situations, relations between different entities and so on and so forth. With respect to leadership, we can consider these frames as figments of the creative spirit, as patterns of cognition, interpretation, and presentation, of selection, an enhancing of directions of orientation directed towards gaining the skill of manipulating certain aspects of reality.

Without a doubt, some of the elements subjected to the discussion also involve other possibilities of interpretation than those found here.

A leader who views the fusion between science and art as a continuation of the approach of experiencing new directions of orientation, will discover or permanently generate new such frames, through a speculation of his own mind. Especially through a tight knitting of his own life with the subjective meanings he associates with the world and the entire society.

Leadership is the image you convey to the world as a result of the experiences of life with which you have enriched your emotions and the science with which you knew how to capitalize on their beauty.

Leadership becomes Sustainable through the frames produced by the artist through self-investigation. That is, when he channels all his intimate concerns, accidental professions from the past, un-assumed skills, unexpected eruditions – to build something original, a concept, a product, a unique active that can express his ideas, vision, and may continue throughout time.

Sweet Harmony

On January 25, 2016

Try to present yourself as a new world, through an intense process of interaction with a different knowledge.

If you promise to not mention this to anyone I will share a secret with you, the magic lamp of my own raison d'être, the essence of rediscovering that part of me that is eternal. For only through an unexpected confession, pushed outwards by the power of living mental imagines, arranged on the nodes of a different model of reception, can I get to meet myself in the corner of someone much more important. Is it right or wrong?

I turned myself into the priority of the world, what no longer represents a destination so to speak, because now the world became my priority, my abyss if I stand on the edge of a barrier with my eyes closed. Like a painter who seeks inspiration in a drawing full of accuracy and rigor, thus, without retouching, so does my personality seek its goal in creating a visual identity meant to deepen a complete experience of revealing a part of my being, yet unknown. I was like one of Stephen King's characters who goes beyond the limits of the imaginary universe, provided he simultaneously lives a different life, a spiritual one, deeper than he would be capable of.

Sometimes I imagine myself as a dusty library where the elders sit and read old manuscripts indefinitely, as far away from everything that presents itself as a straight line, without twists. Where the battle between myth and truth, developed on the support of an a priori knowledge for obtaining a self-reflexive victory, fuels the mirage of an unprecedented existential equation.

Thus, I manage to portray myself as a new world, a novel written through an intense process of being lost in another being, in an energy of the same frequency. No, it can't be wrong.

Leadership: Can you turn yourself into an image with a hint of a work of art by referring to a personality that stands out through the significance given to a world that is contoured inside, whole in its manifestation?

It is true that I don't like anyone digging inside of me and finding my truths, like a treasure hunter does, like Heinrich Schliemann, who in his search for gold discovered the traces of the legendary ancient Greek city of Troy. But certain phenomena whose effects can be neglected because of the lower frequencies, begin to manifest themselves increasingly stronger, positively influencing the perception of their importance.

I express my thoughts, desires, dreams about the mysticism of a communion with that consciousness of intellectual destiny attracted and devoured by the mirage of a glittering, imperial, forbidden world, as an opportunity to find some unexpected answers about myself. Not just empty words / For a week or two. An image with a hint of a work of art is like the existence of a well-proportioned inner fire, it has something in common with a reality that is beyond that perceived by other people, and is never consumed.

Interesting how Maurice Leblanc began one of his works: "Have you ever thought of the original and unforeseen aspects from the link of certain beings that haven't known each other a day before, and who, for a few days, between the endless sky and the immense sea, will live life in its most intimate of chains, will face the wrath of the ocean together, the frightening assault of the waves and the sly calm of the quiet water?"

A personality that stands out by the significance given to a world outlined in its entirety in manifestation, is an artist of the brush who reveals his knowledge by creating a reality different from everything experienced up to that point.

Leadership: Are you looking for a new self-content spread between the two extremes: "Spinning round and round" and "Made the same mistakes"?

To develop a new model of personality, that will meet the basic function of leadership – that of differentiation, you need to start from the correlation and parallelism between what you know and what you find out by exposing this knowledge. A sort of confession that ends with the deduction of new truths about yourself.

Whenever I tried to reconfigure my vision of what I am and what I will become, by compiling conclusions vis-à-vis the effects of the efforts of finding new truths about myself and applying them in a new experience, I basically made a comparison with someone else, with a different knowledge that could permanently update the quality of my thinking.

I feel a great restraint to accept anything from it, from this furious world that I image as a sort of ship driven by waves, against the will of the crew, in all directions. The Titanic is the metaphor of a room of history, suggesting the continuous cycle of the world caught between "Spinning round and round" and "Made the same mistakes."

Same with treasures. They are always hunted indifferent of where they are and how hard it is to get there, but they eventually end up being hidden again. It's a kind of running in circles, isn't it, a mistake repeated endlessly, because man fails to break away from what he cannot master, or fails to understand what can fulfill him. Let there be no doubt / We should sort things out.

The whole world, with its contrasting shadows, becomes an apparent convention between a sum of events, simple or hard, with the sole purpose of hiding the effects of a secret expressed through the relationship between the interesting and the authentic.

Man is interesting through his very composition, but only the course of his life lived through someone else is authentic. The wise prove to be weak and powerless in the face of this invaluable discovery that time hides under the mantle of the surprising, which is sometimes revealed by a writer and is shaped by life a thousand times over.

Leadership is the vision extracted from the effects of efforts to learn new truths about yourself, applied in an experience of the type: "we have become part of a world in which the creator and the created are mistaken for one another."

Sweet Harmony is a reflection of your inner order by relating to the knowledge of others. If you want to bring the revelation of a unique truth, try to portray yourself as a new world through an intense process of interaction with a different knowledge. We play a part in a greater scheme. Let's come together / Right now, oh yeah ! In sweet harmony !

Take A Good Look At What Your Eyes Are Saying

On April 16, 2020

Big ideas rarely sprout, and some even step on them, or simply pass by carelessly.

There is a special relationship between me and nature, two active presences influencing each other, as intense as the artist creates a painting about the beauty of nature on a canvas so delicate that you are almost afraid to touch it with hands untrained by the privileged means of art. For example, here I am now looking with much love, with much sense of soul, at this leaf full of life, in the shape of a heart, which a skilled painter would capture in the guise of a muse, a symbol of a periodic renewal, a product of a lyrical sensibilities.

And it speaks to me in a strange voice, like a mature man, and I listen to it intensely, with an artist's spirit, and we both get along wonderfully in a masterpiece by the creator called Arynexisthes, or the bait of a higher reality. Perhaps all this penetration of mine into nature, seen as an emotional engagement in a symbolized universe, is only the consequence of a play of light and shadow in a labyrinth of poetic crowds, in an indefinable and indescribable pluralism. Or maybe I'm a captive to a sui generis reality on the edge of reality in the realm of a dream called life.

The act of transferring the senses from an artist's eye to a look at nature, perceived in pictorial matter, is therefore an act of symbolic conversion in two directions: first I must capture such a profound and subtle reality in an astral second, so as to render it as a center of the universe, then I must channel my artistic vital force into the subtlety of a message with great power to evoke the outpouring of divine light in the ambiance of the mysterious sphere of force of planet Earth.

Leadership: How do you argue your belonging to the sphere of reality in the space of creation, in terms of the transfer of senses from an artist's eye to a view of nature?

At the same time, the leaf can be the expression of an art that draws its origin from the pilgrimages of a pearl, as small as it is precious, in a desert called "I feel so much less alone". Because no one knows how to recognize in it a true visual masterpiece and an ageless story that crosses space and time, symbolizing at the same time the strength that only the creator capable of carving the finest works has.

I feel so empty without its gaze that my gaze can lose its discipline: I would be unable to adapt to a crossroads of life. Our gaze denotes the tendency of the eyes to deviate more than necessary to the art of a new Deity. Even such superstitious beliefs reflect feelings, or awareness of the connection with the vision, with the power of faith invested in dialogue with the Creator of the world. It is the same power that someone said was not a simple book, but the very dynamic spirit that transforms the life of the whole world.

My leaf is preparing with much turmoil for whatever is entrusted to it, made to fly before the expressive eyes that owe their color, brown to green, precisely to the expression of a higher reality, something with a significance far superior to that which an ordinary man would attribute. And I entrust to it my fulfillment, my dream, my emotions, so that it may entrust to me a part of the meaning of the verb "to live" under the rule of a spiritual nature incorporated in the sketchbook of a genius artist.

And if my creation is a creation of nature that demands its right to representation on a fine cotton cloth, through an immortalization in eternity, then it remains to symbolize the approach of my life in a calm, cheerful manner, with a strong expressiveness.

Leadership: Does the object of your gaze help you navigate the labyrinth of life in a way that gives value to your own creation, so as to determine a change in what represents you at the level of Superman?

I would like to be a small leaf, so that the wind of a late autumn evening will lead it in the way of a look that never forgets the beauty of a dream view. Perhaps a leaf similar to the one that inspired me, completing me with its generous spirit, with its emotional story, passed through the visual field of a doctor, such as the famous doctor Corneliu Duda from Târgu Mureș, who during first period used to write these lines on the board:

The very feeling of my heart receives the pulsation of such a lyrical pattern. Not everyone succeeds. For I noticed a leaf, and it noticed me, the way I look at it with wide eyes, full of feeling. And observing its mysterious form, which speaks to my heart, as the wind placed it at my feet, full of artistic message, I took it upon myself to pick it up and take it with me in a transcendental thought. My heart does not lack the voice to thank nature for such an encounter with my own symbolic transparency, which is the opportunity to step with my whole being into another world, maybe strange, maybe completely different from mine.

For a moment I talked to my leaf, as part of a dialogue between the Creator and his Work. A feeling full of trembling in my heart seized me, shaken and frightened by a possible exigency in the field of artistic creation, contradicted by something contrary to the natural: "Big ideas rarely sprout, and some even step on them, or simply pass by carelessly."

A superman is a creator who consumes visual and emotional experiences in order to give reality the nuance of an original self-expression, from figurative to literal: "you cannot feel that you step into another world without fulfilling the condition of imitating the miracle of nature".

Take A Good Look At What Your Eyes Are Saying if you want to capture the details of an entire world in a single expression of nature. Only by looking at yourself as a splendor of nature, with eyes that have no age, will you be able to complete the image of a world to which only creators have access. And as you open your eyes to the magnificent beauty of nature, another aspect of creation will stretch before you, synonymous with that spiritual content that you must take great care of if you want to get closer to the great work of the Creator.

Take A Look At This Image And Include Yourself In It

On September 15, 2021

A sensitive experience aims to imprint an unforgettable memory that you will always want to refresh.

I won the half marathon on Saturday. Not from the point of view of the place we got in the ranking, nor as the protagonist of any big day show. I triumphed because I was with special people, I triumphed because my sister got an excellent, unexpected place, after only a year of training.

No runner took part in the competition for ordinary things, and I don't find anything special in that. But each one shone in their own way.

For example. An ordinary runner stopped and helped an elderly lady to her feet after she dislocated her leg after a nasty slip. Another runner made the most spectacular images, giving up a much better place in the standings. Another returned 4 km just to stay with his girlfriend (of which he didn't know had signed up). And I couldn't help but notice the way the last two competitors who reached the finish line were congratulated by the announcer, it was totally wonderful and motivational.

If each of the competitors triumphed through something, that something was the usual thing that seems so trivial that no one notices it. You see the champions on the podium, but the champions pass you by and don't even look after them. In this case, I triumphed precisely because I looked back, and I think I played a leading role in coordinating efforts to highlight the spectacular.

Leadership: Can you maximize your ability to understand the essential reality of sensitive experiences by capturing only what is relevant during an intense activity that generates unforgettable memories?

And if you will ever triumph over something, this is possible with the help of sight. Observe people, things, or events that cannot be "disguised". The photos are useless, because subsequent disguises can rob them of any value.

A runner who focuses only on getting a leading place on the podium will be seen as a passing and encouraging moment, as something that everyone can identify with. But he will not be perceived as a kind of release from the rigors of reality, nor as a consequence of constant mental activity, nor as an assumption of responsibility for one's own existential meaning.

And what could be more spectacular than making it useful to replace the desire to reach the awards podium with an unassailable discretion. It is about everyday micro-realism, illustrating the world of the banal concrete and the small events from which human life is made. You just have to look and discover those things that are not considered worthy of interest, possibly what is viewed with some skepticism.

Just as fingerprints cannot be removed with hot oil or reddish iron, because the epidermis recovers and reproduces all the characteristic points of fingerprints, so erasing truncated areas of an image has no effect, nor can it be limited to a certain message.

Relevant here is the essential reality of the sensitive experiences you go through, full of emotions and intense moments, which can enrich you spiritually and will help you become who you are in essence. It's not about those experiences that captivate you with a competitive spirit and chance, not the ones that help you broaden your horizons, not the ones that make you stronger, not the ones that inspire you to move on. But those experiences that convince you to see that you belong to the same realities as your soul.

Leadership: Can you get involved in leading events, without making important decisions and without changing their course, through the life experience highlighted in a rare image?

This is what only an artist does: he finds that beautifully packaged things do not link spectacular events. In record time, namely between two or more mundane situations, a change takes place, as a kind of extension of a photograph that captures the reality of the sensitive world seen through the eyes of an artist who does not lose sight of any detail of the image that it creates from fragments of memory (converging towards the same ideal of moving artistic beauty).

Yes. A point of movement is a throw of light on a horizon of mystery in which there must fit something other than images and actions, something other than objective reality, something other than the concrete element expressed at first sight.

Therefore, if I am an artist, it is because I know how to gather those real events from which I can learn something without having to take action. Therefore, this is what it means to be in charge of events without making important decisions, without changing their course.

An image that creates unforgettable memories can teach you to attach great importance to the reality that you do not hesitate to recreate by analogy with the symbol of the meeting between "inside" and "outside", expressed by Estankandyr, that faculty of supersensitive intuition to control the inner and outer world resorting to artistic strength and expressiveness, to impressionism.

An image can teach you to be in charge of events, without making important decisions and without changing their course, when what individualizes you indicates a snapshot that becomes "viral" around the world.

Look At This Image And Include Yourself In It through the intensity of the feelings it generates. For leadership to be included in this plan, the image must become a medium that invites the viewer to participate in a "game" of many visions and emotions. At the same time, the image must become a means of sensitive communication between viewers and an environment thus discovered, become close, known.

Tango To Evora

On June 23, 2017

The artistic way of life consists in the fact that in one single trait is represented to us alive and fully what, in its absence, could never be represented.

I am waiting for him in the strain of a silent silence, which for a painter could be the equivalent of the sublime. But he only appears in the sadness of a continuous deception, in the doubt of questions that, same as trees, break under the weight of their fruit. I want him, I admire him, I envy him. I try to remind him of the ardor of an artist looking for content, and he avoids me beyond the ingenuity of a time that seems to be stubborn to have no sense or direction.

Because he is dead and I have contributed to this dishonorable act for which the great lawmaker, God, accuses me without the mercy of a man who deserves a second chance. A tear is pounding on the cheek of the one to whom destiny dealt a heavy blow, suggesting that anguish never totally defeated, but which steals parts of me, making beauty be uninteresting.

The remorseful soul trying to say what my conscience whispers in the kinetics of an immense poetic world: mea culpa, by inclination of a journey in time seemingly lacking the geography of the heart. Thus, stopping myself, fearlessly, at a spiritual distance, when guilt turns its face to forgiveness – the worst love of all, stealing a little from the moment of depression, I cast a last decisive look on life.

Leadership: Do you build a new chance to correct your past by letting yourself get caught in the intimate core of an experience centered on thinking of the accused who recognizes his guilt?

The glass I hold in my hand, almost trembling, what seems at first sight a scenario weighed by my subconscious, belongs to a woman who could not defeat her pride, a compensatory model of the strange universe, more than that of Stephen Hawking, from which there is no initiative to take over.

I mumble the chorus of an area of unbearableness, the mischief that foolishness accepts as a trophy. The dry lips, untouched by the scent of a temptation, show the point of maximum altitude of the end. I close my eyes and try to cancel the effect that His forgetfulness has upon me. The eyes of the color of a leaf taken by the wind, almost endeared by the shame of the humility I subjected myself to, like the feeling of total helplessness, would like to symbolize the exteriorization of inner pain.

The clock is no longer showing the time of happiness, but it tightens my delicate hand like a moral vise.

Suffering is the doubt you are dealing with a remorse that can give a new meaning to your inner world.

A shadow falls on the table, enveloping rotten hopes with a warm thaw of enthusiasm. The stranger, who is no longer a foreigner in the next second, touches my hand, like a primordial addition, making me sigh. Why do I need to know you, when can I just feel you? Why do I feel you when I just want to watch you?

The music of the eye cancels the silence of the mind. The sublime component of my nature is exhausted by the long-awaited expectation and disappointed by an ego that turns immovably into the sky of an echoless love. What a shame that such inconsistency of content may be alongside such unnecessary perfection of dreaming towards "then and there". I smile. I'm glad you're resurrected, my dear.

Leadership: What is the meaning of self-expression on the general background of a context that forms the situation appropriate to the finesse of the feeling to recognize your dark side in the admiration manifested towards a pure conscience?

The amount of self-denial released through the reaction of annoyance suddenly gains a new turn, transforms into a form of energy, namely the energy of motion. Let's dance, Tango !

What demonic lusts unleashes in the thirst of breathing a new adventure ! The phrases of the resultant distance and the moment of the unexpected forces of pressure, both climb on the podium of the magnetization current. Forces change their meaning, attract through the magnetism of a sweet despair at the ends of an energy flux generator that indicates the position in time and space of the cause of a new throb in the soul.

Again, only his, touched and traversed by the thrill of a space where the sound of energy-filled music has not gone through for quite some time. If only I would remain the only desire in the pure soul of the artist who knows how to complement the fragmentary character of the moment, building from disparate traits an elegant totality.

I see him as a resurrected enemy of the dead, killed by my terrible vanity combined with jealousy, with the fierceness of sin of not believing in the art of a miracle. But this enemy is, after all, my husband. I kill him and I adore his unexpected resurrection. Only tango is sensitive to the truth of my life.

And in these meaningful rotations, which the artist's sensitivity masterfully places in tango, on the rhythms of an intense feeling, worthy of an impressive predestination, we see Belinski's law of creation:

The character, being the expression of an entire universe distinct of individuals, must be at the same time a certain individual, a whole, individual. Only with this condition can it become a typical figure, by reconciling these contraries. The artistic way of life consists in the fact that in one single trait it is represented to us alive and fully what, in its absence, could never be represented.

Is the feature that defines you the dualism that you propose between the reality marked by the inferior disappointment driven by the primal instincts, and the tenderness of the superior man led by understanding, maturity, lucidity and self-acceptance?

The ego needs to be approached in the sense of a shadow of consciousness when you fail to rise from your own pain. Or it can be approached in the sense of anchoring in an ardent passion to keep up the rhythm of the curiosity that makes you want to know and discover more about the one next to you.

Tango To Evora is the rhythm that lifts the cry of soul trepidations: "to suffer or die". Dance, as a form of manifestation of the private initiative to forget any annoyance, begins slowly with grace and aplomb, from amazement to pleasantly surprised. And there is a continued alert throughout the area of a remembrance of what my necessarily be directed towards the inside.

Ending the dance is sensational by giving up what the old man is, whom vanity and pride have condemned to failure, somewhere in the middle of nowhere.

Taste Me Through Visual Impression (II)

On January 15, 2022

Enhance your self-image through predominant sensations, never forgetting what you were before becoming what you are now.

The man with a positive self-image is a true source of energy, being able to easily access his unlimited reserves of vitality through a projection of the self into someone else whom he greatly admires. But what does this state of energy give him other than that experience of taste which spreads a fresh odor which he adores first of all on himself?

In this sense, Orbit chewing gum is not only an auxiliary solution for maintaining oral hygiene, a miraculous food that should not be missing from our diet, but becomes the image of a telescope turned to everyone's self.

Orbit chewing gum is the fascination of a prominent taste, a spell that envelops you, distracts you and leaves you with the feeling that everything must be relived to the fullest. It is perhaps the surest way of seduction that, if you invest it with a certain reputation, you can always use it in the game of love. But maybe he needs a higher concentration of enticing smell to make you feel better next to someone you like so much that you'd like to see them again in a story you'd like to relive indefinitely.

Of course, the Orbit gum knows what is going on in my mind, feels that the true path of my heart is the heart, and that I am gifted with a special grace. Its taste is so sweet, so strong, that I can feel the aroma spreading throughout my body, it is fueled by an inner fire that causes discontinuity in the case of Deja Vu sensations that seem to happen more often as I give in to the will of an enjoyable activity, building a new version of the story my life has to tell. Which means that certain memories created in a level of consciousness, want to be relived...

Leadership: Can you present the image of a continuous reconstruction of your Self through sensations that have a limited character, them reflecting only the concrete features, directly accessible to the sense organs?

Nothing is lost in the memory of my senses, especially when my facial expression changes, my physiognomy resembling that of a chef who is impressed by his quick recipe and decided to use it on the next visit of friends. Of course, my preferences for freshness and flavor have changed with the change in perception of flavor, so I will try to choose a different range of Orbit gum in the future, just to experience a new feeling of freshness.

I notice a big difference from the "comfort" mode when I feel that someone is cleaning through my mouth (cavum oris) and throat. However, the Orbit chewing gum has no neurons to fend for itself, or to understand its role in the gateway to my entire body, even if it gives me a sense of freshness. The interesting part is that it becomes connected to me through a sense of pleasure that can be developed so that it becomes my second nature, to build a different image than the one I find myself in.

I want to say that the special significance of Orbit chewing gum must be attributed to the role of self-image companion, and not the other way around, as the custom has become, calling the image only to illustrate the impact between taste, aroma and smell. Rightly, the image of the man who has found a valuable ally for maintaining oral hygiene, somehow loses its original physiognomy as soon as it merges its language functions (gustatory, aromatic and olfactory) with that unique note of differentiation that distorts the status of a superior being embellished with a life marked by meaning.

Leadership: Can you determine the degree of realism of a self-image presented through a sensory experience that acts directly on a double of yours loaded with expressive, synesthetic force?

So what does it mean to use Orbit chewing gum to get a new look? Well, when recording a new facial image, through the mechanical process of chewing, the degree of persistence of the image is taken into account based on the image captured when viewed normally, but towards an animated style. This is a degree of distortion of the human image, quite annoying in the process of chewing gum, which can diminish the impression of naturalness that emanates, for example, a news presenter ready to make sensations with a really enviable smile.

I wonder what it would be like to provide fertile ground (through the force of attraction) for a better connection with other people, without interpreting the conclusions I would draw from a physiognomic self-assessment. For every figure has a format, meaning, it is a producer of meanings. And does chewing gum not change those meanings? Do I have to be more open-minded to my instincts for nutrition, to that inexplicable feeling that makes me think I'm healthier and look much better if I chew Orbit without sugar?

An airy mouth area gives me the feeling of beauty, but also of protection. More like a delicious dessert, well-syrupy, light, 100% natural, Orbit chewing gum is a sweetener that, having no effect on blood sugar or insulin, does not leave that unpleasant "bitter aftertaste", but will neither help you get rid of the toxins accumulated in the body. By chewing, it loses its sweetening qualities or the teeth whitening effect, remaining to fulfill only the insignificant role – that of "decoration".

Of course, I still have to consider the plastic hypostases of Orbit gum, before and after it was chewed, to realize its aesthetic value and the contribution it makes to the transfiguration of my personality that transcends the "wisdom of temperate life", being more and more inclined towards the horizons of aesthetics.

Leadership is the self-image with which you have become accustomed to identifying yourself in a form analogous to the perception of a Brand with which you are in constant interaction.

One day I will understand why it is important to have a beautiful smile and a fresh breath, of course without bothering to change anything in my appearance. Because I want to take time back, and never forget what I was before what I am now. In a way, I think I'm the same person I've always been...

Taste Me Through Visual Impression if you really want to get to know me better. Or, rather, try to see me through the aesthetic fact that feeds my self-image, highlighting a need responsible for ensuring a healthy vision that will increase my satisfaction. My smile-feeding teeth are significantly cleaner and brighter since I opted for the sugar-free, Orbit flavored with blueberry.

Taste Me Through Visual Impression (I)

On January 11, 2022

How you feel when you reach a certain state depends on the image you form of the quality of the object that arouses certain sensations, perceptions and emotions.

I bought a packet of blueberry-flavored Orbit chewing gum because it gives me a fresh, fragrant taste while guaranteeing fresh, pleasant-smelling breath. It is true that chewing gum generally does not provide a balanced supply of nutrients to prove that eating can improve physical or mental health, but I can say that Orbit triggers in me that feeling of good taste that would urge me to buy again.

It is more of a basic need, just like nutrition, for those like me who have completed an intensive and demanding training program. I have to feel fresh, to breathe in new air, to feel no pressure, no strain on my muscles or nerves, and that starts with the sensations I usually don't have, which relieves fatigue sustainably, even thinking deviates from routine.

Orbit chewing gum is, after all, a world enclosed in a human being, a way of referring to the pleasure of traversing a world that no one hates to a large extent. Not for nothing, I reserve the pleasure of being part of a world where I can do what I want without consequences. Sport, fun, breaking away from reality, are also becoming part of this world.

Therefore, Orbit chewing gum can provide the pleasure of deciphering the world in the way of the small – great chemist researcher, who discovers in a pleasant sensation the mechanism of taste that seriously manipulates an entire world by changing the perception of the quality of compounds in food: sugar or flavors, starch or various antioxidants.

Leadership: Can self-perception complement the insoluble details of an aging product, based on an experience of focusing on an exclusively subjective sensation?

At least for a short time, I say that I am part of a world that does not want to be changed, from which one cannot escape, a world that, although closed in modern and chic, must be judged only in terms of the sensation it brings to the common center, that is, the impression of relaxation, the impression of freshness and the "ventilation of the interior".

Orbit sends physiological signals to the body that something sweet and fragrant will enter the body, which is also a kind of attraction towards a product that does not require a prescription, beyond the well-being it causes in moments of relaxation. And what more could I want when I chew Orbit than to induce a state of balance and detachment, along with better control over physical reactions and emotions. How I wish this disposition would not come to pass !

As a result of this world, located in the area of natural taste and aroma, in which the Orbit gum is sovereign and rewards those who believe in it, occasioning a state of well-being, a state of inner peace, then, physical life (with blessings within me) begins to adorn the experiences of the outside world with the perception of a relaxation that disconnects me from gloomy days.

In the surrounding world there is often a diversity of associations between the senses and the things said to the senses, between various pleasures and tastes, but nothing compares to that interesting experience of satisfaction given by the relation between good taste and the pleasant sensation of coolness and freshness.

Leadership: Can you highlight the background of a sensational image by amplifying your perception of the impression of authenticity that the experience of an unmistakable taste gives you?

Besides, since taste must be judged by the nature of the sensation it develops in the cortex and neocortex, even if it cannot be likened to the sensation I would have if I sipped from the "elixir of immortality", that ambrosia they speak of at feasts of the gods, however, it gives me the opportunity to delight in the perception of a less common dessert, but as fragrant and delicious as a sweet tart syrup (only not of a bright red color).

In the coordinates of my vision, the sovereignty of the taste given by Orbit chewing gum includes absolutely everything: the taste for adventure, the taste for energy at another level, or the taste for the refined, the unique, the beautiful. It would also be a taste for experiences that align with normal life, but may also include a taste for balanced behavior.

Now, I am no longer able to notice the presence of a diversity of sensations and tastes, in the attempt to achieve a synthetic image, but I am confronted with the memory of the ideas acquired from the perception of a refined experience. The taste of Orbit chewing gum is as towering as a vizier and as great as a sultan.

Indeed, my mouth has not forgotten the taste that annulled its dryness during the effort, and it still retains on the tongue the splendid story-like aroma, from a piece of *"1001 dark nights"*given by the memory of the boy, named Iasmin, whose mouth, the one with jeweled teeth and rosy tongue, uttered a sweet word that made you forget the sugar cane. He said that no taste is exactly the same as another.

I will wait until the taste goes away, until another taste catches me in its aromas. Then the seal of silence will fall on my lips, and I will cease to walk dreamily on long journeys.

Leadership has as a tangent point the manifestation of a sensation of pleasure conceived on the background of a knowledge experience that starts from a significant property of a thing and continues with the suggestive force of a symbolic image.

Taste Me Through Visual Impression if you want to understand the state that dominates me at different times. It is clear that I have in mind the special man who combines neural processes, sensations and perceptions, for the benefit of an exceptional monographer who seeks, in all the details of elementary feelings, a new formula for the application of self-knowledge.

Teach Me To Die Painlessly

On April 17, 2013

Dare to look at you just the way you are, without letting yourself enslaved by energy consuming feelings.

Everything bares in itself the seed of another, good or bad, just as every feeling bares in itself something indispensable, from the Paradise or Inferno, resulting in a multitude of possible combinations. Thus, everything transmitted to you, induced, insinuated through subtle messages, lacking the power to challenge their veracity, interpreting them as your many thoughts and convictions, constantly reacts with your mind, giving birth to a new unfavorable psychic tension.

After-hours, in a full moment of reflection, Laura Quinn, full of indignation, anger, regret, grief, foreboding, is suddenly disturbed by the appearance of Mister Hobbs, the office cleaner. We are witnessing a scene that seems to be cut from the works of Baum, when little Dorothy magically wakes up high on top of a vortex and is carried miles and miles away, in a total darkness, living her worst nightmare.

"How was that saying? The last shall be the first, and the first shall be the latter. A bunch of nonsense. Luck favors only the bold." - Mr. Hobbs addresses her in a gentle voice. In the middle of a cyclone, the air is usually calmer, so Laura can take refuge in a less somber parallel reality, or at least that's what he is trying to convince her.

Leadership: Are you able to create the premises of a transparent decision-making process under the conditions of an individual responsibility, expressing yourself categorically against the tendency of choosing a later spiritual reward instead of an immediate one?

Unwillingly, a reckless, arrogant smile formed on Laura's lips. Her senses, these roses withered by bitterness and anger still save a tenderness ideal. And when her irresistible tenderness meets with her gentle nature, that imperceptible form of positive energy in herself can be guessed, the spontaneous creation of a chemical reaction that still produces heat, providing the necessary stimuli limit for life.

But at the same time, the hostile reality consumes her wholly. Each particle in her being is activated, the total number of molecules that totally exert their domination over the Man within her collide simultaneously and react abnormally. The resulting energy is channeled towards a bizarre purpose, opposite to the initial one, losing itself gradually, with antisocial consequences.

Her grey thoughts, so subtle that we could hardly decipher, seem to enter through minuscule teary gates: Rather than reminding me of what I am, of what I have become without my will, rather than intensify these dark, overwhelming feelings that consume me and chain me in the arms of helplessness, better teach me to die painlessly. I had enough ! "

This kind of thoughts that aren't revealed in front of other beings indicate the time between two crucial moments whose completely different meanings are deciphered only by angels. Energy torrents similar to light, but of different nature and necessary to involution, create irregularities in her actions. What's left behind – and only through their interception and interpretation – is a deep understanding of the Man within her, a relevant verification and validation of her emotions in contrast with those of others.

The poor woman barely utters a word, rather out of politeness, while a jolt of fear freezes the blood in her veins, depleting it of oxygen. Everything that keeps her alive, that inspires and motivates her to go further, is carried out under the dome of the present, filled only with a little hope dust.

Mister Hobbs leaves the room. Only now, the wild wounded swallow awakens from numbness, completely responsible for her evolution. Only now she realizes how disturbing sees herself. *

Leadership: Is the reality you derive from the constant course of daily details appropriate to the effect of the greatest importance of experiencing existence by revealing the Self in such a way as to prove the effectiveness of the individual deed that cannot be erased or canceled?

Do you have the power to challenge the veracity of the others' points of view? Does the reality you perceive as hostile consume you wholly? Do your senses still keep a tenderness ideal? Do you feel completely responsible of your evolution? Are you aware of how disturbing you regard yourself?

Each individual goes through a moment called "Blacklight", consumer of energy in the secondary circuit of their existence. Then, it passes through a state of semi-anesthesia, some sort of vast and gloomy dissatisfaction, a slowing of thoughts. In the end, it may reach apathy, drowsiness, the sudden interruption of the clarity of thought, of its own image, determining indecision in actions.

A fight between destiny and the Man within you, whose ending isn't immediately visible, but expected to come, and whose echo resounds when you reach the last round: the moment you transfer in the present that intensity of feeling, that dizzying agony of suspense: "to carry on or to give up?"

When Laura searched her heart and mind for the motivator of the perpetrator who can create strong and motivating visions that can have important effects on the evolution of personal destiny, she always asked herself: "Can my acts be erased or canceled from the register of my own exasperation?"

We see leadership included here as a protection factor of the being that faces astounding life situations under the rule of the absolute necessity of being integrated in an existential "update", instead of being a leading actor in the dynamic of some internal cumulative causalities. The victim of some objective factors that she is clearly responsible of, can create a totally uninspired result that determines isolation, emotional and moral decay, the combinations between them could take a diagonal shape, that is a distinct inclination to dramatizing one's own life.

Before finding out where you are wrong as a leader you have to find out where you are wrong as a person, when the spine of your very own existence is incorrectly positioned. So your leadership comes into play when the results of these moods are allowed to teach you what you must change about yourself so that you get closer to the border with normalcy.

In order to reach your leader potential don't let these existential divagations aggravate, but try to prove your vitality. Dare to look at yourself the way you are, without letting yourself enslaved by energy consuming feelings.

Leadership: Can you control the tension of the delicate sensitivity of your deeds so that you can overcome the immediate effects of a guilty attitude and create the premises for future revelatory benefits?

The complex of "weather" factors in your life activates either heat, rain, or draught. Joys, passing disdain, or sadness bordering depression. Homogeneous and constant components, or unstable and fluctuating components of a spiritual natural, that don't act equally to prevent any dangerous situations from arising.

This variety of factors that affects your functional area determines the change of your orientation, implicitly a new type of existential gadget. A psychology, which closely communicates with the leadership through which you can see how ready and resilient you are to the harsh conditions you will deal with in the great challenge of your evolution.

Your constitutive elements, your mood and your capacity to socialize may vary in relation with "weather changes", exerting with great results over leadership whose evolution curve is based on your passage from the shadows to the light.

Distinguishing good from harmful factors is difficult because it depends on the decisions you take when the storm is unleashed within you. You can tear from it, or you can let yourself be swallowed by it, carried away for miles in a total darkness, living your darkest nightmare.

A rewarding benefit is the advantage gained from a new concept of life, born out of joy and sadness, which can bring you the chance to challenge yourself to accept a reality that is stubborn to react to the rules of others.

Teach Me To Die Painlessly points out the reality perceived as hostile that consumes you wholly creating irregularities in your actions, being felt as an existential painful ending. It is absolutely necessary to be vigilant and prevent such moments by taking appropriate measures for yourself, so that the life ahead won't be so painful.

Whenever you're having a hard time, when you feel you are at the end of the road, don't ever give up on that tenderness ideal that fuels you, because it's the only impulse that can give you back the joy of living and can support your ascension.

Tell me, have I thought of everything?

On March 28, 2008

Form a new perception of what it meant to be honest, without making yourself a kind of irresponsible person ready to throw everything overboard.

- So his recovery continues? And Mr. Samuel Gelb?

- Mr. Samuel Gelb believes that, for now, one cannot wish for anything better. He only fears for autumn.

- If he gets sick again in the fall, said Frdrique, we will be there and take care of him, both of us, in such a way that we will save him this time too, right?

- Yes, of course, answered the young man; if he only needs care to live, it means he is healthier than us.

- We'll take care of him. But why did we have to separate? asked Frdrique.

- Well, in this regard, he was completely right, the lover escapes.

- It's not true, it was wrong, she continued, and I was wrong to agree. I should not have parted with him, when he needed me to make him smile, to bring around him the gaiety that is half health. You can call me vain if you like, but I think your uncle needed someone young, some movement to refresh him, and I'm sure it would have done him good to be able to look at me. And then, I agreed to live here on the condition that I see him every day. But he did not keep his promise. He doesn't come even once a week. And they keep me locked up here under the pretext that I'm sick, while, on the contrary, I've never felt better. But this situation can no longer last. Starting today I made a decision.

Leadership: Is the means of proof in the process of recognizing one's own value, by one of the parties, constituted by the facts or circumstances on which the other party bases its claims or defenses?

- What decision? Lothario asks uneasily. I thought the plan was simple: you will see the rich count, even if he is sick or healthy, so that he will think you love him, and so the inheritance will go to you. This even if the human value is given by the ability to think beyond thinking, and to fall in love beyond love, because the rest are just price lists, as Octav Bibere said. And you must be aware that through a minimal gesture of involvement you can significantly contribute to the improvement of a person's life.

- Yes, I made a plan, continued Frdrique, and from now on, Mr. Count and I, even staying in different houses, if it pleases him, we will see each other every day. Listen, it's very simple: I will spend two days in a row there, having dinner in Paris, and on the third day, the Count will come to spend the day and have dinner here. In this way I will go to him twice, and he will see me every day without tiring too much. Did I plan well, tell me? Have I thought of everything?

- To all, except me, answered Lothario sullenly.

- Sure! I thought about you too, said the girl. According to my plan we will see each other more often. When the count comes to Enghien, you will accompany him. When I go to Paris, you will dine at your uncle's. Thus you will see me daily and not just for an hour on the run, but as much as you want; and don't tire yourself so much running on the roads.

- Yes, said Lothario, still sullen, I will win by walking less and I will only see you in public.

Leadership: Can you find a way to symbolically represent the inner world of the man you put in antithesis with "previous individuations", in order to improve his ability to respond to external demands?

The previous individualizations of man aim to reveal those emotions and convictions, visions and character traits that cause him to react in a certain way in a given case. And not only that. Determining the individualizations with the help of the beliefs that are the basis of the life scenario that the man constantly materializes in an exposition of reasons, with an undisguised verve, and the manner in which he reveals his emotions in a case of superiority (or inferiority), can to highlight certain character traits that make up his happiness or unhappiness.

And the external requirements are the influencing factors that contribute to the change in the decision-making process, representing the totality of the characteristics capable of defining and quantifying the achievement of the proposed goal. They are the premise of a concordance between the objective truth (not interpretive) and the exploration of the real world, between justice (as a concept of interhuman life) and judicial justice, enshrined in a definitive judicial decision.

The young woman began to laugh.

- Well, she said. If you are tired of traveling, and if you are not tired of talking face to face with the count, you will sometimes be allowed, if you prove wise for eight days, to come and take me from here or bring me in the evening, you on horseback, I in the carriage. Do you understand, my dear nephew? So it's going to be great?

And the naive child clapped her hands in delight. Then continue:

- You saw, maliciously jealous, that everything can be arranged and that you don't have to be afraid of women's opinions. what do you say You are pleased?

- You are incomparable, Lothario said happily.

Leadership aims at the true face of man that expresses feelings, anxieties, conflicts, through an overlap with the other face that he hides from the world's view, the meaning of which we can only decipher through a memory signed by Victor Hugo:

"The soul helps the body and sometimes even lifts it from the ground, being the only bird that carries its cage."

Tell me, have I thought of everything? Yes, Frdrique, you planned everything well, but you did not take into account two aspects of providence: everything can change at any time, and everything that does not contain affection does not last. Well said Gonzales: "A person is valuable when his words coincide with his actions." And, I would add something from

Einstein's memoirs: "If you want to understand a person, don't listen to his words, but rather observe his behavior."

The 11 Laws Of Creation

On February 28, 2023

Direct your attention to what you focus on, without leaving the authority of your own vision.

I recently faced a certain inertia, a certain passivity in the nuance of the ideas necessary for a large work, something that made me close in on myself, making it more and more difficult for me to communicate what I feel or want. Practically, I was in a state of tension and nervous irritation, as if I had woken up face to face with another absolute: the passage into another dimension of my personality in which feeling, put in a state of communion with the irrational active, but "reasonably" disciplined, seemed somehow diluted by the obscure feeling of an unbearable offense.

Yes, writing is like a charade full of mysteries to the layman's eye, often being closely related to a state of weakness, a state of waiting for good ideas, equal to a state of melancholy or loneliness, that you risk closing in on yourself and to isolate yourself from everyone, you even end up fearing any relationships with people. Or, as someone said on a personal blog: "I don't even want to know about daily occupations anymore. They all make an unpleasant impression on my nerves, which are already quite shaken. But no one shares my sadness."

Memorize these laws. I wrote them primarily for myself, so that I would not be dominated and shaken by the sadness of the lack of inspiration that makes me very lonely in the moments of creation. I know it sounds absurd, but even a good creator goes through blank periods, when everything seems meaningless and directionless. I hope that these laws guide you to a "productive" solitude, not to a good-willed distancing from the shown titanic momentum.

Leadership: Does your creation manage to excite through a powerful moment, considering the finitude of a world closed between macrocosm and microcosm?

Being a perfect creator requires an effort hard to endure, like a terrible cold that eats your bones, enters your organs through every piece of skin left free and consumes all your energy. It is a struggle that only those with real spiritual potential can transform into strength, a long road that only exceptional marathoners travel – those who do not finish their race at the finish line.

Take note: what you write can be analogous to a closed world between macrocosm and microcosm, that is, between what others want and what you feel. Therefore, keeping a balance between what others think and want, and what you think and want to emphasize, is essential for finding a finality of the text that should be intuited and anticipated.

Leadership: Can the object of your creation camouflage itself in an "outside view" through the prism of the notion of affective similarity including denotation, connotation and symbol?

In the space and time of creation, where science mixes with the emotional plane, not only the divisions of the text or the author's remarks are revealed, but also the very intensity with which an out-of-the-ordinary action takes place, a random event that puts the whole human breath into mystery, then it is consumed in the plot of the story and in its moral significance. The speed of the lines and the presence of a climax can amplify the feeling of unreality, the unexpected lines, the lively and intelligent pantomime, the physiognomy and allure of the character being in a relationship of essential similarity.

Based on this similarity, as the writer Cotorcea Livia observes, the word can replace the gesture, and the gesture replaces the word, both of these signs being included in a character that, in its evolution, manifests itself as a word or as a mimic gesture, meaning it reduces to the seal (fundamental meaning) and develops this seal into connotations.

A landmark of prime importance in establishing the specificity of the written text, under the guidance of a thinking that thinks about itself, offers us the statement according to which the way you outline your ideas is born from displaying a clear, emotional, transformative intentionality, an intentionality of consciousness and truth oriented in the thing contemplated.

For example, an important piece of information, in its capacity as the subject of a statement, may implicitly contain an unusual occurrence and, by this, becomes the "eye" of a character. This event, as a poet who sees, can be seen and is seen writing, would specify, represents the stamp of the character and appears as a condition of his every action.

In order to capture leadership in its complexity and dynamism, you have to resort to a novel process of highlighting a wider personal experience, through a creation that interprets the vision of a new side of the expression "to bring added value".

The 11 Laws Of Creation are necessary for the creation of an original work that opens the way for people to the academic and intellectual world. They can be treated as a combination of the ambition to increase one's own value and social appreciation, to increase prestige, and the opportunity to describe a personal reality whose relevance is, in the overall picture, decisively major.

The display of a vast palette of reading levels, writing bears the stamp of an original creation, of a well-defined individuality, being felt as the display of a vast palette of culture levels. And all the writing, as a pretext of a stable intentionality, directed towards a sensible reality that would imagine an insensible one, becomes the basis of the supporting function of the narrator character, as well as the seeds of an organized, concise, precise plot.

They say that art is immortal, that through an artistic creation you earn your place in eternity. Therefore, the creation of a writer, as the narrative core of the real or symbolic text, must not be interrupted in its continuity by the unitary presence that the key character achieves, the presence sometimes marked by isolation, a fact that imposes the word and the silence between the words.

The Ability Test

On February 08, 2009

Adjust your attitude and practices adequately in relation to your own potential to create results, for your leadership to take shape.

During a trip on the Nile, Pharaoh Kheops wanted at all costs to test his sons' abilities to navigate and made them row. He told his sons: "Who knows how to navigate a boat proves his ability to govern a country. Both require skills, steadfastness and firmness."

The ability of leading people is similar to sailing a boat. No matter how trivial it may seem at first sight, sailing it is not at all that simple. If you walk for the first time in a boat, you could barely make it start, and then, more likely, you would spin around in a circle or you will move very slowly. However, with time, if you practice, if you learn how to use the rows and how to synchronize your arms' movements, you will be able to navigate in the proposed direction more easily.

If you are at the beginning of the road, and you do not know how to lead people in your chosen direction, probably you do not have the skills. Even so, you do not have to worry. It is normal at first to be unhandy. Be convinced that very few leaders have a born talent; most of them build their talent through time. Only by practicing day by day you will be able to develop the skills and the abilities of an effective leadership.

Leadership: Do you begin manifesting your inclination towards assuming the management of the "transfer of prerogatives" risk, due to the significant example of determinism created in various voluntary activities?

Just as a good helmsman stops his ship or makes it turn, in order to avoid dangerous whirlpools that the oarsmen do not sight - so the potential of your leadership, not to diminish, and that your influence to continue growing through the medium of others, you must first adjust your attitude adequately, to change what does not work and to be cautious. Manage well your inner resources and skills, coordinate better your practices so that to feel that you make progress. Remember that your progress contributes to the progress of others.

There is nothing easy, neither impossible. Obtaining a high level of performance requires a continuous and sustained effort. If you dedicate yourself permanently to study and professional development, in time you will develop the necessary abilities to work efficiently with people and to lead them. Certainly, you must prove the ability of winning people to your side. And you can acquire skills over time, through practice and exercise.

The transfer of prerogatives is due to the significant example of determinism created in various voluntary activities when you daringly advance on a path never before taken learning to keep your balance on as long a distance as possible. First, the balance between what it is worth for you to do and what you can do, then the balance between what you are and what you want to show to the world.

Determinism manifests itself in the conditions of the existence of a bond of causality between the actions you take in favor of someone and your appreciative judgements based on the knowledge and skills you have, between your tendencies of autonomy and the tendencies of calling upon someone else in situations in which you can make a decision yourself.

Or, as the dictionary says, determinism is a concept according to which causality identifies with necessity, excluding randomness.

The way in which you maintain your balance in any situation determines the value of the time you control through the will with which you approach a daring ascent, through the will with which you managed to surpass fear and obtain new performances.

The Ability Test begins with the experiencing of an event of the type "First Look", to which you take part in from a position of curiosity, and is finalized with the opportunity of an event of the type "Stay in Balance" to which you must declare yourself capable.

In short, leadership must be a dynamic process, based on motivation, and should not be transformed into a duplicate that is valid only on the current day of your "exmination". For your leadership to take shape and to have a long-term validity, you need to adjust your attitude and practices adequately to your own potential to produce results, even in the absence of examiners.

The Absolute Owner Of Art Without Borders

Establish the type of knowledge that guides your motivation in scientific practice, constantly reviewing relations with the art you create.

Theatre, thought Eisenstein, enables man to fictionally crate heroic deeds, to be fictionally passionate about Romeo, to become wise with Faust, to escape all inner problems with the graceful help of Brandt, Rosmer or Hamlet. And the young director sparked up by going forward with his thoughts, noting that this fictional behavior offers a completely real pleasure to the viewer. They feel the hero, have the feeling of martyrdom and are overwhelmed by their own generosity...

Having reached Trubnaia square, Eisenstein stopped in his tracks, seized by hot flashes. Thoughts besieging him like a fever. "What a terrible revelation ! What a horrible mechanism hides in this sacred art I'm serving ! It is not only a lie. Not only a scam. It is poison. A terrible, frightening, poison. Because, actually, if you can fictionally acquire pleasure, who will seek to find in actual achievements what you can get for free, without leaving the comfort of the theatre chair, from which you then get up with the feeling of absolute pleasure?"

The one who would later become a great director, continued dazed on his way. And the picture glimpsed became a nightmare. "I must kill this. Destroy ! " And the thoughts race, run in a mad rush. Yes, destroy it. But who? He, a boy? He who hasn't as of yet found his place even on the buffer of the Express of artistic creation ! Then, a new thought sneaked into his mind. "First I must master it. And then, destroy it. Learn the secrets of the art. Remove its waves. Master it. Become a master. Then tear its mask off, reveal it. A new phase of our relationships begins." Relationships with art.

Leadership: Is your personality profile a result of a creation that "devours" its creator, even when you are abstracted from the experience lived through the troubles of an imperfect art?

What horrible mechanism hides in this art that a leader serves? Is this mechanism an application of the principle "the ends justify the means"? Is it an individual and finished creation, incorporated in a vision that is not consistent with the standard of evaluation its own results? Is it a combination of elements that possesses determined values and have the role of transmitting a "disease" of creation?

Before leadership can be reflected in practice, first you must master the art that ennobles your science and imposes your model of thinking. Then destroy it as to strip away its "waves", defects and imperfections.. And the reinvent it by introducing new values, after which presenting it in an indicative way, as being better than previous versions. Only so will you become a master in your field of activity.

But what happens if the art of discovering and promoting this "scientific product", following the use of a set of standards of creation, with unknown values for the elements sought in the middle of prejudices or challenges, does not bestow a greater power of understanding to others?

In this case, a certain monopolization of others' attention takes place by means that are oftentimes just levers of affirmation and promotion of your own thinking. This is a scam, a terrible poison, because, in fact, it fictionally buys the pleasure of imposing your own laws, considering only you know the truth of your ideas, which you trumpet with such uninterrupted momentum.

Leadership: Can you cultivate the art of being different in a subtle, refined way, without exaggeration, in an environment where the manifestation of a state of mind directed towards progress is elevated to "symbolic" level?

In the struggle with the means of promoting his own thinking, the leader is the only one that his to suffer if he doesn't permanently revise his relationships with the art he promotes, if he doesn't show the truth that hides behind what he builds. Someone on a webpage specified well: "When you will be able to say: I am behind what I represent, as a man... then you will be able to build."

Leadership shouldn't be the result of a creation that "devours" its creator, indicating possible exhaustions of the waves of research, in confronting what some call "the experience of the impossible". And any attempt of taming it and modifying its truth is doomed to failure, especially if it expresses its quantitative aspect of the phenomenon of total ownership, which creates the feeling of absolute pleasure.

The manifestation of a state of mind directed towards progress is elevated to a "symbolic" level when viewed from the perspective of belonging to a personality that does not support the vulnerabilities of artistic forms, and it is necessary to adopt other practices and to introduce other criteria of appreciation of art.

The Absolute Owner Of Art Without Borders is the leader who succeeds in discovering that exceptional "perpetuum mobile", in a field that is in constant change, which can be beneficial and accepted by all. But at the same time, the leader's creation, with its forms of expression and its means of promotion, must not create the feeling of a treachery – because, in this case, it will bring only disappointment.

The Abstract Triangle

On September 21, 2020

The longest story of Creation is the fulfillment of the science of being a science yourself.

Stories are beautiful, but people have forgotten about them. No one experiences them with intensity, no one reads them with all their heart, many have forgotten about them, or have not even heard of them. One such story is the "Never-ending Story". I was reading it in my first year of college, but I saw it being screened in the second grade. To this memorable story, different from all the others, can be attributed that experience of divinity in a mysterious dream, close to that experience of a life full of suspense and unknown, because it seems to be written by a hand that instinctively knows everything about the soul of free, dreaming, idealistic people.

And I still can't forget the three big, very difficult tests that the main character named Bastian had to go through: the Sphinx test, the Mirror test and the Luck test.

Courage was just the beginning; you always find courage everywhere. But afterwards, everyone failed...

Leadership: Your creation is the mirror of a higher reality, built on the idea: "Learn to separate your personal creative Divinity into the three persons of the Trinity"?

Throughout the book I tried to find the philosopher's stone called "trust", which Voltaire had once confused with "truth" in a quasi-figurative context. But finding the philosopher's stone was far too delicate an operation for one who was not spiritually ready to change. More important were those few secret keys of understanding, of great mystical charge, which no one could distinguish very well just by watching the film (which is true, exceptionally well done), but only by reading the book could you find them, and only if you knew where to focus your attention.

This is the difference between people. It is not about winners and losers, about religions or culture, about trust or truth. It is that some dreamed, searched, knew where to look and discovered the keys that helped them pass the three fatal tests with flying colors.

A true Kabbalist would have summed up the subject of the book thus: "Learn to separate your personal creative Divinity into the three persons of the Trinity."

Therefore, consider the Abstract Triangle that does not perish with the things created in this world. I prefer here to think about the fundamental book of a well-written literature, beyond tastes and currents, but also about the importance of a science about the soul that studies the deep reality of the universe of mental states, more comprehensive than the strictly physical universe. Bastian is just a common character for most readers, but for those initiated into the mysteries of knowledge, he is the mirror of a higher reality.

Leadership: How do you relate to living an enlightened life, in the conditions of validating a science considered as part of an existence that deserves to be narrated in another variant of exposing its content?

The sequence of words I have attached myself to, reading a meaningful story, hiding many emotions, reveals to me a map that I look forward to traversing in order to find myself and to have confidence in my sacred power again. There are words that can heal, words that can soothe, words that can help. And all the words that draw my attention to the possibility of my existence in a book full of memories, full of emotions, full of esotericisms and distant places, have a magical power because they bring to the fore my spiritual fulfillment.

Words can provide interpretations of personal transformative experiences, and I try to interpret their conclusions from the point of view of a true storyteller who knows how to write a masterpiece through an interposed person (an authentic character). And the quality of being a Creator emanates from my attitude towards the effects of the science I cultivate, which can be labeled as an odyssey of the playful and imaginative spirit. Finally, I feel part of the words of a story that requires the use of heart and mind.

Leadership: Does your science ask you to stop being passive in a reality without perspectives, without claims of exclusivity, without dreams, learning to express yourself in terms of "journey"?

A word is a world, so close to another word, so to another world. Starting from this consideration, I learned to be a science myself, turning my life into a story that I would not want to end. I think that means loving science, ceasing to be passive in a reality without prospects, without claims of exclusivity, without dreams, and learning to express yourself in terms of a "journey" that begins and ends with an open vision of a reality ignored by all.

I say this because the longest story of Creation is the fulfillment of the science of being a science myself. The very science of storytelling is also a story, as long as the fulfillment of a dream that changes the future, when your presence is struck by a reality that says more than any word. This reality must offer the opportunity to discover another face of my own personality, a life of life without struggles, frustrations and frustrations, based on a way of knowing a supersensible reality, descending from the universal to the particular.

Leadership: Does the content of your life story have the power to validate a science whose poignancy is evident in the causality of the connection between what is expressed in words and what can be expressed through an internalization of words?

An existence worth telling in another variant of exposing its content is the expression of a profound transformation of reality in which the human condition is represented without too much consistency, in a broader reality, through a vision that brightens the horizon of pure ideas.

Here a special expression takes place, through words that can be internalized as something a priori deduced from the idea of the "Infinite Bosom of Duration", in the way that everything the mind truly conceives and believes, can become a natural reality within the different ways of reporting to time, science and life beyond the mirror.

I think that the story I find myself in the best is like an energetic imprint from the experience of life, whose uniqueness enhances its mystery. It can just as well be a form of improvement of existence, a form of spiritualization of an artist who feeds on the euphoria of creation. This is, in fact, a life full of enlightenment: it is the process of developing that sense of truth in your being that reacts to the causality of a story told with meaning, with mastery, through the defining experience of the duality between body and soul, between dream and reality.

The manifestation of leadership depends on the ability of man to express himself and to boldly support his views, as if it were the manifestation of the choice to experience life from the perspective of a story that retains its content indefinitely.

The Abstract Triangle comprises three different realities that make up the essence of an immortal story (by its very sublime content): a reality called the Spiritual World, a reality called Dream (or indivisible fullness in flowing motion) and a reality called Time. We must also consider a privileged aspect for the world to have access to the emotional sphere of the subject: to be ourselves a creation that has the courage to descend into the terrible game of incarnation.

The story goes on...

The Absurd Silence Of A Mute World

On April 13, 2016

Cultivate your will to carry further your aspirations of what you know about yourself, projecting that "hidden" which becomes active and plays a central role in your consciousness.

I was about to get into a potential space which was a sort of expanded time, a resource consumed to better advantage than the fact to prolong my existence within a framework without substance, in a simple landscape, foreign to me, such as Elada, where Faust was wandering in the frantic search of Elena. In my mind, everything had the appearance of a mystical experience as a kind of inverse realism of a world full of new sensational revelations attributed to a race through emotion because the artist in me used images to increase the visual impact of an electrifying language, unconstrained by conventions.

The Earth becomes a sphere of nobody into a strange universe if you do not decide to make from it a specific area of expertise. It is the new purgatory of an epistemic index from which you must extract wisely the essence of preparation for immortality, with the pleasure of experimenting the chemist who applies to substances a certain electrical tension in order to bring them in the position to react and emit energy.

This feeling of integration into the absurd silence of a mute world did not have anything guilty, nor crazy in itself. I wanted to have a word to say in ordaining things, I was feeling intensely that it was my duty to weigh the foundation, to put my signature on them, to become part of them that is not lost, but is transformed constantly into another chemical element, called rhodium, which lasts until death and beyond.

Regularly, everything was moving with me, within a transparent cube with the open top, through which I could interfere with higher energies, obscure forces, belonging to an unusual mood able to trigger the irreconcilable pain to be everywhere and nowhere in this strange world.

Leadership: How much do you mean in a way you have never thought it is possible, in terms of the appreciation you give to a new world that brings you closer to the authentic self?

The world of a man is the image of a reality that is so stubborn to become ideal because it always opens up beyond the horizons of imagination, at least as a possibility to experiencing a life experience defying time, space, the unknown. the image of this reality remains in the public eye because it seems to have the recipe of endless youth.

The effect of anchoring to something beyond your appreciation, by drawing the coordinate axes of leadership around the will to carry further your aspirations of what you know about yourself, towards the inaccessible, develops on the basis of inspirational force to find yourself into another plan or context. Imagine it, and then live it. Or live it as if you did not exist.

Leadership involves extending the concept about you into another existential context. This context could be a replica of the idea of "purgatory", a segment of a more complex epistemic index from which you must extract the essence of preparation for trying to perceive you under the form predestined to an ultimate truth: How much do you mean in a way you have never thought it is possible?

Concerning this, I would add the impetus of a plastic artist: "This century is just search and miss for the truth. Do not be afraid that the truth will deceive you, but fear of the lie that your narrow-mindedness often take as truth." Narrow-mindedness of the man is given by his stay into an existence which excludes the prospect of another existence.

Leadership: Can you make another type of existence based on the idea that any space is an immortal story and that any truth is a world full of mirrors that locks completely when they see each other?

Vision is the result of the creation that you experience in the "hidden" of a world that does not portray the reality of everyday life, but a deeper one, the transition to the ideal of a priori reason. This "hidden" becomes active and has a central role in your consciousness because it reflects another facet of your originality in other living conditions. In this context, the imagination (the twin sister of vision) is an embrace of the unknown captured in different hypostases, something inexhaustible, is the idea of a life that stretches over time, to something always new, intellectually stimulating.

It is like looking intro a mirror through another mirror reflecting an inverted image of the world, in this case the originality is to discover "in the labyrinth of the mirror" the eternity and meaning of the "telescope" turned to itself to look towards infinity. (Ion Deaconescu)

Also, you can discover the truth of your own illusions about yourself that would move you towards the life you believe or not you think you deserve. You can discover another side of some too well known things, because in this way, when you re-examine them from another angle and another time, you get to think into new directions. As in that immortal story in which an old man tries to buy youth through the things he has created, just to prove himself that he has control over reality.

Vision always prefers to reveal a truth that is lacking from the perspective of others. The man who intends to evaluate himself in complementarity with the things of a different world, self-introduces himself into a drawing by Gustave Dore, whose protagonist, Don Quijote, is trying to live up to the height of some dreams, braked by the inability, to materialize them and to demonstrate that he can decide by himself the directions in life.

Because it is not only to show things as they really are, but to make them foresee as they appear in your own world of visions.

It is impossible to express something real by imitating the external surface of things, especially when you cannot change the perception of them, on the idea of remaining the slave of your own screwy ideas, having the fate of all drunken spectacles in which the man is immersed without any ideal of truth.

Here is the revelation of my predestination into a total state of helplessness, which is to understand what is not usually said about the law of attraction of things. It does not generate only with the help of a "distance" applied by a specific rule, but you have to impose it by yourself through certain self-transformations into a sort of imaginary existence.

We can say that truth is a world full of mirrors that are completely blocked when they see each other, if the reality you are making turns out to be impossible, so the new world in which you believe and tend to integrate becomes just one symbol of escape from the daily.

The Absurd Silence of A Mute World highlights that disturbing uncertainty generated by the possibility of defining a reality, in which the existence becomes a profound series of other imaginary experiences, causing the blockage or acceptance of some truths that would otherwise have been avoided.

The Ace In The Sleeve Law

On March 13, 2010

At the game table, a game cannot be considered lost as long as you have one last card.

One dream, one burning desire did Mehmed II have: to greatly surpass the deeds of his grandfather, Bayezid, and his father's, Murad, who have proved Europe for the first time the military supremacy of the Turkish nation. And, in order to prove his real qualities of a good leader, a fact that could have quickly propelled him among the most popular and loved sultans, decided to conquer at any cost Byzantium, the last jewel of the empire of Constantine Dragases (Constantine XI Palaiologos).

Blinded by ambition, greedy of power, he built an army of almost 150,000 soldiers, calling under arms all the valid men of all the four corners of the Ottoman Empire. But Byzantium, which had extraordinarily resistant circular outer defense walls, foreseen with crenels and openings, protected by ditches of water, guarded by massive square towers, cannot be easily conquered at all. No city in Europe was better and heavier defended as Byzantium; those massive blocks of stone had defied all known war machines. Ram hits and projectiles thrown by the most powerful mortars and cannons of that time were made useless in front of those abrupt walls. Besides, Constantine, knowing very well what Mehmed was planning, in spite his restless messages of peace, immediately asked the help of the Christian world in Europe.

Leadership: Have you practiced your skills in the experience of using "the happening of destiny" to overcome a great challenge, in trying to define yourself in terms of "a creator of a new world"?

For strong walls, strong cannons. Thanks to the most ingenious and experienced cannon founder in the world at that time, a Romanian called Orban, by Mehmed's orders, in a very short time, some huge cannons were built, with a very long range, the stone projectiles of which had the power to destroy walls from one strike. An entire army, an entire nation, for two months has carried 20-30 such colossi to Byzantium. The battle begins. Everyday, the walls are shaken by countless projectiles, the fortifications are made a riddle. The Byzantines suffer.

But hope never let itself be awaited for too long, as you can see it exactly when you most need it. Help from Europe appears. Four huge ships, well armed, carrying a pretty large crew, loaded with all sorts of supplies, succeed in entering the safe harbor of Byzantium. At this moment, Mehmed realizes that his chances begin to fall more and more. In the coming weeks and months, more and more help will come in the aid of Byzantium and he will face more and more obstacles and, who knows, maybe he won't be able to conquer the city any more, and his dream will only remain a dream.

Beyond the starting hands stands the unwavering willingness to give a fatal blow to the strict rules of history.

Leadership: Can the way you interpret the meaning of the world and of life influence the way in which you relate to an image of power that is led only by luck and only allows itself to be defeated by the miracle of a fact represented through a divine sign?

When the jackpot is huge, you either have good cards and control over them, and you go further, or, if not, you withdraw. And Mehmed knows how to interpret a miracle when it is precisely through the desperation of the inhabitants of the city of Byzantium to hide the disaster they are in, through their desperation to find help in the great powers of Europe. But no one casts a merciful glance upon the one near death, no one raises his hand to save a relic, a ghost of the past. The divine sign only favors Him.

A powerful man, ambitious all the way, just like Mehmed, can be neither persuaded, nor intimidated by anyone or anything. Once he has set himself a goal, no matter how hard it would be to reach it, he doesn't quit easily, his attitude being ever more unshakeable, his will, ever more trenchant. For Mehmed, the bigger the jackpot, the greater the temptation to go further, the more he needs to risk everything precious for him, the more he hardens in order to win, even though the risks are too many and too high.

Controlled by ecstasy, just like a poker player who knows he's one cart short in order to win the game, Mehmed doesn't think that much and immediately and forcefully steps in. He must be the Creator of the New World, faithful to a purely materialistic, personal, therefore less religious vision, ready at any time to sacrifice himself for his ideal of superiority, thus giving a fatal blow to the strict rules of history that guaranteed Byzantine stability for a long period of time.

This is what characterizes the most feared leaders – they don't tend to overburden themselves with any kind of hesitations, they get straight to the action, aiming straight at the heart, off hand, with no hesitation, all his opponents, annihilating any trace of resistance.

Leadership: Is the foundation of your life distinguished by addressing issues related to success, facing your destiny, exceeding your own limits and succeeding in what you desire in a context of the type "Always remember your greatness"?

Check-Raise. There's nothing worse than wrongfully judging a fearless and capable man, a real player, who knows how to turn the result in his favor.

Mehmed knew he had only one chance to conquer Byzantium, only if the four Christian ships would be immediately destroyed and sunk down. But his fleet couldn't enter the bay directly, since the Genovese city Galata, the neutrality of which he had to respect, guarded the entrance. The Christian ships could only be attacked from the inside bay, located beyond the Genovese territory. How could have he brought the fleet to the interior waters?

While joy and hope filled the hearts of those under siege, Mehmed devised a plan of such fantastic daringness that it would fully deserve to have a place in the history of wars, next to the most courageous feats of Hannibal and Napoleon.

Greatness is man's chance to distinguish himself in history as a master in the field of the hazard, a master of the probability theory who has hidden a winning joker in his sleeve: "Be prepared to act without limits when the time has come to fulfill your destiny."

His genius plan, that of transporting his fleet, the hundreds of ships, over the highlands, and in to the bay, was perfectly put to practice and ended in success. In only one night, in less than 10 hours, seventy ships were carried from one sea to another, over mountains and valleys, through vineyards, fields and forests.

The next day at dawn, the Byzantines, who did not consider in their plans such and absurd and impossible idea, were stunned; they couldn't understand how the miracle happened.

It was only at that key moment that both players, Constantine and Mehmed, knew precisely which of them would win the table – the one who played his last card best, the one who was the most considerate and efficient, the most cunning and nimble - that is Mehmed.

The winner is not the one who has the best cards, but the one who knows how to play best the last card !

Victory is not won by the one who has the best cards, but by the one who knows how to play very well the cards he holds in his hands. I think that the conquest of Byzantium by Mehmed confirms this.

Mehmed did not rely solely on chance and he risked, just like a professional poker player, since risk, doubled by tenacity and ingenuity, is the greatest advantage of a poker player. He had an ace in the hole, namely a genius idea of getting out of the standstill and a great strategy to apply it. Only thanks to his special maneuver at the very last moment did he manage to do what no one else hadn't – the conquest of Byzantium

Leadership means producing a colossal impact on your past work and rewriting history, in a test of the destiny of the Creator who plays his expansionist book at the level of glory and posterity.

With no doubt, a real leader doesn't want to know the bad taste of defeat, but only the ecstasy of victory. Tenacity and effort, the ability to respond quickly, cleverness and ingenuity are his most useful traits. But those who are not urged by a strong ambition and don't have a sharp mind won't be able to win the game called Leadership.

Having an ace in the hole means having the ability to analyze situations and quickly having the right answer, always have other alternatives, even though they appear to be crazy and impossible, have the cunningness and courage to apply them in spite the apparent obstacles. The ace in the hole is always the surprise element for opponents, so you must make sure that you always have it on hand.

The Act Of Seeing What Is Invisible To Others

On June 05, 2016

Dive into the universe of creation, proving that you are fully aware of your superiority.

I strongly possessed by an idea, a sort of thought fully justified in the picture of alternations between the position of creator and that of a substitute of an immense gap in what regards the interpretation of my life and work. Somehow, I had to adapt to the level of a vague emotions and intuitions, impossible to be expressed, like the authentic colors of a painting impossible to be perceived by eyes other than those of the artist.

Everything seemed to be weighed by the contradictions of a sublime consciousness of which art is alien. I could not fully admire the deep meaning, pretentious as a pampering through their diversity and quantity, of all things said through reflection, in various ways, through the natural counterweight to action, without which I couldn't even realize my full potential. Accidentally, I would reveal myself in the face of a random phenomenon, that of a match between a certain type of results and a certain type of values, without rushing to understand or stop it.

Does the hidden thought, that I have served, for more than necessary, an undisclosed tendency of the spirit, which would be final in the quantity of those details imperceptible to others, from my own existence, related to memories and personal reflections, giving birth to an incentive of compensation for achieving a profitable revealing harvest, did not somehow come from a slight protest against the possibility of getting used to decisions and situations that I could eventually be made guilty of ?

The man who succeeds, through the spirit of analysis and researching his own world, to appear as an authentic artist, more or less accessible, in the light of a greatness that implies the disadvantage of being a prisoner of the perseverance of getting close to those far away, that man will be forgiven his "mistake" of not remaining a superficial phenomenon in the course of the development of science.

Leadership: Does the emotion you experience at a time you choose to live for the founding of an aesthetic of authenticity plays an important role in the direction of assimilating new contact coordinates of your consciousness?

You can't not let yourself be carried away by the wave of plentitude, without which your inner endowment could not take on the shape of a healthy self-esteem, if you do not live a moment of contemplation and artistic creation. You cannot dive into the universe of creation, without which you cannot bring together all that is new in the storm of currents of thought, unless your manner of relating to the rest of the world proves that you are fully aware of your superiority. This is the essence of leadership artists practice.

Through the universe of creation is understood the totality of those thoughts and emotions which, gathered and merged through the agreement of the certainty of being someone else in another reality, materializes in testimonies that tell a new story about intrinsic aspects of man, promoting a new approach to the experience of reception of art.

People who work thoroughly to obtain an art based exclusively on creation, leaving aside the suffering implied by the constant use of ideas, hence the efforts of articulating and transforming reactions regarding life into an accomplished work, simply cannot help themselves but deeply share their achievements with others. Even if not equally.

The one who experiences "the act of seeing what is invisible to others", fulfilling the operation of knowing and ordering concepts that undermine the authority of other artists, so by tackling any foreign representation of art, under its diverse manifestations, is part of the category of sublime spirits that tell their mind: "Go where you want, but seek approval from no one ! "

Awareness of superiority is an intransigent attitude that reflects the tendency of not revealing plans, needs, desires, fears, for the development of certain areas of leadership.

Leadership: Do you start to gain an identity from the factor of "inner endowment" by intensifying the trend of originality of intellectual creation concerning the unique form of the product called "character of contrast"?

Famous literary critic Sainte-Beuve had something important to say about the talent of people who always share their victories, going to their origin:

"Some, truly predestined also by divine essence, are born of their wealth, they are not at all concerned to increase it gradually in this life, but rather share it with profusion and with full hands, within their works. For their inner treasure is inexhaustible. They create, without caring and without realizing their means of creation. They do not bend over them at every hour of vigil, they do not turn their head at every moment to measure the path traveled and calculate what's left. But rather, they go on for days on end, without tiring and without ever being satisfied.

Mysterious changes occur within them, in the blood of their genius, at times transforming them. They bear these changes as laws, without any type of personal involvement, with it being any help to them artificially. They are akin to the man who doesn't rush the time of his hair going white, akin to the bird that doesn't rush the changing of feathers or to the tree and its change of leaves, depending on seasons. And, in doing so, after great inner laws and a powerful inner endowment, they come to imprint their strength in sublime, monumental works, of a real and stable order, under an apparent disorder like in nature, crossed by peaks and slopes."

The man who starts receiving an identity from the factor of "inner endowment" will only in rare cases ponder that side of the tendency towards absolute possession of the art he proposes. On the contrary, he will intensify his tendency of originality of intellectual creation concerning the unique form of the product called "character of contrast."

Such a character, not turning their head at every moment to measure the path traveled and calculate what is left, will always maintain their position between concrete and mystery, depending on the states they pass through – the bliss or frustration of an enclosed reality.

Without caring and without realizing his means of creation, he will include in his art what can be perceived by others. But never will this people be able to perceive his reality, the cause of his genius.

Inner endowment highlights a mix of qualities, emotions, beliefs, or life concepts that can fit into the "artistic value" criterion, leading to different individual configurations, and ultimately to the unanimous recognition of a large part of the human community.

Contact coordinates of the consciousness of a man experiencing the art world can amplify the quality of his creation by the power of the Supreme Self's reflection, but limited to a true reflection of what he is in fact, and not as he imagines when he scans his limitations and repressions. These contact coordinates are: introspection, the need for individualization, cold gaze, journey in remembrance, reflection, sincerity, confession.

The most authentic side of the personality is revealed when you stay with yourself, that is, with your own world of ideas, and choose to rise to a higher level of consciousness by rethinking your image to be immortalized in memories that will tell your story.

Leadership is the work that demonstrates the beauty of a painting that is revealed to the inner gaze of man.

The Act Of Seeing What Is Invisible To Others refers to the hidden thought that you serve more than necessary an undisclosed tendency of spirit, which will be final in the quantity of those details imperceptible to others, from its own existence, of memories and personal reflections. Only in doing so, according to great inner laws and a powerful inner endowment, will you be able to imprint your force in sublime, monumental works.

The Actor's Performance And Directing Subtlety

On October 12, 2014

Stay true to your vision, edifying the creation that dominates the entire experience generated from the interactions with creative accents focused on a repeating presence.

Its various positions are rendered suddenly, one after another, without crossing between an attitude and the next, meaning almost the same as a series of separate characters would be presented, chosen by the camera – not based on the criteria of physical and spatial presence, but after the degree of increasing emotion during the same action. This counterpoint construction dominates the scene and subjects it to its rules. Therefore, director Serghei Eisenstein figures that the most important thing is everything, starting with the actor's play and ending with their folds of garments, to be penetrated equally by that unique and determining emotion that underlies the polyphony of the entire multilateral composition.

This is how the scene appears in Eisenstein's vision. When filming, his only concern is to master it, to stay true to this vision. "In that moment, the character Ivan appears to be absolutely alone with fate. Nothing happens. The terrible cameras record his every move, every trace of emotion on his cheek. From all corners of the stage, eyes watch over him, looking so that he doesn't exit the lens' field of view, the clarity area of the lens, from the area so laboriously illuminated or to not raise his voice over the send level set by the sound operator. "

A purely technical concern therefore, the filmmaker obstinately pursues that his dream becomes reality. He is dictatorial with the interpreter precisely to not leave even a single trace slip through, one that wouldn't fit in this meticulous orchestration.

Does your leadership materialize in a deeply creative operation, with extraordinary facets of multi-role, from which radiates the emotion before a vision that is transmitted to the deed?

Starting from the current state of knowledge in a field and continuing with the status of implementing new procedures for adjusting thinking, you can put into circulation certain points of view, highly specialized, which have the power to push people to new ways of behaving and reacting, completely conforming to the instructions of montage.

It is important that the vision with which you treat a subject empathizes with spiritual sensitivity, with the life story of those that never give up and decide their own fate.

In terms of movie, montage refers to the final stage in the work technique, which includes the selection of scenes, determining the order and definitive length of the sequences, sound mixing, according to the sequence indicated by the script and the director's artistic vision. In leadership, montage has the role of maximizing the impact you can have over every life experience, by enhancing efficiency in the act of creation so as to stimulate the motivation of people to build themselves a glorious destiny.

Montage represents a deeply creative operation, with extraordinary faces of multi-role, having the potential of inducing subjects not only moods and feelings, but also certain behaviors without them being aware of such a thing and without being able to resist. At the same time, the leader performs the role of director, observer, technician, supervisor who occasionally "retouches" the behaviors of those who want to play an important role in a truly impressive life story.

We can conclude that leadership practiced by a leader-director has the role of a "voltage generator" or "voltage stabilizer", depending on how much he calls upon others and how open people are to following his orders or instructions. Those who follow a leader must therefore fulfill two roles: that of a protagonist of a film story, meaning that of the protagonist of an act of heroism become legend, and that of a witness of a reality illustrated by the idea of the omnipotence of the destiny faced with an unseen Creator who simply forgot about the discouraging frame of life.

Leadership: Do you use the "master" function to check if you position yourself in the clarity area of a long-forgotten world, in a deliberate effort to acquire the idealism of a creator who is considered the absolute standard of truth?

Instead of focusing strictly on those factors, generators of outstanding performance, which can become vital for the construction of your expectations, a leader with directing valences is always running, as if through a never-ending abstract labyrinth, around the questions: "Can I fit a particular situation or person into a plane of reference different than the common one?" In a way, he is pursued by the feeling that it is from here that failure or success of creating a true reality will come from.

If you are not capable of perceiving what you've done, you alone bring proof of your incompetence, and implicitly admit that you're not living up to the height of the function you've been vested with. For this reason, leaders are often dictatorial with the "interpreters of their work", precisely to not let even a single inadequate nuance slip through in their meticulous orchestration. Leadership means to dominate almost the whole scene of transformations and subjecting it to your rules, to your truths.

The idealism of a creator who is considered the absolute standard of truth is tied to the nuances of a concrete historical reality that may have as a correspondent the transparent symbol of a continuous, never-ending present.

When you turn the facts on one side and another, adding small details, eliminating or nuancing others, everything takes on new meanings, a different dimension, a different logic. All of these reproduce at the leader's scale the aspiration towards something grand, the thirst of imposing himself and finding himself on the highest levels of the professional hierarchy, approaching that reasoning that justifies any decision from the perspective of the primary objective pursued.

For any director, history is a repeating present.

The "master" function checks if you position yourself in the clarity area of a forgotten world, of an overlooked history, and refers mainly to the existence of certain restrictions and constraints imposed by the increasingly accelerated dynamic of the creative process. You can build a creation that dominates the whole experience generated from the interactions with others only if you stay true to your vision and embed it at a key-actions and key-results level, even with the risk of opposition.

Leadership is the ability to present the vision of a palpable reality that experiences its eternity in favor of the existence of a Creator who simple forgot about the discouraging frame of life.

The Actor's Performance and Directing Subtlety highlights two entities opposite by their nature and yet two that cannot exist one without the other. The first is allowed to be exposed to any factor triggering of reactions of opposition, following a meticulous analysis, accompanied by firm and adequate touch ups. The second instance encourages professional development, subject to strict monitoring and unusual pressure, but an effective one, which complies with the proportion between the level of competence, responsability and individual performance.

The Actors Are Too Artificial

On December 27, 2015

Ensure your ascension towards the highest peaks of the pride of being superior, gaining autonomy over your own "show."

While in Paris, Russian director Eisenstein discusses the possibility of obtaining an order for making a film. He had arrived in the French capital at the invitation of one of the most important film production studios. But he cannot come to an agreement with the produces. He faces – and this time not as a joke as in the parody of La Sarraz – commercial cinema.

It is proposed to him that he make a "popular" film, with the condition of using a young actress in an attractive role. Eisenstein remains stunned, unable to answer with any logical argument, but rather with: "But I do not use actors... Actors are too artificial ! "

Accustomed to openly declare his concepts, he furiously receives the opposition of the produces: "How can it be imagined that I will give up on my concepts? He shouts in outrage. Is my success in France not based entirely on illustrating these concepts?"

Leadership: Do you yourself agree with what you can or cannot achieve in terms of the orientation background of the "I know I'm right" attitude provided by the profile of your image in the world?

Leadership shows episodes of ascension towards the highest peaks of the pride of being superior. In this case, the individual represents in the interest of his own achievements certain values from which he cannot deviate. And in order for leadership to be used in any situation, especially in the framework of changes of direction, it is imposed that two conditions are cumulatively respected, under the criterion: "I alone allow myself to what I can and cannot achieve ! "

The first condition in leadership is to not give up on the game of possession, somehow maintained by a conscience that sees and experiences absolute ideas – in interaction with creating a favorable perception towards yourself. The possession of a form of knowledge and thinking, acquired by stimulating the peculiar interest for interpreting facts, phenomena, and ideas, creating for yourself a unique role "over and over" in relation to others, without changing the repertoire of your assumptions and arguments.

The second condition is to ensure that the audience has the right to ascend in the name of an entity of the type "source of events", without engaging in a fight of opposition. In a certain way, you must be a mirror of the state of existing exactly in the center of the act of existing, according to the dynamic relationship between the process of creation and the power of fulfilling the purpose of creation.

The profile of a director's world image is illustrated by the "final decision" option for the formation of conceptions and the impulse of conceptual activities aimed at developing the scientific sphere.

In leadership, the "final decision" is the sign of an authority in innovation, equivalent to the fruit of a profound and rigorous knowledge experience that brings to the forefront the proof of freedom in thought, an original and bold style, a distinct personality, nonconformism and rich imagination.

The remark "Actors Are Too Artificial" denotes a sharp departure from the norms of an accentuated strictness regarding the acceptance and reception of forms of rendering reality through art. The messenger of an evolved vision is first of all a juggler of logical and well-founded arguments with which, with wisdom, he knows how to win autonomy over his own creative work. But especially over his own "Show."

The Aesthetic In Red Of A Nameless Artist

On September 18, 2019

The true masterpiece of art is the result of what you create through a profound resemblance between what you feel and what you express from the height of a differentiated gaze, present in nature.

My life integrates into the world of roses chosen with great care, with love, to be immortalized, like enigmatic characters, on the fine canvas, full of bold colors, destined to the ideas of union with the entity generically called "Art Gallery". For its part, the life of roses resembles that of people predestined to great deeds, scopritori di regni sconosciuti, founders of new avant-garde currents, such as constructivism and surrealism. I love them, I honor them. I admire them for a long time, tirelessly, inexhaustibly, in the quiet silence with which I apply the color of the brush on the 80 x 120 cm canvas, constituting itself as a proof of execution of the large work, called suggestively: "Aesthetics".

My name does not say much, it is less important, less precise than it is the application of the bright-red color on the painting medium, as a beautiful and delightful dream that is not entirely mine, because it belongs to the revelation of a being that can be understood only by imagination and inspiration. How triumphant is the projection on the canvas of the rose, full of sensitivity and charm, il testimone rappresentativo di un universo intimo, when you try after a long and humble apprenticeship in the fascinating field of deciphering symbolism to restore the calm of a grand nature, full of beauty and mystery.

Even these words, chosen and shared with much aplomb, with much tenderness, seem to stand on the tip of the brush when painting in ambienti naturali a landscape of human emotions and experiences expressed in a plastic language, without experiencing a bitter disappointment as in the case of a wanderer in a ruined world. Rather, by virtue of an imposed theme, applying the color like a comfort of zephyr, gently pressing the tip of the brush, I obtain the confession of which the rose reminds: "Per parlare di un argomento senza dubitare, devi avere nella tua anima la fede della passione."

Leadership: Do you show affection in perceiving an authentic Ego in the form of a double image, in the description from the center of the vision you offer to the present from the aesthetic perspective of a feeling of brotherhood with nature?

My willingness to develop a new art, the supreme enhancement of an evolutionary process carried out around a particular species of roses that seems to seek its content in the colors of a red-yellow world, may coincide with the product of a careful writing, complex under the appearance of transparency, nuanced by the example of experiencing an incredible dream. Only when everything you create finds correspondence in the apparent fragility of a pure presence, always silent, but expressive, can you fulfill your most beautiful dream: to give soul to a character of aesthetic appearance.

It is enough to think of the novel "Exuvii" by the writer Simona Popescu, to introduce myself into the atmosphere of a perfect aesthetic experiment, having highlighted the language of nature's intelligence, according to which the color of an exotic plant speaks about certain feelings. Simona quotes Chinese writer Su Dongpo:

"In order to paint a bamboo, it must have grown in you. Only then, taking the brush and focusing your gaze, does the vision rise before your eyes. The vision must be captured immediately with the brush, because it can disappear just as quickly as the rabbit vanishes when the hunter approaches."

In order to obtain a vibrant and natural color that expresses the retrospective of a dynamic world, the intensity of the experiences gathered in a single composition must be increased. I look closely at the notes in my red notebook, journal of an unlimited deja-vu that becomes a kind of emotional-aesthetic archetype as the perspectives of closeness or depth of the literary phenomenon.

The writing based on symbolic figures, achieved by following the similarity between "the whole and the part", opens only in front of the higher spirits who know how to express (to the smallest detail) the sensitivity and elegance seen from the perspective of a magical universe, of the alterity of the artist's memory.

In this current reformatory context, I wonder what a psychologist would do with the references of strong emotional situations when building an Ego marked by a defining tendency, in the approaches of an experimental scientific aesthetic, based on physiology and sociology?

Leadership: Can you conceive your being for the sake of sustainability, so as to gain the expressive power of a plastic masterpiece whose features make the mysterious life of the soul visible?

The true vital essence of the rose is found in the violations of the accessible and the inaccessible, in all the cramps of the images captured during the reflections on a new artistic genre frame, which send to unnatural decompositions of my plan of existence, posto sull'altare della realizzazione della volontà di Dio. It is the point of magical interference through which one who lives for another space of art approaches a deeper understanding of life.

As can be seen, I am the creator of an art associated with the perception of the depth of visual elements, characterized by the duration involved by certain events that disappear as subtly as they appear. The visions are lost in a long and humble apprenticeship in the mastery of shadows and lights, of the art of logically constructing a painting according to the specific laws of the nobility and the sincerity of a message that crosses the dream of a final theory, in grado di spiegare tutto: "Nothing is too colorful as a whole."

The landscape in which I live, according to the determinations of a spatial-temporal ripple, can be received according to the stylistic quality of a visual artistic image, con un valor único, because everything depends on lighting, stabilization and interpretation of a representation in the mirror, along with information on the way of capturing a wide range of topics. This landscape develops through the eyes of a wild rose, striving to perceive it as a complete being, only to extract the aesthetic model of reference, the attribute of the Creator himself,la forza trainante dell'evoluzione, the determining cause of a matter of presence continues: "multiple existence, living through reflection."

It is from here that art begins, not from the nobility and the liveliness of human things, not from capturing objects in so many possibilities, dimensions, genres, artistic trends, but from a kind of recognition of the specificity of a state of sensitivity and harmony through association with the recognition of visual information constitutive of the written language, powerful and suggestive.

An artistic masterpiece is the result of an accumulation of overwhelming feelings, described by words of great value, which you never regret that you immortalized in a pretentious formulation.

At first, I was an onlooker, and then I undertook the short description of a rose. I reached the feeling, the desire aroused, then the creation was born – followed by a caring message, but not necessarily a strong one. And finally, assolutamente senza precedenti, I assumed the true story of a masterpiece. Beyond the momentary experiences of the artist, deeper, warmer and more intense, from which the elixir of eternal youth is felt, there is that clarity of the lonely senses, something that purifies and leads us to serenity.

My name is not very important. Perhaps I will be forgotten as quickly as the roses shed their petals at the end of autumn, without my words to reach through reason, to reach the hearts of art lovers. You can never be sure that what you do instinctively, diligently, with no equal, is immortalized in a completely charming way in a transcendent picture.

But maybe someone will still remember me, even by chance, like a look back, which inspires us to go ahead, because the very image of the rose, dry and earthy, which we at times encounter in a dreary autumn landscape, directs us to the sensitive and speaking part of the soul that never loses its glory hidden within it.

I am one with my Ego, a part of the personality of the rose. A new attempt awaits me beyond the beauty of nature, una meticolosa padronanza di un capolavoro, a secret that waits for its release as the emotion that is not traded for fleeting things: to see deeply the red hue of the living legend, the extension of my personality from the story state, with eyes that death never closes...

The talent of an artist lies in the fact that it can represent the force of change towards a very deep perspective of the meaning of "love as a symbiosis between man and nature", when what emerges becomes a revelation of the spiritual world.

The Aesthetic In Red Of A Nameless Artist highlights, in the measure of emotion and feeling, that intimate connection between nature and the imaginary world of art which, deserving of a thorough knowledge, una interpretación personalizada, is capable of exceeding the status of what it "fleeting" means with a new perception on the representativeness and uniqueness of a mysterious presence: "Look at me, without me being there".

The Eesthetic Of A Black And White Confession

On March 13, 2019

Be the discovery of what you mean in a life whose length seems impossible to judge impartially.

I would like to talk to you about that day when it seemed to me that the whole world is mine. I was taking my baccalaureate in the evening. You never knew what a tough climb every day of school meant for me, every year, what obstacle course with ever increasing obstacles I have overcome, taking my "maturity exam". We knew nothing of each other.

I was listening to the roar of the sea. I knew that I would always collapse upon life, like the sea collapses over the rocks, that I would carry within me all of its nostalgia and an eternal longing for freedom. Not even the sea is free, I tried to comfort myself. It is enclosed by shores. Maybe she's angry that she's lost her freedom. It is as if she slams her head to a wall, hitting the rocks and frothing at the mouth !

- Sure, writes Andre Maurois in his Memoirs, it is a great madness and almost always punished for you to come back and want to experience at forty everything you loved or enjoyed at twenty.

I have long gone beyond maturity and I do not want to relive everything I've ever loved. It would be a punishment. But to understand what I loved, what I experienced, and especially to understand myself...

Leadership: Are you caught up in a timeless problem that will only untangle itself through a change of vision of yourself, adjacent to the feeling that you can belong to a reality that exists beyond what you think your limitations are?

Do you fall in an uncertain dimension, filled with unpredictable? Does the frustrating feeling of the inexplicable surround you with a bitter layer of fragility and helplessness? Is your incontestable individuality accentuated by your contact to a new way of self-knowledge? Are you lost in a maze of clues and interconnections with other ways of life? Are your limits given by the lack of understanding of how you have to pay your debts to the values of life: sincerity and maturity?

Often leadership is like an unfinished creation, but with the power to bring new extremely important light on a certain stage of your evolution, when you start to revolve around your axis, in the alternation between the two situations: "to be the messenger of a wandering past" and "to be the echo of immortal story". The only art that leaves you speechless at a close look is a way to capture you in a hypostasis of total abandonment in a reality that gives you little or nothing of what you dream about. Often art is the privilege of a captive mind in a reality that has become stuck in its own limits.

Completely confused because of the circumstances you're going through, you no longer know if you're anchored or not in reality that fulfills you. You become completely motionless, without the strength to react, trapped in an unsure game of dualities and asphyxiated by the amalgam of elements that act around an only denominator: nostalgia. Like when you look at a beautiful painting and try to feel in the given landscape, but it creates your image of the world, the house, yourself. You are rushing to leave the form of the insular character of a humanized art, but with a very careful focus on details, with a stress on man "in his loneliness and intimacy".

Leadership: Can you leave behind the footprint of a destiny that pushes you terribly, making you exclaim with an innocent wonder: "I am the negation of this existence ! "

Do you manifest your melancholy through isolation from the rest of the world that has all the inconvenience of a war with yourself? Are you determined to relive certain moments in life at the price of a perfection that would have been sterile, or at the price of that humiliation that gives up pride and revenge, choosing love, miracle and goodwill?

Out of the actions that make you less efficient, compared with each other, isolation remains the most representative "monument" because it perpetuates the state of melancholy, the sensation of sensitivity followed by pressure and pain. Full abandonment in an incoherent universe that characterizes you more impetuously, induces a state of inner torment, an unpleasant sensation of belonging to something new, limitless. Is everything in you suddenly supported by a continuous curiosity of finding the truth: "Who really am I?"

Leadership: Do you avoid the danger of entering the "Sentimentalism" area throughout the functioning of your own consciousness, about what keeps you prisoner at a ZERO time faithfully reproduced by your mind in the way of fulfillment?

The expert in matters of leadership, John C. Maxwell advised: "Prepare yourself for the key moments in the future and choose daily the appropriate attitudes." A kind of warning, I would say, that signals the confrontation with ourselves that has to be overcome. Channeling the uncertainty state that takes over us at a certain moment in life towards a direction in agreement to your own values, in a better harmony with the truth of what really defines us.

Your entry into the "Sentimentalism" area is similar to the emergence of nostalgia for lost privileges in the search for the meaning of life, not only because you are subject to a reality that surpasses you and you cannot escape it, but because you are not ready to recognize your shadow, suffering and its meanings, and to bear the consequences.

And being a prisoner in a ZERO time reproduced by your mind in the way of fulfillment means to remain faithful to those memories that cause your suffering and do not let you propel yourself to the main dimensions of the meaning of life (spiritual and social). The recollection of deeply sensitive and afflictive moments, or disappointing experiences, would mean a double suffering: the one lived through the essence of self-ending and Proustian remembrance, with the deletion of any ties to previous engagements.

Leadership: Are you committed to claiming an identity that you cannot cope with, based on a life experience very close to materializing through a strong test of character that urges you to become more tolerant of yourself?

I think that for every man, the moment of reflection usually comes later, when he is already a prisoner of this transition state, that instantly produces an unimagined, unwanted, uncomprehending curiosity in such an atypical context. You begin to see yourself from the point of view of a painter who transposes the images created by a poet on the canvas, dare to redesign his whole life after communion altogether, not only in the light of the things he considers important, but through the passing pains that he cannot ignore.

And if the man doesn't truly analyze these states, processes and momentarily situations, leaving himself at their will, without any doubt it will remain in the "Sentimentalism" area. It'll turn to stone in a defensive position, instead of attacking, which will be reflected in a misunderstanding of his role and responsibility towards his own identity.

Your decisive insight is produced when you feel too isolated in a continuous status quo, when you spend time looking into yourself and judging your reactions. It's a clear sign that something eludes you.

Insight is a look at the essence of your nature that has been forgotten for too long in oblivion. It can be a mark of your divine calling from which you create a new reason to be. But it can also be a negative nuance of the self-evaluation process experienced by a mixture of affective or moral constraint. Insight is a truth about yourself that you only reach through revelation, aesthetics of self-discovery, and understanding of the inner world by finding a way to experience that greatness of soul that you will not find in anyone other than yourself.

The identity that leads you to success or failure occurs as a result of reliving an emotional event in the past that has not been suppressed to the present moment. It is the ascension that you must follow after you have judged with the thought of defeating yourself.

It's like you received a bunch of rejections from well-known people and you isolate yourself from fear of encountering new ones. But the curiosity of being a part of the mystery of life, the desire to revolt against the thoughts that almost crushing you, the necessity to stand against your of latency still have roots within you. Everything becomes extremely crowded in you. Until everything that you don't know melts in an anemic curiosity. Then it suddenly bursts out in a correct understanding of the way you should adopt.

As someone said: "the more we delay the confrontation with ourselves, the more we lose precious time that we could have used living at full speed." Often, the identity of man seems to be similar to the delicacy of a painter who captures in his creation a peculiar landscape of special significance, trying to convey to the viewer his mood experienced by contact with a reality in which it is very difficult for you to integrate, because it is philosophically rebellious and it symbolically sends its meaning to the ZERO point.

And I underline here. In leadership, a single, freely-conceived and personalized "product" is used: individual identity. It can inspire trust as the man changes his views and behavior through a certain decoding of feelings, through a revealing of life experiences accumulated over time,by extrapolation of some actual states.

It can be up to denying the self, which means assuming an identity that is no longer his, an identity that he no longer belongs to or that he can no longer deal with when he can no longer master the demons of the past, the spirit of truth behind his convictions, when he fails to put aside the veil of the illusion of being perfect in an imperfect world.

Thus, the individual is lost in a labyrinth of psychological games and uncertainty, in a dazzling vortex of backstage plays that enhance mistrust and the confusion between known and unknown. The efficiency of leadership mostly depends on the powerful will of a man to keep his flexibility and on a superior resistance to "corrosion and erosion", to the state of uncertainty.

The strongest test of character that makes you become more alert to what is happening around you and more tolerant towards yourself is to admit your suffering as a lesson of life as a necessary condition to increase your faith in a new beginning.

The Aesthetic Of A Black And White Confession highlights that stage of maturity when you can get new clues about yourself with an overview of things that have already happened, which you lack, which stimulates your affectivity and challenges you to reconsider your self-image.

Even if you feel saddened by grief, the hardships of the times, the nostalgia for a resignation that implicitly places you in the sphere of worlds long past, remember that famous Star Wars quote: "The brightest light casts the darkest shadow."

The Aesthetic Of An Impenetrable Confession

On March 01, 2018

Begin to perfect your art, imagining that there is no teacher in the world able to teach you.

I seemed to have been faced with an immediate imperative of life, as a sort of influence coming through the way of art: "Necessity knows no laws", especially in the face of a God who earnestly asks for patience in the realization of the Great Work, with the modesty of how the world has been designed and built.

Any protest derived from the act of creation by which I was trying to make known my doubts about the Christian principles revealed by modern science so as to ensure my autonomy of self-expression, finding myself in an imagined, biologically undefined world, was a kind of detachment from the particular stereotypes of the aesthetics announced by the reason for a journey into the beyond world. An aspect approachable following the transcendence of an Alter Ego in the projection of a lecture full of teachings.

In fact, I did not allow the sense and feeling of the imperative necessities of art, extremely changing under the power of affirmation of the symbol, from transmitting an imaginary world into a realistic coat to the essentialized field of an ideal significance, to be the expression of the fear generated by the outburst of the soul in front of the advance of some notions of the unpredictable game of the messages that needed to be promoted.

You cannot kidnap the moon to get to better know the sun without going into the development of the field of symbolic implications that gravitate around this necessary path from an interpretative point of view. With this example I touch, in fact, a second more general situation – that of the multiple combinations of inserting thinking in a dialectical confrontation on the same field of the incomprehensible upon which proceeds with his work the lucid initiator of a confessional aesthetic.

Leadership: Can the rationale for the existence of an artwork be found in your ability to bring authenticity to a reality unleashed by the impetus of a whisper promising a trip around the world?

Between discovering primum vivere from the field of ambiguities associated with things and to deduce from them the meanings not yet included in the raw material that embraces the symbol in the work of art, there is always a constraint of the type coincidentia oppositorum, thrown into the costume of the weather that is losing its seasons over the loneliness of the place called "self-knowledge".

Here, as in many other cases, I find no support in the notions and concepts of the great art-makers, no sparking from the elements of other creations, under any form of inspiration, but I was strictly feeding out of the fullness of an experience that had deepened over the years, being more animated by a "Basic Instinct" at the perceptual level.

The whisper I still address to the world, as a memory would pass between the stars, from a thousand years in the future, is a reversal of the usual logic in the territory of the predictable, a form of expression of imagination in a conceptual space that becomes convincing to the extent that no one attempts to combat my faith in a superior energy that governs my being.

It is not right, some critics would say, to squeeze out of the soul of living matter the artistic theme of the primary reflections on the fullness of the concept "incontro divine", changed into gold with the blood of the idea of alchemy, responsible for a TRIUMPHANT CHARIOT, such as the painter squeezes paints from the tubes, to explore the hidden areas of the insanity of being God's equal within the limits of the reality captured in the expression of infinite time.

Leadership: Can you form a picture of someone by trying to face a certainty that you can doubt?

Reader, do you want to know and understand me as a man and as an explorer of the mysteries of the unspoken and unseen, between the illusion of reality and the reality of illusion, from the sincerity of my creative, proud, eloquent form, to the undying rhythm of the paint, to a sincerity of the appreciation of the "Flame of Yahweh" in cosmic manifestation, which for me becomes a science composed of the multiplication of a single anatomical fragment from an anthropomorphic chart meant to express the idea of continuity and permanence of a space superior to the existing one, perceived at a personal level?

Then notice that an opening to "something more", the imperious knowledge revolving around an abstract geometry, the maintaining of the balance towards the impulse of comparing some of the figurations of the sky with various sacred allegories, creating a truth from any confrontation with the realities of the unseen world before the body's death, through a strange cosmogonic coincidence, all of these are influences coming through the path of an endowment with the power of give life to matter in a way in which the universe expands: through chaos, reorganization and order, in an endless cycle.

Leadership: Have you built and refined your own tools to criticize a power beyond the understanding of the human mind by calling upon the concern for the intrinsic value of means of expression integrated in a vision without a physical identity?

In art, the MATERIAL dictates the METHOD. Thus, allow me to describe myself, by associating myself with a cosmological vision of creation, as a divine endowment with the melting power of prime matter at a temperature of veracity at the limit of the relationship between the strange and the miraculous, in a pure demonstration of sublimation of the materials from which the writer's universe is constructed.

For this reason, I often allow myself to paint a painting in the form of a basic motif of decorating the language, with overlapping expressions analogous to the rhythms of the exposure of my version of an artist whose living intertwines with the calmness and rigorous study of the forms, slightly pushed towards surrealism (which proclaims total freedom of expression).

Think of me as you might look at Paracelsus, who wrote much about the mysteries of the Kabbalah and the secrets of alchemy and natural magic. He confessed the following: "I began to perfect my art by imagining that there was no teacher in the world able to teach me, and that I had to gather knowledge by myself for this purpose. The only book I studied was the book of Nature written by the finger of God."

The merit of being an artist is due to the autonomy of self-expression. This means to constantly update your confessional approach, analyzing the realities of the changing world through a revealing journey that takes into account the effects of creation projected in the word of God.

The Aesthetic Of An Impenetrable Confession is a representation of the autonomous validity of expression through which you become the master of the universe, in which the sole intercessor before God is the essence of the written word with the power with which the symbol grants it eternal life.

The Aesthetic Of Excellence

On July 13, 2016

Dare to highlight what defines you, in relation to a world that seeks the guiding points of sustainability in the originality of the act of creation.

Tire yourself and enjoy yourself by copying the best works that you can find and come from the hands of master craftsmen. And if you are in a place where there were many good craftsmen, the better for you. But I give you some advice: keep an eye on and always choose the one who is the best and has the most fame. By following him daily, it would be unnatural not to learn something from his way of working, from his way of being.

Instead, if you begin copying this master's work today, tomorrow another's, you will not be able to learn anything either from one or the other, and you will end up, without wanting to, a man with a strange imagination, for every kind of work of a craftsman will harass your mind. Today you will want to do like this craftsman, tomorrow as the other one does, and you will never be able to copy either of them fully.

If you follow just one of them relentlessly, only a lack of cleverness would make not learn anything from it. And then it will happen to you – if nature endows you with any imagination – such that you get to have your own way of working, and that can only be good. Because your hand – your wisdom being accustomed to gathering flowers – would not know how to sow thorns. *

Leadership: How can you define your penetration into the heart of things and their course in relation to the feelings that surround you when you stand on the edge of the "stage" without being able to get involved in the show?

Does science cause a real scandal in your mind? Have you come to regret every moment that keeps you away from yourself? Can your psyche support the weight of expectations that you constantly generate? Are you under the ardent desire to escape from routine? Does the desire for absolute change becomes invaluable?

The aesthetic of excellence arises from the fact that your stance regarding the idea of change (compared to the evolution of art) is based on the premise that the safest guide you can have as the best direction you can follow the perfection you aspire to, is to gain a unique experience of the struggle that you carry with the practice of a continuous formation of character.

And the real test of character is to get yourself finished with your own way of doing things very well, meaningfully and with heart.

In art, it is not important to load your consciousness of formal symbols with which to master the impressions of the perception of the surrounding reality. But to learn the brush movements, the way colors and lines become forms and give life to an unparalleled work, using the succession of the "blossoming" of your vocation and personality, following the pattern of a mind that combines the principles of a clairvoyant knowledge with the idea of a resounding demonstration of a plastic virtuosity.

The potential to become a good professional depends largely on the efforts invested in studying those avalanches of ideas and revelations that can materialize in outstanding, significant results in terms of the importance you give to the struggle with your own limits.

The entire body of an appropriate orientation in the environments of the trials that you face over a long period of self-evaluation depends on how you manage to define the penetration into the heart of things and their course in relation to the feelings that surround you when you stand on the edge of the "stage" without being able to get involved in the show.

The way you complete your work depends on how you can define the penetration into the heart of the things you want to communicate with the experiences you experience when you go on the path of perpetual renewal.

As for art, I can give a small indication: the higher the income from the analysis of other artists' work, the lower the "rest" that remains after paying for your learning activity is.

And I also believe that the artist defines his penetration into the heart of things he wants to communicate through creation as a demonstration of a unique concept (constantly developing) that links empirical consciousness to the rationale of an infinite mind. He is not a spectator who stands at the edge of the stage without being involved in the show but is a receptive for emotions and perceptions that come from everywhere.

The beauty of leadership is always given by the proximity of a lifetime experienced to the fullest by practicing an honorable profession, but especially by practicing a learning and application of knowledge to the extent that it does not cause fatigue. The best leaders in a field are constantly "revived" by the power of authentic creation in a time that gives them the profound and unique opportunity to receive, incorporate and integrate a new sovereign relationship with everything that life means.

When the inspiration flows change, gather or reduce, the leader does not change the functionality of his own work, his exploitation remaining at his own discretion, that is, a creative power superior to the others. He defines his penetration into the heart of things he wants to communicate through a spiritual renewal, in that he truly becomes himself by something that makes him happy and individualizes him as practical manifestations.

The originality of the act of creation consists in seeking a means of revelation and artistic knowledge through which to give life to an image of the "struggle within yourself" that inspires everyone to action.

The Aesthetic Of Excellence is achieved by comparing the style of making art of great creators with your vocation of working by yourself, to express your passions and skills, offering 100% of what you are. Are you ready to fight with yourself to achieve an unmistakable artistic ideal?

Ralph Waldo Emerson said it well:"To be yourself in a world that constantly tries to shape you into something else is the greatest triumph."

The Aesthetics Of A Vision Springing From The Perception Of Taste

On April 05, 2022

What you see with the gift of vision is an indication of how you feel when you experience the pleasure of taste.

The first thing to note when chewing Orbit gum, in order to keep the sweet and aromatic taste as much as possible, is whether this phenomenon is occasional or regular. In what other moments of life, unique and unforgettable, can you enjoy something delicious, refreshing, without working on its preparation and, at the same time, to satisfy that pleasure of feeling good about yourself?

Those who claim to believe only in what their senses perceive are contradicted by the material reality they are currently experiencing, identifying with it. Because they believe what is happening to them, but they are not sure what they are feeling, because on the one hand chewing gum causes the production of an excessive amount of saliva, but also causes stress to the jaw, causes increased acidity, and causes gastritis. On the other hand, chewing gum, which delights with the richness of aromas and the complexity of taste, makes you take care of yourself more often, to care how you look, regardless of the day, to smell good and shine.

However, chewing gum blindly does not help you to be more discreet in the landscape these days, but it is proof of having a sharp aesthetic sense, which can be cultivated with the help of a guide of the art world, expressed by "Askuriathiss", this symbol of the sense of taste, style and sexuality of men, replacing almost any unnatural care of life.

And how ! You become more active and feel much better where you are. And if you focus on the deep interconnection between mind and body, which can be experienced directly through a direct attention to physical sensations, you will notice a pleasant visual phenomenon: everything seems to be more open around you, more friendly and participatory.

Leadership: Does your ability to visually transpose a perception resulting from the action of a taste stimulus materialize by superimposing the created image as an alternative form of self-expression?

At the same time, chewing Orbit gum, we are closer to noticing a sensory phenomenon in the decision made by a consumer, proving a rational behavior, subordinated to the principle of taste: this taste must be balanced, have an impact on the mental level and be a symbol of a carefree life. To get here, let's not forget that taste is a subtle attempt to bring botany into the kitchen, with an emphasis on consumer preferences for fruits or plants of a certain type, and of a certain color.

But what information does the taste of Orbit gum give us, as a symbol of a particular state of mind embodied in a vision that will later acquire the concrete form of an artistic idea? I say this considering that the taste must be a perfect combination of aroma and sweetness of peach, referring to the preferences of consumers for a certain food group (minerals and vitamins) that the body needs, being particularly important in terms of nutritious.

And not only that. Chewing Orbit gum, I realized I was someone else. Not only am I able to appreciate my aesthetic sense in the pursuit of the art of taste, but in this way, I can also propose an art of surrealism: "Dream plus reality." Because I could always create a painting with a high symbolic weight that would visually transposes my interest in rendering a human face invested with an almost divine aesthetic.

Leadership: Can you identify as the possessor of a particular mood, embodied in a vision that will later acquire the concrete form of an artistic idea?

Taste brings an emphasis on aesthetics, doesn't it? And in the case of consumers, they can opt for a certain color palette of the connection between the food consumed and the appearance of a harmonious dentition. In other words, we are dealing with the happy encounter between a unique composition of refinement that delights the senses and a pattern of distribution of "natural" sensations.

And if we could imagine the color of the taste of Orbit gum, if the taste should be immortalized on a silk cloth by the transforming power of metaphor and the re-signification of lived experience, then I would translate it visually into a real and abstract plane at the same time, as is "Tutti Frutti", the famous work of art by artist Helen Frankenthaler. Do you know any other excellent taste transposed visually?

To put it another way. An experience visually transposed into a real plane and into an abstract plane, forms a broad image that sensitizes and provokes the viewer to connections with the self, easily found in different images. Of course. In order to be able to make the choice for superior quality and elegant taste, you must be able to appreciate the experience of a positive reaction to a certain product, so to go through the experience of a unique state of good will that favors an excellent state of health.

Leadership is a phenomenon related to aesthetics: what you admire in you is related to the unforgettable experience of taste that attracts you at first sight. Does the taste you love convey an overflowing attitude?

The Aesthetics Of A Vision Springing From The Perception Of Taste can be captured in the experience of creating a meaningful image whose possession is called memory. It is similar to the image of a face "contaminated" by the meanders of taste and sensitivity...

The Aesthetics of An Astral Experience (II)

On April 10, 2018

Art is everywhere and nowhere, in everything and in nothing, for all eternity.

I am lost in the boundlessness of a memory of before you were born, before you found your time, before we met, according to the design of the understanding of this mysterious millennium framework, simply called: life.

That is why I have decided to try an experiment through which I would inject a little expressive hue to the picture that is no longer in an intuitive and perfunctory whole with your views, a metaphorical utterance, a touch allowed by God in the concrete form of the forms of reality, through the simplicity of the drawing in relation to the graphical condition of the letters made into words, from a sense, from a glimmer, from the infiniteness of a passage from one time to another.

To you, reader, I leave the most holy of my memory.

Sometimes I wish I did not have the ability to give birth to a kind of temporal reversibility mechanism, as an ideal means of serving the intentions of preparing for the victory of such struggles always belonging to the empire of the moment, a so-called system of turning back time, in the subtlety of unencumbered expansions of knowledge, its elements of power forming a Cosmos.

But maybe this is the very quality that corresponds to my purpose. I can traverse the magical content of the moments experimented with from the whole frame of my earthly passage into a new experience, following the exhortations and teachings of the artist who consecrates and defines his work, almost entirely, to the theme of a reality that is impossible to ignore.

Leadership: Will your experience in the immanent plan of life be translated into a plastic image that will improve the perception of a remarkable world through your presence in a new age of creation?

A permanent temptation of the natural, the corporealization of the symbolic diagram, the transformation of the visual concept into a plastic form, is connected to something so moving, in a sense that far exceeds any sentimentality, aiming at the most real and alive human feeling, as a special event: the eagerness to change the world.

My interest is especially directed at painter Dürer, to the feeling of joy that stirred his awareness of the perfection of the work "Martyrdom of the Ten Thousand". When I suggested imagining the king of Persia, Shapur I, in a frame full of that humanity who has the right to master the universe, Dürer has given me the understanding that the heroic feature of his model best resides from the painful and penetrating reflection of the great vicissitudes by which the rule of a king is being tested.

I would rather say that this work betrays its true psychological background, the agitated and nonconformist side of the artist's tragedy in tragic times, by skillfully marking the accents of the dramatic at the expense of monumentality.

If the concrete destiny of man is his creative assumption, then the formula of my authenticity resides in an engaged attitude of an artist to interpret reality by the intensity of his experiences, competing with the vigor of interpretation by which he breathes an innovating breath.

Leadership: Do you take the decisive step by which your living presence in people's memories allows them to rise to the first stage of an aesthetic tendency by illustrating a historical subject that benefits you from the arbitrary perspective of an imposing and overwhelming reality?

Generally speaking, when I think of the content of the art written in the field of a universal memory, imagined by a lens of the evolution of contrasts between old and new, I have in mind a movement that repeats endlessly in an abundance of linear curves, a technical drawing, coupled with an intense plea for a redemption through art.

The painful harvesting of the artist I metamorphosed into is a living parable about the power of man who, despite the vicissitudes of life, does not break the beauty of a theme of mystical origin, from a surrealistic universe like that of Aquasixio.

I realize that I was happy only after the decisive moment passed, for only so could my words, replacing the true images, transmit across generations the peak episodes of history. I sometimes try to look back in hindsight and I see it as a movie that I cannot remember anymore, so that it will not have to amplify this state of nostalgia to infinity.

As I approach the likeness of God, I begin to understand that the only oasis of tranquility is the beauty of the human nature contemplated on the background of art.

Leadership: Can you confirm your perfect appearance in the echo of a memorable time so that you do not lose the depth of your participation in the mysterious cry of a single answer to eternity?

The Creator and his Shadow, its life and echoes, an a priori of formal imagination , later following his fulfillment through an act of creation, from a painter's activity to that of a writer, continuing indefinitely with the great themes of the universe and culminating in the glory of the talent of being unique in the memory of time.

Full of uncertainty, I feel like I cross another plan of reality, penetrated by an energy that tends to emerge as a form of remodeling the past, as I myself exist as a being open to an almost infinite horizon of possibilities. It is about the aesthetics of the joy of living in the memory of a past time and the aesthetic of the desire to win a reformer image in a progressive revelation of the self in the memory of the present.

The Etruscan of Mika Waltari, that Immortal Turms, linking every stone of life to events with the desire to remember them, is found in a special way in me, in a place of creative manifestations, which unleashes any rope that holds my soul captive in an eternal fear: to be rejected by the memory of a world that dies when I fail to relate to its concrete.

Only one answer leads me to eternity: I believe that my experience so far recommends me for the position of master with power of life and death over what is happening, in correlation with my own way of seeing the world in the immediate vicinity of a reference art which is able to overcome the limits of its own repetitiveness.

Is the art you practice distinguished by experiencing your presence in a world that ends much too fast?

The Aesthetics Of An Astral Experience is the fruit of heaven and earth, of the written, seen and signed by a writer's ability to develop the idea of time in a completely different direction of philosophy, rather than otherwise being tempted to understand it. This direction says that art is everywhere and nowhere, in everything and in nothing, for all eternity.

The Aesthetics of An Astral Experience (I)

On April 07, 2018

Be prepared for a long journey around the world, seeking inspiring sources in others' style of building a "forward".

I have seen much in the long period of my life, to encompass the universe during an interruption of the clock, through its experimental, temporal and ephemeral character, but with great openness to observing history through the vigilant eye of a realistic artist. The gift of being everywhere, the need for steadiness and the deepening of almost forgotten reality, the values of a universal theme, translated into a distinct expressive autonomy perceived by the object to which it fulfills the spatial boundaries, are immanent to the processes of visual perception.

Dependence on a conception with specific limits, that of self-knowledge following the reflection of a mirror that magnifies every detail of life favorable to the creation of a work of great value, is the only way to communicate that something always beyond all possible attributes to the superlative, literary and aesthetic. Something I can only convey deeply and persistently to the ineffable murmur of a forgotten conversation with God.

Throughout history, we have permanently experienced these two forms of life, by themselves an authentic fervor stemming from the beliefs of an esthetician who can forever wipe away all the signs that time has left behind, but he does not do it because of the beauty of an ideal called simply: immortality. One that comes from the common fund of all the crazy events through which mankind has passed, evident from a sphere of perennial values, and a differential one that has been created on this basis.

And as reality has to be expressed in artistic terms, without which the expressive virtues of the line and the extent of the symbolic relations expressed as a means of language could not exist, then I can formulate it as follows: each element becomes stronger by contrast with another element.

Leadership: Do you take into account that state of being everywhere in the image chosen as the background of existence by expressly defining the notion of "circumstance" on which the values of universal constants are based?

I first met Master Rembrandt, a shy and silent man, under the dark canopy of the vanity of this world, trying to improve his chiaroscuro technique. He was "the only painter who could afford to mix the mud with the brightness of eyes, fire with ashes, or make the colors freshly shine." I have not stopped wondering how a man who has been troubled by so many worries and so much poverty has been able to bring more information and profoundness to shaping the historical image than King Solomon who was unparalleled in wealth and wisdom.

In the history of the Battle of Austerlitz, known as the Battle of the Three Emperors, one of Napoleon's greatest victories, I made myself noticed through the fierceness with which the look of the painter François Gérard wanted to achieve that unique fixed space-time frame, despite the dynamism of a nation in full extension, by immortalizing the reflexive, determined and visionary nature of a god in his unique magnificence.

My story continues as in 1001 nights, a slave took my hand and took me to a hall that was only adorned with beauty and lines and perfection, to "The Terrace of the Seraglio", where painter Jean-Leon Gerome captured the most vibrant moment of a forgotten era.

When you are caught in the living mirage of the universe, the only way to fix reality is the color that you attribute to the subject of a life that is a part of you.

Undoubtedly, I have lived a quite agitated previous life. I was there when the Achaeans were able to enter the besieged city, with the trickery of the Trojan horse, indiscriminately massacring the inhabitants of Troy and desecrating temples, a gesture that later drew the wrath of the gods. I did not miss the fall of Constantinople, when Sultan Mehmet declared that he was "the only law", and that God is not even able to disprove his power with the earthly people.

Perhaps I am one of those who, at all times, continued to live, because the universe always leaves behind a remnant of its mysterious boundlessness to scatter less than one hundredth of its mass into the conscience of mortals. However, no artist has been able to capture my presence over the centuries, even though my two constants – persistence and recurrence – extend to those written in the books of eternity.

Sometimes I feel like a sea of which I have understood only a wave, like the artist who is detached from the events of reality, immersing himself in a kind of empty space to imaginatively reconstruct a history, worldly passages towards a unique experience of knowledge which gives him the chance to reconstitute himself as a kind of "secret keeper" in the abyss of a time without time.

Only God has a resonance on the man lost in a world that eternally relives its past, like a ball spinning around its own axis, until He himself gets replaced by a man. But not by any man, by a grandiose artist of the sublime in the art of exploring new realms, seen as a prior totalization of experience in time and space.

The soul seems to be ruled by the same sense of predestination experienced by Mika Waltari's hero:

"I, Turms, the immortal, think it will be so. Even if what I wrote will disappear, even if the ink dissolves, even if the reed paper is broken, even if the languages in which I have written will be erased from the memory of the people, writing these words, I bound each stone of life to the happenings I want to remember. I will find myself when I return."

The need for steadfastness and deepening of spiritual reality is the experience that you experience at the moment of a departure from things worldly culminating in the closeness to things immortal.

The Aesthetics Of An Astral Experience is the testimony of a life dedicated to art, on two parallel planes – of creation by image and of writing by remembrance of secular, millenary information that we have come to forget.

The only possible experience, unlimited in infinite time and space, poured into a universal vibration, is the attempt to reconstruct history by ingeniously exploiting the relationship between imagination and reality, transposed into an image that turns the life of some into a truly immortal story.

The Aesthetics Of Duplication

On February 23, 2018

Try to set new reference criteria to the dimension of the creation you experience, capturing a different way of being of the same nature that defines you.

With every passing day I was seeing myself as someone else, I would have wanted myself to be someone else and, eventually, for there to be just me, an abstract construction, an "unreal" that allowed for the understanding of the fact that the real can only exist because it has something surreal within it, an astral revelation, a free spirit doubled by the temptation to project itself into the future.

This tireless, ever-changing process, the state of always being something else in the relationship between the hidden of an own world reaching its limits and the adventure of a mysterious calling towards a fulfillment that requests its absolute, was meant to unravel the mystery of reunited and sovereign virtues in a same space of purity called "Naturalism Sui Generis".

My inventive mind, under the diversity of artistic expressions and inexhaustible sources of information, pursued this strange being that arose not so much from the naturalism of the image of the highest degree of expressiveness attributed to the affective charge, but from the enigmatic association of two compatible artistic trends: symbolism and surrealism, making more than obvious the idea of cohesion in a single whole called: "The Violation of the Plausible."

Each level of creation constitutes a line in the cache of a trail from the depths of the hidden areas of madness, within the limits of reality captured in several hypostases. A line that, by drawing waveforms, is secretly in search of a relationship with the vision of a still unfinished composition, producing an echo of the unexpected around events and influences of the artistic communication environment.

The line helps experiences take on a material form, increased intensity, metamorphizing into other forms that acquire an identity through expression emanated in simultaneous double rotation: the symbol, which gives expressions an overflowing ambiguity, and a prefiguration of the outward manifestation of the being that transcends the limited personality.

Leadership: Do you consider the argumentative context in which you speak of yourself as an "artwork", further sketching the lines of an aesthetic concerned with self-stylization through the subjective modeling of the outer Universe?

With that being said, I get down to concluding: I was the index of an Ego belonging to a parallel entity that was in the art world, proposed by an outburst of the soul, framed between the lines of a possible interpretation of the imaginary universe, indefinitely biological. This entity evolved through the play of ambiguous metamorphoses of various faces and silhouettes that some of those who contemplated them would have given them a single note of style: unlimited hazard.

My main mistake, given by the forces of the sensuous that exerted an increasing pressure on the apparent, was to believe in an imaginary that does its utmost to replace the living, painfully deceiving reality. As if I had to discover the perspective of a new deified creature, symbolically represented in a manner that does not have to copy reality, but which gains its existence based on the principle of associations and surrealist correlations, by combining perfectly veritable elements.

A true artwork is a result of the emotional load produced by the symbolic association of two opposite but compatible realities used to transcend limited personality.

Borges attributes the version of Hernandez's poem ("Tadeo Isidoro Cruz's Biography"), his own meaning. In the poem, soldier Cruz joins fugitive Martin Fierro, because he cannot commit the crime of killing a brave man. Thus, he returns to his own past. Finally, he sees his own face and the ending of the story gains the greatness of a revelation. There is a moment in every man's life: when we find out who we are: Cruz understand his destiny at this moment and contemplates, as in a mirror, his eternal face. Seeing Fierro's frightening face, he understands that "he was the other". [1]

The ceaseless contemplation of the supreme reality is a proof of the sensitivity with which you approach everything that surrounds you, imagining yourself carried by the murmur of matter in the momentum towards complexity, capturing another way of being of the same nature.

As a side note, this type of association with a "model entity", presented as a still life, has its precedent in the technique of cubist collage that casts doubt only on illusory realism, presenting beings and things in a manner in which they have not been perceived: through various elements and geometric figures, continuous or discontinuous lines, graphical signs, points of force and orientation outlines to denote the spatial depth

Beyond the subtlest covering of the meanings drawn from the tissue of a spiritual vision that allows us to experience the state of profound unity, there is an alchemy of the creative act like an Alter Ego that you are aware you can never separate yourself from.

Michelangelo created David as sort of his duplication in an eternal life, in an attempt to rise above the ephemeral. What better way to explore our complex personality than by transporting it into an alternative reality, in a parallel world?

The creative act is a sum of self-perceptions embodied in an expressive doubling of an individual experience that is rendered in the form of a message to the outside: "Earn your Eternity ! "

The Aesthetics Of Duplication addresses the space inherent in the creation from which the future materializes, related to the principle of symbolic association taken to a paroxysm of ambiguous situations by combining real elements with unreal ones, often using the technique of surrealist or cubist collage.

The Aesthetics Of Quality In Leadership

Because your hand – your wisdom being accustomed to gathering flowers – would not know how to sow thorns. *

Leadership: Do you defend the knowledge that gives you the freedom to customize an image against your own beliefs about the value you give to a creation that devours its creator?

Are you a "second-hand" artist? Are you a pseudo-alchemist trying to produce gold leadership without Ariadne's thread? Do you keep moving in a dark corridor? Are you limited by the "creative nothing"? Do you exaggerate any of your inclinations?

I have written about the fragment above before, but this time I want to highlight the idea of achieving perfection through a context favorable to the quality of creation, as a denigration of kitsch. Most of the time we do an unimportant work, we build an emotion-based charm to turn art into a particular event. At the same time, we focus more than we should on the central pieces that build an artistic ideal, but we omit the most important thing, namely the accessory of the background that ensures a complete image, with a note of splendor and originality.

A true artist is guided in his creative activity according to the idea that the greatness of a fulfillment is conditioned by the value of the content of ideas and feelings of the final image must be kept in a higher reality, one that stretches in space and time. On the other hand, a "second-hand" artist is guided by the idea that "what I do not know does not exist" or that "if no one is perfect, then neither the work should be perfect."

Only an in-depth analysis of the content of your work will highlight the difference between what is authentic and what is false. The fake is a creation that does not show the close connection between the artist and the spectator who longs for a completely different universe.

Do you have an achievement that can rise to the status of "work" ? Or do you limit yourself to be just a consumer who, like parasitic plants, suck their food, take it from the works of others ? Haven't you lost your sense of values?

A study on your own philosophy, a study on your own being seen from both outside and inside, will confirm your beliefs, will show the level you are at: beginner, intermediate or expert.

Before designing an artistic work, you need to make sure that its completion does not become your most feared enemy, and that your entire knowledge is not something that happens at random.

Where can the bright, saving light squirt from? Can you assign your level of knowledge a new functional form?

To customize an image against your own beliefs means to refer to an ideal of satiation in letting yourself be dominated by the greatness of a vision, but without having the ability to establish yourself as a central pillar of the vision. In this case, your knowledge is subject to weight limitations in exposing a theme that will withstand the passage of time.

And in order to assign to your level of knowledge a functional form, based on the revelations and ideas with which you deserve to dress your creation, first offer yourself fully to a personal enlightenment experience, such as transgressing the "immediate", to understand why reality has a dimension and a certain form in every part of life. If nature has given you as much as you can imagine, you will find a creative landmark in anything that looks like the lighting of a match.

When you relate to the act of creation you have to be careful not to choose things at random, but by passing them through the filter of an aesthetic of the bizarre, the feeling, the irregular, the astonishment as a spontaneous reaction to a reality that few anticipate.

How, for example, would you see yourself in the hypostasis of a rose to be described by the language of a being descending from God?

This explains the reason of an artist who unites the visual and the truth with the unexpected of a feeling that encompasses you when you are left without a reply, when you are left without possibilities of interpretation of the work exposed to reality.

A creation that devours its creator is similar to expressing language and artistic meaning in a way that does not facilitate the comprehension of the information and does not lead to keeping it in memory for a long time.

It's worth quoting here an Internet user: "Everything you have to do is to transform yourself in an antenna, through which you can receive precisely that frequency wave which manifests the reality you have chosen and broadcast it, live it, be that reality that others see around themselves."

The Aesthetics Of Quality In Leadership is similar to the aesthetics of quality in art: you must "play" with the mind of the one who discovered you, make him think that he will manage to align himself to a reality from which he has no escape because he is already a part from a "Touching Masterpieces" experience.

Quality in leadership, as in art, first of all means conforming to the requirements of a high standard of "thinking differently".

The Affective Values Of Artists

On July 27, 2023

The way the painter expresses himself in the use of the brush technique serves as an argument to give his features a certain depth and subtlety in a theme that includes the most meaningful human emotions and experiences.

This fragment from Alexandru Vlahuță's book is emotional, because it has something magical, a special view, a place of a story where you get lost and find yourself at the same time, a well-individualized space maintained with that sensitivity of a painter who outlines the experiences with expressiveness, with emotion, with delicacy and subtlety.

Nicolae Grigorescu was, in his own way, very cold. Winter was whiter than the grave to him. He rents a workshop in Paris. He had collected, from so many travels, a lot of art things: old furniture from Normandy, tapestries, oriental fabrics, carpets, weapons, dishes, and, with his gift of enlivening things by the way he knew how to group them, harmonize them between themselves, he created an artistic interior, of peace and dream, where everything spoke softly, with a voice from another time.

The poet of peace, kindness and gentleness, the poet of light and the blue sky is called to sing the darkness and the storm of death, to find on his palette the colors for the most terrible sight that the still untamed wilderness of the human race can present. And there was no painter in the world who could have found them better than him. It seems that all his life he had done nothing but this. Along with the soldiers, facing death, he watched almost all the atrocities of the war, he understood who the real heroes were, and he devoted all the love and all the admiration of his soul to them; them, those dry and hearty peasants, who threw themselves frantically into the arms of death, they, above all, were immortalized in his powerful work - the most moving epic of the bravery of our nation. Yes. Those were his brothers.

And how they were alike him ! Good brothers, like him, putting their whole soul into what they were doing, working hard, fighting hard, sacrificing themselves, without any thought of reward, feeling at all times, over their destiny, a coming commandment further on. And he commands more fiercely than the one that the circumstances call for. Faced with the terrible tragedy of the war, a new painter was waking up in Grigorescu.

Leadership: Does your creation reflect those states given by situations or circumstances that shed light on the concrete content of your thinking and that impress a certain gravity, a certain character, a certain coloration and own meaning?

Affective values, through a psychological theme, therefore characterized by a free aesthetic consciousness, represent a category of values that show the emotional or affective state of a person in accordance with certain things, ideas, behaviors or circumstances. You must take these into account in order to be able to devote yourself fully, without obstacles, to the vocation that you enliven with talent and imagination, with artistic mastery, giving it life.

These values, rare and honest, may vary by artist, depending on the work allocated to the act of creation, reflecting the artist's preferences and subjective assessments of composition and balance. Positive or negative, unusual or unexpectedly broad, the affective values I will talk about next can influence the attitudes and behaviors of artists, especially if I take into account their preferences and subjective evaluations for the depth of perspectives they offer.

For example, if a painter attributes a positive affective value to his connection to art, the kinship between the brush and color, he will have a favorable attitude towards the environment and towards the theme addressed, seeking to spend more time in the middle of nature, than with friends. On the other hand, if he attributes a negative affective value to kitsch, to the falsity with which art is treated, then he will have a negative attitude towards lies, such as the images "on the packaging", and will thus avoid being surrounded by "advertisements".

Indeed, the affective values with which the artist is endowed can be influenced by the life experiences, the social environment, the education and the culture in which he grew up and with which he has interwoven his spiritual needs, they can also be the subject of change and evolution during his life (with whom he agrees to make a pact of great spiritual and divine closeness at the same time). In other words, affective values represent the subjective and emotional evaluations that the artist attributes to some aspects of his life, having a significant influence on the behavior and on the choices he makes to become more creative, more idealistic in terms of the capacity of art to bring positive change to the world.

Leadership: Can the image that your creation reflects fascinate viewers if your personal image itself preserves the traces of the emotional life prior to the subject transposed on the canvas?

A true painter can base his work and creations on a wide variety of affective values inclined towards the use of subtlety in painting, without which the risk of falling into gross caricature would have been enormous. Below are just a few examples of affective values that a painter may hold, in a majority percentage, although the importance and priorities of making works may vary from one artist to another, depending on experiences, interests and individual perspectives.

Aesthetic appreciation: A painter of great finesse especially appreciates the harmony and beauty arising from the act of creation. He seeks to produce unique works that appeal from an aesthetic point of view and that provide visual and emotional pleasure, especially through an overall environment dominated by tranquility and harmony.

Personal expression: The ability of the painter to express his emotions, thoughts and visions through the use of colors, shapes and composition, in a symbolism with hidden meanings, is perhaps the greatest value of his art. I say this because everything the painter has to share is made up of his most immediate experiences, wanderings and passions. In this way, the painter tries to convey his artistic identity and his authenticity in the works made as "novelty".

Emotional communication: A skilled painter succeeds in expressing intense feelings and causing affective reactions in the public, only if the personal image preserves the traces of the emotional life prior to the subject he is addressing. Often, he uses light, colors and other artistic elements to convey joy, sadness, melancholy or amazement, knowing that any interpretation of the painting requires complicity on the part of the viewer.

Exploration and experimentation: A painter can show exploration and experimentation in his art, meaning that he is able to take a surprising and open approach to the artistic process, seeking new directions, techniques, styles or themes. Wanting to expand his limits and discover new ways of expression, the painter must leave his comfort zone and explore new possibilities and ideas in his artistic works, so that he can more easily cross the dividing line between realistic, abstract and impressionist style.

Social and cultural impact: A painter of great finesse appreciates the ability of art to convey powerful messages and cause social change, especially when the message is repeated a great number of times in his works. Through his creative work he seeks to address social, political or cultural issues and inspire reflection and awareness in his viewers, provided he does not soar too far in his "madness" to distant planets and worlds.

The sensitivity and the story of the place: Indeed, the ability to observe and represent moods in works that suggest a certain perspective on the transformation of man into an emotional mirror, into an aesthetic expression of the soul, interweaving the reality of faces in a symphony of colors. Moreover, the painter cultivates the sensitivity and ability to detach, know and understand the beauty of nature, not only the secret life of individuals, because man cannot fully understand himself without the connection with nature, especially in a painted story.

Empathy and fostering dialogue: An excellent artist seeks to bring out his capacity to feel and connect emotionally with others through an explicit affective attitude towards his expressive potential (through the possibilities of expressing his creativity, emotions, thoughts and personal vision in his artistic works).

Through the dialogue between vibrant and subtle colors, expressive lines and flowing forms, light effects and mysterious shadows, the painter seeks to convey deep emotions and provide an authentic emotional experience to his viewers, expressing his understanding and compassion for the human condition through the art of turning the mixture of pictorial elements into a captivating visual harmony.

Leadership represents that exchange of values between you and your creation, from which the interpretation of the work of art becomes a captivating journey in the world of sensations and emotions, but also a guide to introspection and self-discovery.

Affective Values have a major impact, either positive or negative, on the way the painter perceives himself, compared to the world around him. So, here I mean "self-perception" - the way the painter perceives himself and the world is a very complex aspect of the painter's psychology. It seems to be related to the attitude and motivation with which he insists on highlighting a subject meant to trouble the minds of the viewers.

In general, if you really believe that friendship is important to you, and that it should be an open circle towards all humanity to include all people as brothers, then you will seek to spend time with certain friends. And conversely, if you consider that lying has a negative affective value, so it cannot be incorporated into a picture by means of metaphor, then you will develop a negative attitude towards lying and towards lying people, and you will certainly avoid "lying" to reality in your creations.

Therefore, affective values represent a category of values that show the emotional or affective state of a person in relation to certain subjects, things, ideas, behaviors or circumstances, all of which are part of the arsenal of one's own free decision to communicate one's work to the public in an original way. These fairly pronounced values, realistic, devoted to a particular perspective, can vary depending on the person and reflect the painter's subjective preferences and evaluations for portraiture, illustrating strong emotions and inner connections between him and the subject.

The Alarm Bell

On April 03, 2009

Increase substantially the source of your personal value, accessing those serious inner funds which support the balance of your own being.

Only Kevin Lomax was able to recognize this great truth: if the game played by himself differs from the game of others, then the risk of "injury" will increase considerably when he does not properly comply with the rules imposed by them.

In fact, Kevin was the newest employee at the law firm "Milton, Chadwick Waters", as well as the only one who has the great "honor" to get better acquainted with John Milton, its manager. The latter, like a magician used to exploit the credulity and naivety of those around him and taking advantage of their qualities, was carrying out his vile plan: that of exercising his negative influence on their souls, putting his mark on their entire existence.

If you watched the movie „The Devil's Advocate (1997)", then you certainly remember the most important and most difficult step that Kevin did to get rid of the negative influence of the "Devil", in the person of John Milton. He followed his true feelings, irrespective of his own needs and the status he acquired when he concluded the contract with Milton.

In other words, Kevin won the fight against the devil from a higher point of view, through a deliberate intellectual action: he chose to exist only in the plane of the absolute, that is, to cause a rupture in the continuity of his being, a rupture in the dimension of space-time, a rupture in the succession of credible events, and another rupture in the meaningful-significant order.

Leadership: Can you turn the struggle you are waging against the "force that rules you" into an act of self-affirmation, in which there is a real and an ideal side?

I think that the movie wants to emphasize a very important thing, namely that each of us has two options for shaping his own personality, good and evil, ethical or unethical. Our choice depends on many educational, cultural, social and other factors. But each of us takes the final decision, our conscience being the supreme judge.

Throughout our lives, we can slip on a dangerous slope, voluntarily or involuntarily leaving ourselves manipulated by others (the manipulation techniques being various), by petty interests, but each time, the supreme judge always wide-awake must ring the "alarm bell" and help us return to a self-imposed and freely-accepted normal state. If we slip on a dangerous slope, the climb back is not impossible, but sometimes it is very difficult. But it's never too late...

To meet all the specific qualities of a leader, you must always watch over your own inner universe, your own way of thinking, your own "arbitrator" – who can remove you from the game with your own destiny, your own being. Learn first to have patience with the spiritual things, follow your true feelings, aware of what is happening around you and the risks involved in aligning yourself to the practice of others, otherwise you risk hurting your own "self", which will hurt you very much.

To cause a rupture in the continuity of his being means to detach yourself from what once seemed so promising, to detach yourself from what others want for you, and to allow your heart to calm down. On the other hand, to cause a rupture in the meaningful-significant order means not to give in to the pressure of evil on yourself, to fight against evil with the means of good, so that what individualizes you is what you expect to find in yourself when you have not yet healed your remaining "wounds": that sensitivity that tries to hide behind an imposed hardness.

The act of self-affirmation comprises a real and an ideal side. The real side is given by the way you expose yourself to a new situation from which you have to get out, to discover yourself, to surpass yourself and from which to spread a blessing. And the ideal side is given by what makes you live with a clear conscience; it is about the freedom to choose; it is what makes you a committed person.

The Alarm Bell is the decisive element which determines your success or failure personally and professionally. Its role is to "wake you up" when your orientation senses in professional life fall asleep or are deceived, and to warn you that it's time to distinguish good from bad and what you know from what you don't know about others around you.

Just as the tension measuring instrument controls the blood rate and pulses, so your interior defense mechanism against negative influences controls the pace of your life and the pulse of your leadership. In order to achieve the state of self-fulfillment, you need serious interior funds to support your balance, to substantially increase your potential as human being and as leader – the source of your personal value which, at the same time, must ensure you a high level of protection against your spiritual "corrosion".

Conclusion: A well-defined personality, which is based on ethical principles, will always have a sensible alarm system which will alert you whenever it will detect a danger of deviation from the right path. "The alarm bell" is formed concomitantly with our personality and it is directly related to the path that we consented to follow.

The Alchemist (II)

On July 17, 2017

Target with your great will on the whole of yourself so that you gain the privilege of an advantageous positioning in the realm of the truths contained in the divine revelation.

Everything is constituted in an art with a three-fold appropriate proposition to three planes: body, spirit and matter, which through the dual nature of light and its various possibilities of expression in a figurative manner make possible both the dialogue between Heaven and Earth, as well as the transmutation through amalgamation with noble metals.

I am myself under the empire of art, that is, I myself constitute as an act of confession of an artistic believe: I believe in the destiny of my creation. Alchemy, under the pressure of a constant called Experimentum Crucis, is an action to eliminate the causes of any non-conformity between heaven and earth, between void and full, between the unique and universal, between fleeting and eternal, procured to me by the very moment and yearning desire to write. Having the privilege of an advantageous positioning in the realm of the truths contained in divine revelation.

Generally speaking, it is a determination that symbolically gathers all generic, theoretical and rhetorical positionalities, involving the refusal to separate the subject from the object and the search for analogies, rather than the causes of an action or state of fact. A legitimate way to acquire a name, a plus of knowledge and brilliance, arming me with the enthusiasm of a sublime feeling that ignites the secret fire from which eternity is born.

I can look in the light of sublime truth and accept myself as a small portion of reason that manifests in nature, imagining some of the creation of an artist who has proposed to paint the world in the vivid colors of precious stones and noble metals, of human stories, supported by a visual approach that communicates spectacularly to a meeting with the only meaning of all the illusions of this world: God.

Leadership: Do you manage to see the novelty that you are passionate about that has not ceased to be in your sight?

Even though I am being overused by that genius intuition that captures the causes of body movement through divine action, diverse in its effects and unique in the reason someone engages in such personal work, I think everything has the role of teaching me both many things... surprisingly... about myself still.

In my sight lies the truth of divine revelation, but it can also make the miracle of my own enlightenment unseen.

It's as if I discovered the key to an unexpected interpretation, the element favorable to the calcination of gold and silver, without translating the enigmatic texts of hermetic experimenters in terms of natural reproducible processes in the laboratory. The lucidity of the consequences of blind obedience to the test of fire, nourished from the fight with the dream, I leave to the account of the Terrestrial Heaven Treaty, interpreted in ten ways, which overlaps with claims of a priority in the completion of a new agreement.

Great knowledge is the way out of the labyrinth of reality's uncertainty by completing a new understanding of one's own person from the point of view of a higher order.

Particularly, I tend to think that I have something of the wealth of a person who feels where others think, which builds a sense where others believe that everything is definitive without eliminating universal causality. I calculate the molarity of a solution obtained by mixing the extracted gold ferment with the extracted silver ferment, just as a skillful hand of a physicist weighs all parts of the universe in a straight line, harmonizing exemplarily the laws of motion with the nature of bodies.

So, there is an understanding that continues in many respects mirroring the shards of a transparent globe that depicts the divine work. At the same time, they master all artistic means that can open up new horizons of interpretation and understanding of universal creation and human dimension, giving art-passionate people the opportunity to see the world from the point of view of the painter who stands in front of a rock portion, and exclaim with ardor: What a great wonder my work will be !

Leadership: Do you build a picture of "heavenly light" so that you can see yourself in everything that, without you, no one else can see?

Obviously, I'm pretty amazing at making facts and little things a hamper in the path of greatness of ideas, an immortalized gloss of crystalline waters, called The Sacred Spring creating freely and not imitatively, manufacturing gold first as symbolic, like geniuses who find their inspiration in the chaos of strange and fascinating encounters with divinity.

A miracle maker, who must also be an alchemist and a magician, must submerge himself in a timeless setting by building his aesthetics of nocturnal luminosity after the postulate that the microcosm of man contains the energies of the macrocosm, imparting to his creations the seal of authenticity both in terms of content and form.

Vissarion Grigorievici Belinski, founder of the aesthetic program of realism in Russian literature, observes:

"There are very few people who really possess the capacity of creative activity independent of their aptitude. They look at everything in a somewhat peculiar, original way, they see in everything just that which, without them, no one else can see, and after them, everyone else can see, and marvel that they did not see that thing before. These people are not at all cunning or strange: they understand everything simply, but their simple understanding seems to all, at first, very complicated, and sometimes ridiculous and absurd. But then it seems so simple that there is no fool who does not wonder how he didn't think about it himself – it's just that simple after all ! "

The heavenly light symbolizes the knowledge that you create, improvise, or paint in a context of multiplying the initiation sequence into a superior existence that you can give it a great sense even if it hides madness. But this madness is a product of alchemy that only artists have the skill to render in various forms, according to an untouchable ideal. An ideal of distinction. An ideal to change the world in an original way.

Alchemy requires you to look patiently for a new approach to the interaction of knowledge, faith, and truth, so as to reveal in them the message of a higher order.

The Alchemist is the artist that sees everything in a somewhat unique, original manner, and sees in everything all that, without him, no one else can see. And after him, everyone else can see it.

The Alchemist (I)

On July 15, 2017

Polish the form of creation that you support and show through a new reality in order to demonstrate the direct connection between what inspires you and what you represent as an artist.

I try my stylus full of invisible ink on one of the sheets of destiny, constituting the profound meaning and cause of a falling star. The beautiful in the art of giving different names to similar discoveries, attributes, or symbolic ones, from the nightmare of a chaotic world that the magic takes on, is committed and done by the power of the word to be guessed. The mercury which helps extract gold string is a string of the row of "guessed Word."

Instead of respecting a certain order that governs the laws of chemistry or physics, they continuously pursue the paradigm of the infinite springs from the hidden laws of art to build new points of reference, new methods of melting the sacred metal with the help of purified matter. Alchemy conquers and saturates the whole realm of my reality, in one part or another, of the ability to rise above the limits of the pact with a sort of hidden determination that reminds one of Hannibal: "Things that seem impossible become possible if you see them from a different perspective."

The rare beauty of the Divine, the triple finality of the Great Opera, you need to know how to see it where it does not exist, and its quest and effort to create offers the prospect of prolonging life. Or what is there beyond an absolutely new understanding of chiaroscuro, what comes from careful hermeneutics of the vibrations of the notion of secret? What exactly hides the power to see beyond appearances, other than the acute desire to merge with infinite space?

About what I noticed by the secret fire in an almost prophetic revelation, the universe would only have to replicate: "I do not commit myself to explain any breaking of symmetry between word and being, but admit the extremes of an agitated reality at the control points of the form of interpreting my role in a deep mystery."

Leadership: Does your predominant character stand by the suggestion of a permanent trust in an intrinsic, vital motivation that, although permanently flaming, retains its fascination potential?

The unfinished scale of so much irreversibly accumulated matter from the conclusions of careful analysis of an immense sum of consecutive moments, this first link of the chain that binds me to universal culture, supplements the linguistic substance with new elements such as the agglomeration of a multitude of meanings and the waiting time of making miracles.

Writing, judging by its profound range of characteristics, captures the inner, hidden and dark hopes of souls, and finally, all about the unseen currents of consciousness.

A visual representation of a moment, a perversion between the contradictions inherent to the human being that are excluded and at the same time conditional, a reflection on the world from the diversion of the "mysteries" of the universe. An immortalization of the charm or harmony that results not from the external finishing of a new linguistic construction, but from the inner living force instilled by the creative power of the divine.

Here is the splendor of an alchemy that tries its richness of meanings in continual calcination, manifesting its effects on the organic growth of the volume of differences more or less perceptible of conception and vision, as pastel colors, by virtue of seeking the perfection of merging myself with the Great Whole.

The validity of the signature that best represents you, from which you want to generate the true image of a still insufficiently degraded reality, corresponds to the motivation you have beyond the words you express in a code of abstract symbols.

With the enigma that the pursuit of perfection, as a desire to reach the impossible, as a means of access to immortality, which I could call the "the art of the unpredictable" cut from the extension of the duration of a chrysalid's flight, I can make an elixir of long life. They can produce that valueless, inferior and obscure transmutation of pure, noble and bright gold.

My motivation is the revolutionary change in how to perceive notions such as reality, space, time, matter, universe or God. Changing, more precisely, the rules of the game.

Leadership: Does your thought of gaining more reputation fall into the category of genius that uncovers a new reality under the action of a true belief, not yet suspected?

If you pay attention to a hidden thought, it grows more and more control over your mind, throwing yourself in a permanent confrontation with what exists inside a particular universe, between vanity and despair that the artist envelops in trying to determine the making of a masterpiece.

Thought, itself a part of universal creation, if exposed to the light of a superlevel, falls into the category of genius that uncovers a new reality under the action of a true faith, yet unknown, yet by no one suspected.

And so, between science and alchemy, haunted by the hidden thought of escape from the concrete of immediate reality, I entered into the skin of a character crafted by John Fowles. I approach a crossroads, a similar moment that modern novelists solve in a double system. I feel more and more caught between a past I know and an unknown future. From here comes the sensation that disturbs me, not to be my own master, to be a character in the song someone else writes.

From a famous alchemist in search of eternal youth, he bases his essence on the subject of an endless story that attests to the originality and authenticity of a higher "partner" who can feel, more than ever before, the fire of a new understanding, so that it touches the heart of anyone under the spell of the only repeat range to infinity: spiritual growth.

Leadership is a path of the relationship between understanding and conviction that transforms into that experience of being someone else, expressing your relationship with the genius of a great masterpiece.

The Alchemist refers to the form of creation that you support and show through a new reality or through a fictitious force introduced formally into the magic of reality, so as to prove a direct link between what inspires you and what you are as an artist.

The Alchemy Of Living Matter

On April 15, 2009

Develop a science that is supported by the high pillars of understanding the depth of the connections between things so that you can win the race between what is revealed through reflection and what is found through experimentation.

Have you ever tried to water flowers using only distilled water? I have read about experiences of this kind made by a German named von Herzeele by the end of the past century, then re-launched after the 1950s by Professor Pierre Baranger, the head of the organic chemistry department of the Polytechnic School of Paris.

What idea ! I put some seeds to germinate in a cuvette in which there were only sulfur and distilled water crystals, and in another cuvette, I put the same kind of seeds, but in the soil watered with ordinary water. Interestingly, sulfur seeds did not only germinate, but although we only watered them with distilled water all the time, they had grown. And just wait till you see what I did with them.

After the little plants have grown a bit, I took them out of both cuvettes and burned them separately. That's what we biologists do, so we can find out through fine analysis what chemical elements each plant contains. Well, we found exactly the same chemicals specific to the species in each other.

*From here it can be concluded that the plants in the first cuvette, although fed only with sulfur and distilled-mineralized water, have produced the necessary chemical elements themselves. Plants are real atomic micro-factories, in which, through low energy transmutations, they produce in the most discrete way the chemical elements they need. **

Leadership: Leadership: Do you only limit yourself to the qualitative transformations of matter, without trying to explain the unusual outcomes to be subject to explanatory hypothesis?

The matter that forms the subject of science consists of all natural or artificial means that contribute to the functioning of a particular organ or the way in which one phenomenon occurs or another. In any segment of nature, where the bodies are connected through a mistaken process called "confusion", the scholar has to make his entrance through a more innovative method of tracing the gear in which a principle or concept resides, going beyond immediate situation.

The famous American inventor, Thomas Edison said:"I didn't fail. I discovered 10.000 ways that don't work." Even if leadership focuses more on those personality traits that constitute an advantage in the world of business and leadership, this doesn't mean it misses the scientific training part, which can validate new approaches and new views on different aspects of the world or life.

These aspects contribute to the evaluation of your own functionality from the perspective of a thought that is actually involved in the event of revealing a new attitude to the creation of the world.

Don't settle only with admiring the face of leadership that received the most exposure to the highest scientific level, thought the iron lattice of the fence symbolizing the inability to explore new knowledge frontiers. Try to unite different parts of space and time in order to get a phenomenon of constructive interference, important for the actual analysis of a wider reality. Try to make brilliant proof of a creative practice that enriches the culture and understanding of the world. Try to use the event that will bring together several ideas in a continuous evolution and expansion that they will form the theoretical background of sustainable development.

Leadership: Are you represented by an extremely wide field of far-sighted viewing, consistent with maintaining a comfortable reflection zone for near-sighted viewing?

The most promising perspective of ascension are conditioned and maintained only by adopting a new distinct and particular way of "being" in contexts that test your patience, your true enterprising courage, convictions and resistance in front of what is unknown. The qualitative transformations of matter can be an enigma that is revealed to us in the last scene of the act of enunciating new theories, related to the fact that the given image of the world becomes through thinking permeated by increasingly daring and quirky concepts and ideas.

You will be able to clear out the rooms of leadership connected to the network of supplying and distributing innovative ideas that promote your professional independence and career advancement, only if you set your goal to explore and promote scientific and rational thought that will thereafter attract the interest of a wide circle of specialists in the field.

Of course, as far as the actual size of the self-assessment resources that you have available and their spread in the area of expertise, in contact with the universe of a favorable context of creation, does not exceed the maximum size of development accepted by living in imaginary.

A far-sighted view opts for the explicit consecration of a finding which, imposed by deduction and prior regulation of the sampling, can be the object of a transmutation of elements into each other. It must be compatible with maintaining a comfortable reflection area for near-sighted viewing by the spirit of reasoning and logical demonstration that forces you to draw a conclusion about a particular effect on the basis of knowing the actual cause.

Science requires you to create a different perspective of looking at the environment, taking into account the distance at which things happen to perfectly link and that is close to their exposure to the trial-by-fire of doubt.

The Alchemy Of Living Matter singularizes the existence of a practice involving the awareness of a form of intervention in the course of nature and the extension of a certain right over a territory which, for most individuals, is subject to various restrictions, causing anxiety.

But for others, the same territory suggests the unlimited, an enigma that is hardly described as a possibility to discover new combinations of rules, forms, effects, methods, conditions and factors that can generate new views on the complexity and understanding of the world.

The All-encompassing Spheres Of Human Nature

On April 13, 2014

Keep your distance from the complex and overwhelming world of "exile", setting a mystical and profound relationship with the deepest of feelings of a meticulously sized life.

Jean Valjean had never loved anyone. For twenty years, he was alone in the world. He'd never been a father, lover, husband or friend. In prison, he was nasty, crabby, chaste, ignorant and savage. The heart of this old convict was righteous. His sister and her children had left only a faded, distant memory, which ended up almost entirely dissipated. He'd did everything in his power to find them again and, failing to do so, he'd forgotten them. Such was human nature. The other dubious feelings of youth, if he'd ever had one, had crumbled.

In turn, Cosette herself became someone else, without even realizing, the poor thing. As all children, akin to the young sprouts of life, that cling to anything, she tried to love. She failed. Everyone had rejected her: The Thenardians, their children and other children. Nothing and no-one wanted to hear anything from her ever again. It is sad that we must say it, as we have done so before: at eight years of age, she had a cold heart. And the fault was not hers. It wasn't the ability to love she lacked, but, alas, propitious circumstances.

Fate had merged these two uprooted existences, set apart by age and similar through misery and engaged them with its all-encompassing power. Indeed, one surpassed the other. By instinct, Cosette searched for a father, such as, by instinct, Jean Valjean wanted a child. Their meeting meant a reunion.

*From the moment, these two souls met, they have realized that they cannot live without each other.

Leadership: Can you turn your back to the wall that surrounds you incessantly, considering the deep understanding of a vision and a state of mind that helps you to pay close attention to the gift of life?

While a part of your life is engaged in the act of separation from the world, whose content is determined by weakening the will to settle claims of its own higher self, which is required to be followed strictly, another part (that of leadership which includes medium and long term vision), helps you better enrich your personality through the relationship with what you expect to offer and get from others.

Vision is the possible scenario of a meeting with yourself in an environment in which the genesis of your thinking gives birth to a model of association with the beauty of an experience of attachment to a powerful motivating force. By extension, the gift of life is mainly related to the vibration of the intersection of two pure consciousnesses in the same single reality.

Whoever said that "Everything you offer, reflects the consciousness from which you offer" was not only right on one account, but on many. Firstly, because the pursuit of lucidity and tenderness determines a specific vulnerability, above all agreements in life, delaying access to the unseen world, preventing you to slip into the abyss of negation or ignoring the true values. And then, because thinking based on convictions explicitly elicits a certain type of protection, a sort of inner power springing from the depths of your being that offers you the confidence that all is not lost, manifesting itself outwardly.

Thus, consciousness is a symbol of aspiration and thought that, like a magnetic globe that attracts all metal objects around it, harmonizes all positive and negative elements of man, and then transforms them into manifestations adapted to the realities of the time. Consciousness, based on instinct, made up of insights and forms of knowledge, changes that strange component of the human spirit in the period of transition towards a developed stage, towards a different kind of personality. One open to any material, moral or sentimental challenge.

The best way to understand the value of the position you take in regard to the positive sense of your evolution is to explore a retrieval between the two existences. Creating the new man, by casting away the old one, has at stake the chance of a retrieval in a conjoint plan with another entity of the same nature.

Can you turn your back to a wall that surrounds you incessantly? You cannot. But you can accept it and utilize it as a new way of evolving, turning it into a casemate, a strong support that can separate you from the complex and overwhelming world of "exile". Emphasizing the contrasts of heights and depths, between questions and answers, between mind and heart, can cause an unfavorable destabilization.

Exile is a harsh reality, widespread in the area of leadership, little known, but even more surprising, revealing the unseen human side. He can recognize the reality of his own soul only after the "pain" and "suffering" elements have come to pass.

Leadership has as a source of nourishment that hypostasis of consciousness that experiences the whole of a life that does not differ qualitatively from the segments that make it up: the greatness of the soul and the strength of character, filtered through the process of forming the "New Man".

The All-Encompassing Spheres Of Human Nature reveal those changes that may occur in our consciousness as a change of vision about ourselves, causing different forms of action, impacting our present and future and that of everyone else. It represents a retrieval of the higher self between two existences.

The Alpinism Law

On February 08, 2010

Don't try to climb up a steep slope, without making sure someone experienced is holding your rope.

Life is short and fragile, and Peter knew it very well. Because of an avalanche his sister Annie, together with other two alpinists, were left stranded under an ice foot on K2 Mountain in Himalaya. Not letting himself succumbs to sadness and melancholy, he decided to go out after them. But the idea of climbing 8000 meters on a distempered weather with below-zero temperatures meant pure suicide. Up there, you don't get to die, you're already dead.

Peter, being himself a climber, immediately put up a rescue team of five people, with the help of whom he go out looking for the missing persons. The greatest problem was that he didn't know exactly the place where the three had disappeared. So they had to go together through ice and rocks. And because none of them knew quite well the mountains, the odds were very low.

Leadership: Do you assume an identity that will allow you to access a new form of trust, without questioning the validity of your mission?

Everybody is ready to take action, but not everybody is ready to become a leader.

Identity is what makes you different from other people. But not just any identity that differentiates itself through courage, responsibility, creativity, as a result of experience gained during long trials, can provide a framework in which most of the collective action situations develop. But only an identity which, in addition to all the attributes of a good positioning in the midst of the toughest challenges, manages to manifest through a vivid feeling of belonging to the hero condition and expresses itself through the rescue chances that it represents.

If you watched the movie "Vertical Limit (2000)", then you definitely remember that their rescue, their main help, their right-hand man – the one whom the entire action was based upon, was none other than Montgomery Wick.

He was a fine climber, but a little bit old, to say the truth, but he had done many escalades through time. He had saved people in the mountains on various occasions, being the only climber who knew very well the trails, the only one able to decide, think, and distinguish between the good and the bad, in order for this rescue not to become a real failure. His strong look and stature, his remarkable competences scored along a very long career, made him look like a real fighter, a true survivor, a professional and the only provider of hope. They all listened keenly and followed him, without oppugn his validity.

You can check your leadership level when you manage to distinguish between the rescue chances you represent and the precious energy you are wasting when trying to move mountains.

Every team's achievements and failures are the direct results of the leader's actions. Montgomery Wick weighted out Peter's obligations, even saving his life twice. At the same time, he mobilized the entire team, splitting it into groups of two so that the search would become easier and more accurate, he was the one establishing a certain order, he was the one setting up the team's tempo, encouraging each and every one to seriously involve himself into the action.

Peter, although being a very brave man and having a scarce resolution, wasn't a climber of Montgomery Wick's size. His decision of searching for his sister manifested from the beginning in a determined and impulsive way, he was so determined to find her that he wouldn't have stopped before reaching his goal, he wouldn't cease from troubling till he would have accomplished his objective, and he would have eagerly with a great courage into the most risky actions.

But, unfortunately, this unyielding will, this wild bravery which defines the monomaniacs, would have driven him in the jaws of death - at the very most he would have lounged away his precious time fighting the wind mills, like Don Quixote.

Leadership: Is the testimony of the power to accept your mission failure a cause of limited access to a superior form of perception of personal vulnerability that occurs in overcoming difficult experiences?

He couldn't have carried out the life saving mission, not because he wouldn't have devoted body and soul, but because he lacked the necessary experience in order to undertake some campaigns and especially because, as I previously said, he didn't know the trails, which was vital. He was eager to start the action, but not to complete it. He would have failed if it weren't for Montgomery Wick.

How do you perceive yourself as a result of the personal vulnerability that manifests itself in overcoming difficult experiences: as a limited man or as a determinant factor of credibility?

Leadership is your openness to what you deserve to get from life when everything you want is to be in the lead, without knowing that a much longer and harder race than you could imagine is waiting for you.

P.S. Sometimes, information isn't enough if there isn't a great experience. That's why the adage "If you wish good advice, consult an old man", expresses a frequent reality, even considering younger leaders.

The Ambiguous Corridor Of Orientation

On October 20, 2010

Accept reality before concentrating on things you just think you know.

Leadership: Do you focus on people's realities before focusing on your needs? Or do you focus on what you don't know you can find out?

In the best relationships with other people, you must focus on what they have to offer, not on what you want to get from them. Reality is often times misleading, it diminishes your ability to focus on obvious things which lie ahead of you – which only other people know well. In other words, first develop your ability to believe in their potential by adapting to the reality they created, and then analyze how much trust you can grant them so that they accept your own orientations and directions.

The binder that connects you to other people is like a two way corridor – a way that leads to the truth that their thinking and actions are based on (dictating the tempo in which they develop), and a way leading to the heart of your reality – which sometimes stands in the way of accessing the truth that they perceive and transmit.

Not perceiving the judgment and points of view of other people is just like fading away into a shadow as you go forward on an unknown corridor and don't know what to expect. In the end, you only get to not getting the logic of the events.

One of the most important things that you must do when you interact with other people is to get closer to that reality that places you close to the roots of their leadership. Just like a camera must convince with a constant image quality, you must observe the people's potential to generate your expectations in order to convince by that constant quality of yours to discover the essence of their understanding.

Leadership means to accept the reality that gives meaning and benefits to people, before focusing on the things you think you know about their business, in dealing with cases such as: "too small to be considered."

The Ambiguous Corridor Of Orientation brings to focus the perception you must shape so that it reflects both your reality and other's realities. When you'll get to perceiving "in advance', that is to intuitively guess the things you don't know about people and their actions, then you will be able to trust in your knowledge of leadership.

Conclusion: No matter how good a leader is, the performance of his leadership depends on the people surrounding him. By searching for the meaning of their concepts and actions, by finding out what motivates or demotivates them in accepting the new direction and methods needed for attaining the common goal – you shall not wander in obscurity, but you will find the adequate way to implement your leadership.

The Anatomy Of An Art

On October 28, 2010

Express your authority against the art that you master, by marking your difference of style through a continuation of your own creation.

Henri Matisse, one of the three artists who had contributed to the development of fine arts in the first decades of the 20th century, wrote at one time to the great Romanian painter Theodor Pallady: "In a painting, the color is male."

At which the Romanian painter answered him, "Conversely, the color is a feminine element of the painting; it needs the support of the drawing, while this could be by itself ! "

For Matisse, the color intensity meant a predominant element and a goal. However, Pallady, on the contrary, has not ever allowed the color to reach the target of exaltation. More than this, the color, although it played an important role in his creation, has always remained a secondary element for him. While Matisse's style was based mainly on the brutal strength of color contrasts, the Pallady's style was known by the calm of his compositional harmonies. *

Leadership: Does the style that defines the authenticity of your creation match the value you attach to content that is not capable of meaning through its very nature?

A skillful leader always marks his style through the way in which he expresses his solidarity and attachment to his own "creation", to his own performance without reclining to a style that is not convenient to him, which does not define the values and principles by which he guides his life. He uses his abilities in order to get closer as much as possible to the model of leadership that he represents, maintaining that smooth and uninterrupted continuity that allows him to become a master of the means, of the possibilities offered by his art, by exceeding his individual performances.

Art, for a leader, is a general rehearsal of his own understanding, of what represents his reality, how it evolves, by trying to mold after his own evaluation criteria, after his own pace of evolution, after his own ideas, his own laws determined by his degree of education and training, according to his own intellectual capabilities, after his own interests and character traits.

Leadership is a subtle art to those who truly understand its core. The best leaders do not create an art without a deep sense, without a clear doctrine. Just like the great artists, leaders notify the shape in which magnificently shines an idea, in which outlines a vision, always identifying and reviewing its essence until they get that clear, much-desired image of their success.

Is the dominant element of your creation in accordance with the role you assume – that of an artist who rises to the challenge of assuming a vision superimposed on the reality of others?

Just as a film director has the responsibility to think first of all that should not appear in his films, so you, as the art that you create to have a sense and become a reality, an useful and attractive reality, you have the responsibility to think first of all that should not appear in it framework. You should carefully consider the net and easily detectable influence that your art is having upon others, redirecting your attention, thoughts and interests to their needs, by ensuring a leadership of a good quality oriented in the same direction with them.

An art with content without essence or without form is like an unplugged phone, means a breaking with your own value and even with reality. If you want to shine in the eyes of others, if you want that your art to be useful to others and to be appreciated by them, you have to develop those qualities which distinguish you from others, and that would strengthen your solid and reliable image of your leadership.

A vision that is superimposed on the reality of other people has as its first constituent the point of view of the form and content that you transmit, so that you are not "a dark spot over a lighter one."

The Anatomy Of An Art designates that intrinsic and profound structure of your leadership by which you express your feelings, views, style and personality. If a good part of your leadership style is common to the concept about leadership of others, means that the art you have created and practiced, has achieved its purpose, it means that is authentic and gets to most of the people.

Conclusion: It is said that style makes man. And this thing differentiates some people from other ones. The style of a leader it is recognized from his way of being, from the way he builds his own system of values, his image, by the way he exercises his authority, by the manner he uses his own energies, in which direction he turns them. So that appears the reciprocal: man makes style.

In order to arouse the interest of others, adopt a style without borrowing elements, without discontinuities, and freely accepted by yourself, proving that you are an authority in this area.

Express your authority against the art that you master, by marking your difference of style through a continuation of your own creation.

The Angel Shackled In The Chains Of Causality

On March 31, 2013

Analyze and decide the perfection of your Ego, by promoting those values that are absolutely necessary to your own discovery and development.

An only law, supreme and fundamental, now rules and decides the path to follow in the life or Laura Quinn, determined by twilight, by the striking contrast between lights and shadows. And Mr. Hobbs had been the opportunity that served in the spirit of this law and pulled her out of numbness by giving her a meaning, an affixation according with the requirements of the given situation.

Two harsh souls connected through a law that assumes a special purpose, drawn together by unbreakable bounds, they can be at the same time on the edge of a deep gorge, but they will never succeed clinging on the same branch at the last moment. A purely moral implication is transformed into a certainty that is – ironically – called, let's say "relativity", something that comes and makes you open your eyes, start looking at the world through an enchanted glass, then passes by and fades out like a crystal surrounded by the shadow of the night.

Oh, really? Is that what you're gonna do, eh? After all these years clawing your way up, laughing at men's jokes, subservient, neglecting your opportunities, giving up on love, no time for the simple, the decent. Doing all the dirty work, you're really going to throw all that away just to spite me?

Laura is torn apart by a heartbreaking doubt, same as that controversial character from Victor Hugo's novels: do a good deed and surrender, risking a life in prison or keep quiet and live all his life tormented by his conscience? Enter Hell and become an angel or stay in Paradise and become a demon?

Leadership: Do you allow yourself the privilege of being a broader sphere of action than originally proposed towards an authentic change that turns your most prominent quality into a surrogate of expressing the potential of being more powerful?

Almost as raising those biblical words - "dirige ton cœur dans la bonne voie" - at the rank of supreme moral instance, Mr. Hobbs seems to impose upon Laura a revelation that gives both vigor and courage. He asks for the approval of his decision with well-shaped arguments. But, actually, Laura takes a huge step over this decision, some sort of emotional and psychical deliverance movement, stepping away completely from her sphere of action.

Twilight is obtained in Laura's life with black and white values, and in Mr. Hobbs's life with weathered colors upwards towards light and downwards towards darkness. So, twilight is integrated in their present full of both frustration and regrets, throwing them in an uncertain future.

To receive from Mr. Hobbs the instructions in order to know how to react in relation to the given situation, or to bring the truth to light, this threshold at the gates of Heaven and endanger her future? These are now the nuances reveal her most striking quality. An angel rebels and becomes human.

In both of the characters' hourglass of existence, each particle takes the speed of light. But only within Laura there is a sense of helplessness and uncertainty tossing and turning strongly. Only she radiates these sinister, confused, desperate sounds that cry reproachfully with their last trace of faith: "Help ! "

For only she knows the secret battles between demons and angels that she stoically and sadly carries. Its most prominent quality is to be tough and fair in business, but very soft in terms of personal expectations, thus finding in Mr. Hobbs a surrogate of expressing the potential of being strong on both sides. *

Leadership: Is your best determination that of being the primary subject of the reality of others, valid for everything that in one way or another exists as a manifestation of force that can obtain obedience from weakness or cowardice?

Does your life seem basically governed by the same law? Who is the one called to discover the significance of this law? Do you see the world through an enchanted glass? What do you prefer: enter Hell and become an angel or stay in Paradise and become a demon? Is twilight an integrated in your present?

More often than ever, leadership proves to be a time of stumbling. Among the fuels used as raw material in the personal development process, the first place is occupied by unitary vision – given by your new conception regarding the world and life, in light of that supreme law which you can revoke before it's too late.

This law is a result of the interaction between factors that take part to the development of the mediation process between the constancies that you introduce in your existence: white and black, victim or criminal, good or bad. It is hidden in every aspirant to a different status (in the case of Laura Quinn), being justified through an argument that opposes the decision that have effects which can improve or worsen the human quality.

When an angel prays, a lily flower is added in life's bouquet. The law resumes itself to a single fundamental condition that could ensure a superior score for you: don't forget who you are, don't unplug yourself from the emotional part, sensitive to suggestions. In other words, the consequences of your unveiled and closely studied actions must be well understood by others, but they must be as you want them.

Laura Quinn's moral strength resembles the broken wing of an angel: she is powerless to face the situation, having to adapt to the reality founded by Mr. Hobbs, and at the same time brings him comfort and hope to raise the quality of his personal life.

Leadership: Can you outline the grandiose painting of a decisive transition to a better and more powerful "someone else" without knowing how to see it from behind the scenes?

At the same time the law has to underline all your most striking qualities, to project onto yourself another image – that of an angel, of a human being that can be forgiven. Of course, with the price of some pains, difficulties, of a sincere repentance, of feelings that approach very much to the state of a mature man – that knows himself and accepts himself from a higher perspective, that never estranges from truth.

This approach, which you must keep in mind in order to accede to a deeper transformation of your being, can be approximated through the saying: "When an angel prays, a lily flower is added in life's bouquet ! " That means that when you recognize your true values, everything in your life takes a personalized nuance, new dimensions and intensities shaped by your strength of character.

This way, your leadership aspires to become a grand painting of a decisive transition that materializes itself in a close to the ideal alter-ego, which helps you defeat your number one enemy with his own weapons: yourself. Victory comes with adjustments made after each blow that you apply to yourself when you want to dominate the Man within you.

In this form, leadership is not "cheap", and your existence, projecting on others a living light, a quantity of positive feelings, will never devoid itself of content. Everything you decide to do, to be, to accept or to reject, all that you demand from yourself, all that you even indirectly transmit is part of a "relativity" that brings you closer or pulls you away from others, from a "twilight" of weathered colors upwards towards the light and downwards towards darkness.

You choose the nuances that reveal your most striking quality. Through the way in which you react towards a given situation, bringing the truth to light, this threshold at the gates of Heaven, you can equally improve both present and future. But for this, it is necessary to overcome the inherent obstacles of your maturity process.

Seeing a painting from behind the scenes means having the courage to be yourself as deeply as possible and to accept yourself as you are beyond what is happening to you without falling into a state of complete apathy and becoming a man distant from the realities of the world you are part of.

The angel shackled in the chains of causality highlights the human factor often missing in your transformation process, which is the way that gives expressivity to a form of communication and exteriorization of the Ego.

Analyze and decide the perfection of your Ego, by promoting those values that are absolutely necessary to your own discovery and development.

The Anxiety Of The Mind That Triggers Transformation

On September 19, 2013

Focus on a transformation vision, so that you pass the difficult test that tries your active elements, with respect to safety and self-trust.

A flickering fire keeps Catherine Martin alive. She is the victim of a compromising experimental situation, from the point of view of the psychic demands she has to respond to. She's the protagonist of a difficult test that tries her active elements, with respect to safety and self-trust. Her nervous batteries are chaotically charged, while the flexibility and ductility of her character are compromised.

There is a precedent in this regard, that would terrify her so much. She had taken the decision to display a heroic behavior and not give up in front of the worst negative pressures that now lead to a nervous breakdown, inhibiting the self-defense impulses and initiatives, attracting it towards introversion and anxiety. Her mood stimulates the untamed potential of climbing the intangible mountain of the chain that surveys over the functional area, the Thought of Death.

Entrapped in a hostile space, in the middle of the thickest despair, where it's almost as if decay and the sensation of being someone else had settled in, Catherine gives up for good the feeling that in Buffalo Bill's soul there is a shard of goodness. Soon, he will kill her !

Leadership: Do you submit to an attempt to take control of the entire experience of using your feelings of belonging to a new personality testing environment in how you choose to respond to the pain you feel in the interaction set by the compromise of your own identity with the world?

There is an activation of the transformation substance, of intrinsic nature, that almost drives her away from her instincts. Her big horrified eyes, her troubled face, her clenched muscles, her shaking hands, everything is an eloquent witness to her heated fight with the impossible, with patience and determination in a continuous stage of heavy tension.

The operation that prevents and treats human mind – subject to a systematic torture, directly triggered by exterior pressures that determine bad mood and irritability oscillations – is called transformation. This transformation leaves behind a psychic and emotional corpse and resurrects the substance, which potentially diffuses the high-frequency pulsations that recompose the stimulatory source of unsuspected energies.

Faith is resurrected. The body function gradually goes back to normal. This desperate being shakes off anxiety. It overcomes the limited resistance moods. The inner pulsation, which activates and rushes all reaction instincts, also determines an unexpected action drive. The force of passionate calling towards a new functional stage, towards a stage of supreme consciousness, is manifested by finding a redeeming solution. Thus, the ship of faith turns to a different direction, which favors the overcoming of the crisis.

Leadership: Do you include the phenomena that become an obstacle in a new environment of existence by completely removing the reality that you have become accustomed to or are you going to force your limits to find out what you are really capable of?

The art of knowing the manifestations of human nature, fully exploring them in man's insides in order o discover the material of the supposedly basic convictions that limit or amplify his moods, could be defined, rightfully speaking, as "luxury". A deep matter connected with knowing the human being subject to the effects of his instincts and inner forces. An aspect, which unfortunately is ignored more and more. Because not everyone has access to it, as it is not profitable, materially speaking.

But it could be an investment that protects leadership from its still unfinished elements, which in full development of an action, can damage the individual's safety.

As a hard to reproduce art, non-transmissible, leadership takes on a new dimension, which would be highly appreciated in the future. At the moment it's just under-fueled with new kinds of thinking and action. It becomes a model of analysis, a screen that unlocks the internal temporary factors of man's personality, which only evolutionist psychology applies in its attempts to understand the design of human mind.

In the final and most vulnerable state, that fully polishes your accomplishment of becoming a leader, going through the blocking and rebuilding stage, rummaging through the introspection a critical event brings up, leadership can be approached only directly.

In the position of selecting the qualities and deficits comprised in the inner frame, shaped with optimistic dimensions that ensure a superior resistance for requests of any kind, you are forced to shift your attention from feelings, to the duty towards your existence when it's endangered by foreign forces.

Leadership: Are you able to put a new pair of glasses on your mind without taking on a reflexive reaction or without creating an ego that deters you from your quality of a "product of reality"?

Leadership takes on an important role when you give your mind a new pair of glasses and you try to win in an ambiguous situation that triggers the war with yourself. If you become the protagonist of a difficult test that tries your active elements, with respect to safety and self-trust (and I wish weak characters won't have to go through this kind of experiences), it means that all the qualities that could contribute to preserving the safety zone, by regulating the psyche and mood, are real and dominant.

The newly installed tensions, which reduce the output of your personality's flexibility and ductility structural characteristics, can't be defeated or substituted by a decision that dodges reality at any time and at any rate. Because that would ignore the quality of the material you're made of. That's why, an activation of the transformation substance, of intrinsic nature, that triggers the fighting instincts, is absolutely necessary in order to become a true leader.

The difficulties regarding psychical translocation towards a reference point, such as faith and self-trust, don't ensure an efficient action drive, a wall against the weakness to fight all the way. So you are set back by your own inability. In this case, leadership is calculated based on the minimum probability to win. And this means you allowed the substitution of leadership with a weak distribution of your excellence values towards exclusion, or even cancellation.

You become stronger as the possibilities to support an experience without horizon or to eliminate the bond with the feeling of inability are higher. If you want to finalize in good conditions the passage to a broader territory of self-control, focus on a transforming vision, so that you pass the difficult test that tries your active elements, with respect to safety and self-trust.

Leadership approach gets close to what you choose to be when you struggle with the impossible, with patience and will, in a continuous state of pressing tension, around an ego that tends to convince you of your quality of a "product of reality".

The reflexive reaction that urges you to follow a new existential path is a method of removing the side-effects produced by an acute reality by finding new reasons to explore a world that is too harsh for the life you have at your disposal to find out what miracles and mysteries it is hiding.

Your change begins with his determination to reconsider your reality in terms of a release from the storm of your own emotions, from the trap of a life lived in suffering, feeding your conscience with the following compromise: "I accept that I have fallen into a pit, but I will never accept to remain there ! "

The anxiety of the mind that triggers transformation is nothing else but the mobility of intrinsic forces in critical, overwhelming and inhibiting situations, which block every action. The characteristic of people with a strong psychic, of exceptional leaders, is to quickly and efficiently counteract this anxiety, which as it gets deeper and extends on a longer period of time, could even endanger the individual's life.

The Apparently Chaotic Line Of The Genesis Of The Art Work

On October 30, 2014

Learn to dominate everything you try to project onto others, optimizing the foundation of meaning and analogies that your knowledge and authenticity supports.

Parallel to the idea of the subject – which will be outlined in a straight line, the film "Ivan the Terrible" is born out of the most unexpected parts. The genesis of the opera follows a seemingly chaotic line, in which appear, successively, simultaneously, elements of the imagination or ideas it will illustrate, when disparate fragments of the hero's life, when an intuition about the actor's play or the music or the light tonality of a scene, when the sensorial perception of a piece of assembly and instantly the vision of a corner of the scene for a completely different scene.

Ideas, intuitions, visions appear disorderly, episodically, beginning with a fragment at the end of the future film, followed immediately by a prologue, then suddenly a scene in the middle of the story.

*Fantasy plays on all the instruments of an orchestra existing only in the artist's inner universe: "You represent a scene to yourself as a living phenomenon of life, the other one you play, the third one you heart, the fourth one you see under the aspect of the frame, the fifth one you perceive as a system of montage joints, the sixth – as a chaos of light spots." **

Leadership: Can the search for authenticity be attributed to a new renewal of the form of expression of the creative act?

One of the conditions for achieving a high level of science, close to the subjective expectations projected on personal creation, is the active involvement in the realization of "novelty" through the simultaneous interaction with its elements of content. The notions of "form" and "matter", complementing and improving the final result, give way to the functions and structures of perception and comprehension that give the expression of thought a deeper character, but at the same time, a more accessible one.

In this way, we refer to a type of reasoning in which the general is deduced from the particular – individual information, in an unbroken flow, waiting to be ordered in a unitary unit. A kind of continuation of creation, from a pre-significant chaos to the elements with a substantial substrate, to the extent that you are motivated differently – that is, rewarded with new understandings that mold the new interpretations of a compositional nature.

Finding a new form of expression for the act of creation, which implies an unmistakable visual impact, is to tastefully combine the images projected behind the high-volume scene of information from an original story fragment, so as to finalize the highlighting of a singular idea.

Only in the midst of chaos can successively identify the elements, ideas, analogies between concepts and theories, which their advanced model of thought inspires and accepts. Similarly, intuitions and visions appear disorderly, episodically, starting with a certain incoherence of thoughts and logic but also abounding with new landmarks, perspectives, options and features, in a continuous process of removing the elements of exaggeration or hypothetical ones.

No one can cure the self-worth remedy brought by total art, inscribed in a continuous intuition-based orientation – built on elements of imagination or ideas, from disparate fragments of personal life. It is rather a search for yourself, the authenticity of the background, a new renewal of the form of expression of the creative act and a new way of understanding art through a spectacular plunge into chaos.

Fantasy means to penetrate underneath each phenomenon of life, focused on disparate fragments of random information, and from it, to forge a new form of expression.

The underneath – the deepest part of each experience, each blend of thoughts, each subject of interest and study, conceals new aspects of approach, just as a lot of ingredients hide behind each recipe.

Leadership, following a process of knowledge and self-knowledge that goes from simple to complex, can be divided into two major stages: in the first we deal with the universe dominated by a mechanics of substitution of truly banal elements, alongside one dominated by producing results. Then we are dealing with a universe dominated by routine, complementary parameters that are closing the way to theorize.

Ideas, intuitions, visions appearing disorderly or episodically, always on the boundary between information and the ridiculous because not everything can be done and not everything can be modeled in the same way to materialize into a piece of art, gain the valences of a "décor", not intended to be shared unless they are influenced by the ingredients of a story already in progress.

The advice of an internet user must be taken into account: "Be honest and firm in your convictions, do not expect others to respect your ideas if they do not earn their merit of being remembered and transformed into a message. But, most importantly, always be open to the possibility of being wrong.

The authenticity of the creative act resides in the details life offers you seen under the guise of a framework, and thus, perceived as a system of editing cuts.

The Apparently Chaotic Line Of The Genesis Of The Art Work is aimed at continuous searches for exceptional compositional elements, an integral part of the creative process, and play them in an intelligible form underlying a model of performing leadership.

The Appearance That Kills The Higher Souls

On January 20, 2015

Impose yourself through the power of beliefs that you keep running so you can find a purpose in interpreting life.

Monte Cristo came out with his soul deeply saddened from the house he left Mercedes in, which, considering all probabilities, he would never see again. Since Edouard's death there has been a great change in him. At the height of vengeance, on the low and tumbling slope where he had climbed, he saw the gulf of doubt on the other side of the ridge. Moreover: the conversation with Mercedes had awakened so many memories in his heart that these memories themselves needed to be defeated.

A man with of Monte Cristo's nature could not long float in the melancholy that can make ordinary minds live, giving them an appearance of originality, but killing their higher souls. The Count said to himself that since he had come close to scolding himself, a mistake had to have been made in his calculations.

"I do not look at the past well, and I suppose I'm not as dearly mistaken. How – he continued – could it be that my purpose was reckless? Had I taken a wrong path for ten years? An hour would be enough to prove to the supreme architect that the work of all his hopes was, if not impossible, at least ungodly?

*I do not want to get used to this idea. It could drive me insane."***

Leadership: Are you testing the superiority or inferiority of your position on the zero line in the area of a sum of self-reflections?

In relation to existence, leadership can be the result of self-knowledge that results from the research of positive or negative facts, administering the unmistakable unity of man produced in the moments experienced each day, integrating the essence of his need to ensure a direction to follow.

Unlike other sciences, leadership, in relation to complex reality, passes through the state of decline of human authority – when it encounters natural deeds and constraints of the consequences during the process of change.

You have to remain strong during the transition to another type of man, even if it involves a deepening in both the supersensible, stoically striding the field of doubts and despairs, especially when the past catches up to you, pressing down upon you with unpredictable forces.

Identifying the path on which you need to advance, in the conditions of self-vulnerability that can degenerate into a total renunciation of the meaning of one's own being, is the really slow reforming process – but it is the confirmation test of your superiority.

Leadership: Does the vision that predominates in your control area create a sense of uselessness, determined by the idea that nothing is steady over time?

Modifying the meanings assigned to life situations in which you react helplessly, without the awareness of your own choices and without the ability to change the course of things beyond the deceptive appearances of reality, is the starting point of self-reflection – which also falls on leadership, because it tests the superiority or the inferiority of your position to the zero line.

The zero line is the reference period where the deviations from the rigors of life experiences, value adjustments, or tolerance of consciousness predominate. On the length of this line depends your becoming, assigning a major sense to your experiences, strengthening the sense of self-worth, and finding a certain purpose in the interpretation of life.

A leader imposes himself by the power of the convictions he conquers in the long struggle with his own limits, weaknesses, and failures, in an attempt to prove himself better and more valuable. Through its content of qualities, his thinking and attitude towards life, a hero of the struggle with life is at the same time the expression of actualized sensitivity that shapes him so that he behaves more comprehensively and more tolerant towards his fellow men.

Reflection is the force with which the intensity of an experience returns to you, after it has mercilessly struck in the consciousness of a fickle destiny.

The Appearance That Kills The Higher Souls highlights that uncertainty in "defense" when you try to impose your authority during the journey through life. In your own experiences will often infiltrate demotivating feelings or convictions, but they are meant to permanently polish and reveal more and more of what you can be. A man of great character.

The Architect Of Destinies

On February 20, 2009

Conceive the functionality and the facets of changes, so that the contribution that you bring to leadership would be maximum.

An unfortunate event can change the course of a human life.

In 1955, a black woman was arrested because she did not want to stand in from the place "reserved for whites" in a bus in Montgomey. This incident was the final straw. That was the moment when Martin Luther King Jr. decided to get involved at any price in the fight for gaining freedom and human rights for black people and for combating racial discrimination. Following the example of his hero, Mahatma Gandhi, Martin Luther King Jr. started the battle.

Finally, after having reached his goal, he told people that supported him, shortly after he was assassinated: "I had been to the mountain top, and saw the Promised Land."

Finally, the aspirations of those he devoted his best years were accomplished.

The leader is not just a poor builder who put another brick to the foundation, but the architect who puts the building roof.

Intelligent, and very thirsty for freedom, having, of course, a perspective view concerning the problems black people were facing, Martin Luther King Jr. met the hopes of people. Furthermore, despite the many problems he faced, he managed to imprint them a firm attitude in front of all injustices they suffered.

He came up with great energy, and a tremendous boom in front of people, and has projected a different future for them. His constant efforts, which reflected a deep and warm love for people, for their freedom and dignity, had a wide echo among black people that answered to his call to fight for the acquisition of equal rights with other people.

Martin Luther King Jr. was not just a simple man who tried to bring his contribution to the change that the entire black population expected. No, he did not only put his stamp on the changes, but he designed the functionality and the facets of changes, and for that he was loved and respected.

Reaching a high level of knowledge, understanding life profoundly, dominated by a pronounced divine spirit, he assumed the role of architect and host of change. He raised the question of racism on a higher level than his predecessors had done, though seized by the sadness concerning the sad perspectives that awaited him in that troubled period for him and his people.

Leadership: Can you reconsider your stance on a decisive decision that forces you to resurrect your capacity to deliver a new perspective to address events in a present of deceived expectations?

Martin Luther King Jr.'s position on the decisive decision to defend the rights of black people was at first expressed as a juror, the transformed into a hard-to-replace man. He has reset his ability to deliver a new perspective of approaching events into a present of expectations deceived by a sort of divine hocus-pocus that transformed him into a superhero endowed with saving powers.

It is not possible to reach the top of the hierarchical ladder if you don't dare to do something about it, if you let things as they are instead of changing them, or if you don't get enough involved in solving the problems that others are facing. Everywhere, you meet people who need help to cope with problems. If you want to reach a higher level of performance, then get out from the personal comfort zone, and do your best to open the door to a better life.

Many people throw their eyes up, asking God's help, but they remain unmoved, without doing anything, until someone has the courage to get involved in their lives mobilizing them in a certain direction. Dreams and aspirations for the better do not always help people to mobilize, but a dynamic leader, decided and persuasive will achieve this. If you want people to follow you, then set as your aim to constantly support them. The success of people always depends on their leader, so do not disappoint them.

The leader is an architect who deals only with "great works" providing their exact solution for building them as soon as possible after an original self-image and well put together.

Leadership is a surpassing of the limits imposed by a boundless belief, whose first hypostasis is the violation of regulations that invalidates a majority vote and allows it to repeat itself in a favorable round.

The architect of destinies is the one who gets involved in helping people (understanding and externalizing correctly their wishes) and leads them, following certain steps, towards a different future, better than the one which foreshadows in the present, looking for the most reward of his inner satisfaction.

However, you need to have courage and spirit of initiative to fight for the good of the ones who have chosen you for these precise qualities. Moreover, you must instill, in your turn, courage and perseverance among those around you, and that's because you chose to be "the architect of destinies".

Conceive the functionality and the facets of changes, so that the contribution that you bring to leadership would be maximum.

The Art Creator's Principle

On November 10, 2014

Determine the reality that enters the light cone of investigating the theme you propose to address, measuring the value of the peculiar's existence in the whole.

What is most important: formality in observing historical details, or the precision in deciphering the events, their meaning with the actual resonance? How should these people who lived centuries ago be presented: hieratically stylized in the sense of plastic works of the period, with icon gestures, dictated involuntary by the costumes of weather? How can contact with these people so distant and so close to us be created? What is the attitude towards this "saint", the brilliant leader of armies? How should the Nevski character be portrayed: exalted in glory, or descended to his gown and slippers?

*The great director finds the solution to these questions in making the film. Historical interpretation is made through the point of view of the present, of the actuality of the theme. Essential for Sergei Eisenstein is the clarity of the theme, the verbal sobriety of the film. The people the film is going to tell you about are, in fact, the same as us. As for the heroes of the past, we can equally discuss them, we do not feel the need to overwhelm the heroes of the past, nor to rise to the top of our feet to appear at the same height with them.

Leadership: How do you portray the vision of man so that he conforms to the patterns of an individual conception of the work?

With a view to a direct association between the ways of enhancing the creative content requirements and the technical realization of a new innovation platform that contributes to the most nuanced contextualization of scientific and intellectual productions, we must first return the value of human existence to the transformation phenomenon of art.

How should the vision of man be presented in such a way that he conforms to the patterns of an individual conception of the work, where originality must authentically intervene?

Well, the vision, but also the dedication necessary to materialize it in a representative form of approach to novelty, giving rise to a certain niche of a subject, must start from the combination, design, and integration in various proportions of spectacular elements.

To attract the gazes of people around you from the point of view of an artist, allowing for the reunion of the virtues of an experimenter, of an investigator of the real and the imaginary, at the border with fiction, actually means to confront them in an interpretation that serves an advanced theory, an idea or tendency that highlights the intention of infiniteness in infinity, as when the painter always mixes the paints differently, starting off from the base tone, to get another hue and pattern.

And man, substantially altered for the experience of overcoming the exile condition within his own limits, interfering with the creation, as a "complex artist", can bring the art creator a certain amount of subjectivity in appreciating the degree of expansion of the impact area. But also, a dose of objectivity in assessing the degree of achievement of performance criteria and objectives.

Leadership: How do you assess and interpret the value of human personality in the face of the transformation phenomenon of art?

The personality whose activity is relevant in the context of the process of leadership development is shaped beyond the screen of stylistic non-conformism based on the attraction of rules and detachment from the norms, amazed by the variety of creative themes that broaden the horizons of knowledge.

In leadership, as well as in directorial art, the value of man as well as the manner of conceiving the personality traits integrated in a certain experience have an important share in determining the trend of expressing and affirming their own autonomy in relation to the ideal of art – through creation, by means of constructed models.

As a leader-artist, the theme you are treating and personalizing, supported by the meanings attributed to human value, must reflect – as much as possible – a conceptual approach to creation that can be understood both in a subjective and objective sense.

The dominant note encompassing all the transformations of the elements of producing significance, highlighting the differences and the approaches between what you know and what you get from the perspective of the reconsidered concepts, is finding, within the framework of new situations, reference values that can support the transition towards a different type of orientation – one focused on constructive interpretations of human personality.

The interpretation you give to your personality from an artist's perspective presents itself as an open structure of compensatory features that shows you not only how to better understand the world, but also how vast the size of what you still don't know about yourself is.

Can you determine the boundaries of your "objective" knowledge, also showing the fact that your nature itself cannot be known?

The Art Creator's Principle aims at establishing connections between multiple reference models, located in a current of development authenticity, which enters the structure of creation involving people – represented in various forms.

To measure the value of the existence of the individual in the whole is to find, on the basis of deep knowledge, the characteristic elements of uniqueness, constitutive of a goal of superiority in creation, transmitted through specific modalities of a performing leadership that rely on the past, but concern the present and the future. To find uniqueness in diversity, this is true performance.

The Art Focused Around A Single Drop Of Blood

On January 19, 2021

Create a universe that reflects your inner search, so that you can highlight the deep features of a work of art.

Yesterday I donated blood for someone dear, so dear, that I would donate once more. And there was silence in the room, a disturbing silence, as if I along with myself had to take an examination of reciprocity in a space of dual existence, in an attempt to transcend the "biological-corporeal substrate" from the ontology of a work of art. If I had researched a part of myself then, through the way biochemical processes take place in cellular structures, I might have noticed the rhythm of the great universe preserved in a spiritual moment that can be discovered through the long contemplation of a plant, such as the rose.

As my blood flowed from my veins at a rapid rate, an intoxicating fluid of emotion turned into an artistic, invigorating fluid, resembling the collagen of an endogenous synthesis that produces mutations in the biological structure of a larger world, but dominated by the image of silence. Instantly, I thought of a rose that, slipped among other flowers, of other species, seeks its meaning in a healthy human body, not in an amalgam of traveling souls. This is the dream of poets and philosophers.

Transformational leadership harnesses the artistic potential of the experience of intellectual exploration, giving meaning to a higher mission, such as achieving perfection.

Only a sting can wake you from a deep slumber.

Indeed, I felt vulnerable. To recover from my half-asleep state, I needed a locomotor and metabolic stimulus to perceive the feeling of another sense, specific to living in parallel worlds, in a higher imaginary world, dominated by a "reversed order of simultaneity". Or, perhaps, did I need to standardize a model of attachment to a metaphysis of self-transcendence?

The rose, when alone in the sacred hour of dusk, is clothed in the purple veil of a huge heart that beats by absorbing the warmth of a soul in which you find yourself even when you are far away. Indeed, my creation is an embodiment of thoughts transposed into living, concrete symbols, expressing an obvious reality in a sublime moment of pride and gratitude.

Leadership: Does your creation aim at how life should be lived precisely in view of the contact between soul and idea, in the context of a programmed or random cause that continues to manifest and exacerbate?

My blood was dripping from my veins, so reminiscent of the light of dusk. For a moment I imagined that I was a painter with views of other worlds, charged with the sight of a soul beyond time. Colors appeared everywhere, but only one pierced my soul with the memories of a mystical journey the size of a paint brush. A dark red, like Sagrantino wine, triggered in me a huge passion, a centrifugal reaction, something like: "I believe in something that needs to be created new".

The desire to see myself go further, to continue my journey in this setting of silence at the intersection of soul and body, led me to the category of unique orders in the portfolio of artists. Long ago, the artist Mircea Sin told the story of a young man who came to him with the elaborate drawing of a heart with arteries, which he wanted to give to his girlfriend. The boy wanted to specify that he also wants the heart to be of use and to be able to drink from it. "It was very complicated, like a photo, and it's harder to do something like that", the glassmaker said.

The artistic challenge consists in giving meaning to an abstract ideal, even in a world that prioritizes the biological and the concrete.

Sometimes, in order to rediscover our true nature and a deeper feeling, more present in the pneumatic envelope of the rational soul, we have to give meaning even to an unfeasible challenge. Ioan Mititelu's words fit very well in art: "You have to answer with the biological of a world that cares so much about the biological, unable to sacrifice a part of the concrete for an idea."

Even after my perfusion was removed, very effectively, without pain, I could feel the blood continuing to flow with the same ease and freedom as life itself, with the same intensity with which the artist stimulates the intensity of a rose's bloom by coloring it in very nuanced shades.

A single drop of blood, lost in an instant, was enough to startle me from my numbness. And never in my life have I encountered such a drop of blood, so clear, so warm, so quintessential, that in a single moment made me feel that I belong to an open universe that wants me, puts me in value, as vulnerable as I am.

The expression of a vivid feeling, coagulated around artistic spontaneity, gathers its sincerity in the immediate vicinity of the shedding of even a single drop of blood.

As in art, leadership appears as a way of communicating a being's feeling: to be reconciled with everything you feel and to be able to creatively express everything you see, even when you feel vulnerable.

The Art Focused Around A Single Drop of Blood confirms the sensitivity of the artist who manages to obtain a piece of vision, to give a different shape and a different meaning to the moments captured in an isolated interiority, in an endless simplicity of feeling.

In fact, my entire work of art, constituted as a way of expression (through metaphors, symbols, personifications), is determined by reference to the landmarks that the inner world needs to evolve spiritually: feeling, vision, message of art, fantasy, the push towards ideal and originality.

The Art Of Alchemy In Aesthetic Vision

On December 22, 2019

An artist with a desire for immortality knows how to match his life in the parables of the spirit of nature.

I am not just any rose, but a bearer of the spirit of nature associated with a name: Double Delight. My true life, with the most intense experiences manifested in Misujaryan (the deep mystery of the active dream), began with the Death of Adam, when the artist conceived from the sensitive matter of the poetic, through the kind of alchemy, the expressive reference of spacious knowledge in the unity of the mystery of a time travel.

Those who write "Aleph" on Murano glass tombs, or those who are constantly searching for treasures under the influence of the planets, or those who see Universal Nature in the form of a coiled reptile, understood nothing. The spiritual side of true alchemy, the dimension of an idea possessed by the spirit of gifted thinking, the equivalent of 100% pure gold is to know how to become a rose, or at least, a part of me.

Leadership: Can creation become a metaphysics of nature, whereby you discover the essence of the sublime behind a "realistic" scenario?

From the perspective of the power of giving life to the still and silent things, I was saved from the ignorance of the world precisely by this beautifully in love artist, embodied by il sogno dell'armonia, who knew how to assimilate me into the art of sublime flourish with the help of genuine encompassed amazement in the spirit of a structural order. I consider myself happy because it was in the power of this young dreamer, untouched by the bite of entropy, to preface a metaphysical form of nature in an inspiration of spontaneous complexity. A great wonder from a foreigner in the practices accepted by the old Kabbalists.

The privileged artist nel primo grado dell'essenza divin is discovered behind the "realistic" scenario, in the case of effective employment in the universe experienced through the amazing joining of complementary worlds. The effort to probe a potential external environment, by carefully and diligently selecting the desired reality, without being satisfied with the distanced living that can be offered by the aesthetic participation in the performance offered by a symbolically deciphered painting, places my Creator in the plane of traditional metaphysics: "Who are we? Where do we come from? Where are we headed?"

Leadership: Can you make the transition from "formalism" to "interpretation" through an act of symbolic conversion in two ways: the image that looks differently in other worlds and the image that rotates around the same axis?

I was once a man like all other people, a mere ordinary mortal, but the world did not perceive me or understand anything that I represented in the spiritual values of true faith. The simplest meanings began to wear the most diverse shades of red. The metamorphosis instinct has been increasingly intensely debated and conceptualized in Quinta Essentia. Thus, we entered into another world, identified in the Tiphereth, the image of a splendor of nature rendered in the form of the figure 9, provided with buds treated like celestial hemispheres in the earthly variant.

Oh, how much nostalgia in the memory of color explosions. In art, to be like the admiration for the performance of an unmatched and unparalleled beauty, it is similar to the testimony of Constantin's real cross in flames, with the mention that any model can be reshaped according to needs. Of course, my pictorial image will tell you something other than focusing on the Holy Tree perceived with narrative virtues in the hereditary nature of the operation of ennobling the Holy Spirit (through the transmutation of the universal passive substance).

As you can see, an image is constructed by giving it an exact measure of interpretation through the idea of de-doubling, by the space-time neighborhood and by the differentiated positioning.

I exposed myself to the measure of time, according to Platonic thoughts such as this: "measure and proportion go hand in hand with beauty and virtue", in trying to find the quick way of learning and ascending the feeling of the Mirror of Rain in Ancient Times. For centuries, as a bridge between the worlds, I have been mentioned in the writings of Ptolemy or in the secret codes introduced by Patriarch Abraham in "Sefer Yetzira". I have also trodden on the sandy strata of Caliph Al-Raid's kingdom from the outskirts of the West, only to be offered as a dream adhesion to the story of the 1001 nights.

But also, every time, with sage and truffle, I found myself in a constant reminder of what is missing from people's lives: the fruitful cult of metamorphosis.

Leadership: Does the creation to which you give a new look, enriching "perceived content" with "imagined content", enhance the hidden, intrinsic utterance of stylistic means of transmitting the revelations of a dual being?

I have a request for you, because I do not want to confuse you with inexhaustible expressions IN CUGERO, or by embracing the known with the unknown. Before understanding me through the eyes of an artist, that so often distort the copy of things offered by perceptions, please attempt to see me as a common mortal, one who will remain in your hearts forever.

You will not understand me by the dynamics of archaic representations. Not when you hold a book and read discerningly the novels of Quentin's childhood, referring to different networks for the maintenance of*walking trees*. The hybridization of a rose cannot be understood neither by the act of "watching" of the spectator seated solemnly in front of the screen, nor by the fidelity shown to the Aristotelian and Thomistic teachings, nor by the experience of the discovery of Dinesh's Amulet.

Leadership: How do you manage to probe the potential of the external environment, going beyond mere aesthetic participation to achieve authentic living?

Only through the greatness of Bastian's heart in "Never-ending Story", which did not allow itself to be dominated by human opinions and complicated reasonings, will you be able to live my life, know my history, save me from oblivion, and harmonize your instinctive being with the spiritual:

"Once – while I was much younger, I asked during our religion course whether the Lord Jesus also had needs like any ordinary man, considering that he used to eat and drink like an ordinary man. The entire class burst into laughter and the religion teacher reprimanded me for "indecent behavior". There I received no answer. It was not my intention to behave indecently. Probably, such things are much too insignificant and devoid of importance to be mention in stories."

The rose is not a world full of symbols, but rather is the superior spirit of the artist captured in his own portrait, painted in the name of the memory. To know how to blossom under the influence of the one who elevated you to the rank of masterpiece, being much more delightful when you are remembered by reproducing an attraction point in the background of the genuine image, means being drawn into the orbit of a logic capable of giving another meaning to individuality.

Leadership: Do you know how to value the "image-perception" through the fundamental characteristic of the Creator, related to the realization of complex forms of expression with an accentuated potential of extension to "the vision beyond yourself"?

The rose puts my soul to the test, just as gold tests the nature of inferior bodies to mix with the Bloodstone in the cosmic order indicated by Saturn's transit through Sagittarius. I don't know why you continue to believe in a reality so hard to decipher, dori me. Perhaps it is the complementary form of acquiring a correspondence with the spirit of a perennial plant, with ascendant in the ninth zodiacal sign, in the sense of a special communication with a thinking being placed in a system of ontological determinations of creation.

Maybe it is just a way to replace myself with one of the many and various actions of an alchemical nature, using Hermes' instruments. Perhaps it is a way of manifesting myself inventively by dissolving Numhesya's power in the root of Para Atar. Or, maybe I understood the hidden and elementary language of the universe better than anyone.

Quite rightly, my favorite rose, Double Delight, is part of the beauty category that contains a metaphor of choice: the circle of fire of the spiritual literate. I am nothing but his breathlessness, his transposition into encrypted language, but always sincere, pure, free, liberating, coherent only for those who believe in another life, with eyes open to all the serene countries of the Soul of the World. We will see each other again when we merge our destinies.

The artistic vision is intended to capture a reality beyond yourself, presented through a comparison included in a metaphorically meaningful image.

The Art Of Alchemy In Artistic Vision is due to a writing in which the truth and the imagination have been confined to that single body giving detail, from the side of an image that contains to produce pulsations at the level of (artistic) experience beyond the production of life, beyond the curtain of time, beyond what we know, beyond matter.

The Artist And His Art

On March 12, 2016

Take on a big role, first by manifesting your option of turning into someone else.

I found myself at the imaginary crossroads of two complementary, essential axes, under the aspect of the mysterious order of a world whose true heroes never die, positioning myself like a circle with wavy rays above the horizontal plane, with positive rates, of the excessive motivational intensity. What for others would have represented only a fictional scenario of using a wide range of contrasts between different perspectives of making a literary-artistic work was for me a deepening in a way of knowing that risked becoming a prison for me.

The attempt to defy the presence of the conscious factors by addressing the comparison between science and art, the steadfastness in the restlessness with which I would charge my momentum towards undetermined heights, this impeccable accumulator of what I wanted to forget about without regret, integrated me into a film script that only Stanley Kubrick could be able to direct. Everything revolved under the naive dangers of the operator called "Myself", a reflection of the experience based on the experience gained from identifying with an artist who deeply reflects on his Work before making it known in the world.

My whole thought was sooner an axis on which was represented the embodiment of an anonymous character, concealing his real identity behind a mask in which the intermediary link, the action transmitted to the soul of the role, determined the overall solidity of a cause-effect relationship that never was and never will be present again. Could any understand the importance of this mask for my future art?

The art composed by a screenwriter is the expression of a selection of thoughts that succeed in imposing themselves on the background of agreements between a finely detailed picture and a justified metaphor that signifies the idea of a release from the chains of appearances.

But in the creative process of scenic experience there are not only bridges to the heavens, to the castles of life, to art and knowledge, intangible for the spectators, as much as there are bridges to the beauty of the game of hide and seek. I was hiding, and I would also lose myself. What is important is that I managed to find myself, always in a different formula, in a new apparition, in a book, in a tear of pain, in an image of the future, in a combination of things in a context different from the act of writing.

I'd say I was lining up on the composition axis of a movement towards infinity, like in the light game of a fantastic mirage, in which the great universal conductor, the soul, constantly seeking its way towards the magic of a labyrinthic underground, managed to break through into the depths of satisfaction towards a different way of understanding the world. No one, not even Shakespeare could have created such a precisely outlined character, with art, in the relentless dynamic of the challenge called "To be someone else."

Leadership: Can you re-compose the parts of a whole to create a new quality from which to manifest your artistic expression?

An artistic expression must not be closely related to a very revealing, rich, neat, expressive, glamorous language, but rather to contain that part of your personality that is the most trustworthy, most appropriate and most well-developed, which makes you unique in your own way and distinguishes you from all others.

The artistic is an emanation of poetic grace, an emanation of a universal consciousness, an emanation of the spirit of creativity that you must stimulate through zealous, metaphoric, mysterious, full of emotion words. Sometimes it leads to a series of symbolic fixations in the human microcosm, at times it creates a space of the magnitude of the momentum to still untouched heights, and can often be assimilated by the idea of "separation from the world of yesterday."

The famous Russian director, whom I have mentioned countless times, Sergei Eisenstein, reached the application of the "close-up method", starting from the fascination of a phenomenon: by recreating the parts of a whole, a new quality of it can be created. Hocus Pocus, who was I in this close-up of the equation of a system of orthogonal axes?

The artist's experience and the inner world of the play called "Interview with myself". No one understands who you are, based on actions, facts, feelings, this leading to what could be called "Behind every great artist there's a great improvisation". Thus, everything is under the horizontal of a fictional profile, headed towards the pole of a rotation of image in which is permanently introduced a new content.

Leadership: Do you consider yourself such a good actor in your own stage to assure a separation of reality from the details of a world that is at the limit of the choice between controlled aleatoric and narrative improvisation?

Dominant in leadership is at times the conscious ability of perceiving a unique facet of reality, but one which could portray me in a reverse aspect, in the expansion of an individuality passed through the crossing between what can be seen and what cannot be seen. A sort of Empty-Full which could tests my ability of attributing to self-experience, through a process of feeling-thinking-doing, a deeper meaning, later manifesting itself in the real event.

I was concerned with knowing how to approach moments of wandering in the orthogonal projection between the axes of an out-of-the-box reality, this made me into a sort of seeker of knowledge about the self. Because the man who conceals his real identity behind a mask, the man who fuels the presents of the conscious factor by addressing the comparison between science and art, the man who hides in order to find himself in a game of hide and seek, can understand his importance differently in the equation of the art of accepting himself and of becoming sure of himself.

Leadership: To what extent do you create your identity through role-playing, turning improvisation into a link that unites reality and artistic vision?

The greatest leaders of the time were first of all actors on their own stage. First you put on the mask, then you shape your character, then you act it out, and at the end, you leave a door open towards to the wonderful heights of your knowledge. This is the "intermediate link", the action transmitted to the soul of your role, determining the overall solidity of a cause-effect relationship that never was and never will be.

Behind every great artist there's a great improvisation. No one can learn and take on a great role without first manifesting their option of turning into someone else. Through a game that always pushes you to surpassing your self-image and your limits, you will be able to recreate the separate parts of a whole in order to create a new quality of it.

Ensuring a separation of reality from the details of a world that lies at the limit of choosing between controlled aleatoric and narrative improvisation means creating a totally new identity by invoking the importance of the role you play in a context of a wider storyline.

The only thing that can make the difference between an extraordinary and an ordinary reality is the test of the symbiosis between the scene that you consider as defining for your character and the story you tell about your Ego.

The Artist And His Art is the man who hides, loses himself, and manages to find himself again, always in a different formula, a new apparition, a new book, in a tear of pain, in an image of the future, in a combination of things conducted in a different context. For an artist, his own personality becomes a film script – a kind of silly world, mad and blind, but from which he can learn much more about himself.

What matters is you take and transmit only what is good from it.

The Artist And The Beginnings Of His Art

On July 13, 2021

Whoever does not know how to look deeply into a flower and extract the essence of a symbol meant to be the subject of a painting detached from imagination, will never be able to accept the reality of an experience of self-knowledge.

I always make a stop in this place: a greenhouse full of flowers, full of alluring smells, of calls, of vivid colors. It is definitely a natural space dedicated to aesthetics. And only my garden knows what it wants from this place, it wants a comparison with a similar model of mutualism, in terms of the content of an image in which any flower smiles happily at the sight of her portrait illustrated on canvas. I am an artist, because any flower that delights my sight immediately becomes a projection of reality on the canvas of creation.

Sometimes I go out in the garden just to remember the tranquility of that greenhouse where the flowers grow faster, blending with other plants and where the most vivid colors predominate. I never thought that a greenhouse so full of flowers would beautify my garden one day, with species born in a space full of diversity, with a contrasting chromatic effect.

Artistic creation is defined by the ability to bring a new and exciting vision, like a return to a place never seen.

And here I am again in the place where my garden got its first rose, the first lily, the first geranium or the first daffodil years ago. Order doesn't matter anymore. But the very fact that something in my garden is part of that wonderful greenhouse, much more interesting than any visit to Dubai, makes me think that I have a chic flower shop, defined by style and elegance, whose work of art can only catch the eye of the painter who properly appreciates the aesthetics of light meant to dominate Paradise. This also distinguishes between "poetry" and "nature".

I'm expected to be an artist myself, aren't I? Because I knew how to gather from a single greenhouse only those flowers from which the composition of the image that beautifies my garden was created. Not for nothing, the essence of the symbol of a rose is the very effect it will have on those who look at it: "A return to a place never seen".

Leadership: Can you find yourself in a variant of the reason for reviewing a visual experience in which a new image of Reality appears, depending on the state you generate within a thematic space such as: "The House of Nature"?

Have you noticed how an artist is formed? One is formed by joining flowers of contrasting colors, sizes or shapes, suggesting beauty, purity, light, life. Their characteristic is the fluidity of the composition that forms the subject of the painting, the open horizon, the lively rhythm of the birth of ideas and their exposition in front of a spectator who sees himself in the center of the world around him. Whoever does not know how to look deeply into a flower and extract the essence of a symbol meant to be the subject of a painting detached from the imagination, will never be able to accept the reality of an experience of self-knowledge.

The next time you visit a greenhouse, knowing you are much closer to art, you may think of my wonderful, well-kept garden, admired by passers-by, where the flowers seem to compete in their charming fragrance and multicolored colors. I don't know why I think so, but my garden is much more enchanting than any greenhouse. Because here in my garden, I can be myself. I feel good, I feel at ease. With only the care of color arrangements in mind.

In a variant of this approach to art, a new image of man living in the middle of nature appears and is seen as an important part of it, as he is portrayed by the writer Gheorghe Schwartz in the novel "The Wizard Apprentice":

"It felt to me that I was extremely tired that day. I was expecting something, I'm not sure what exactly. Something very strange was happening to me. Sometimes – maybe due to fatigue – I have the feeling that everything is happening outside of me, that I play no role in what's happening around me. I look then without thinking about the beauties around me, but reason fragmented into thousands of sparks sparkles in surprising judgments, unrelated to each other. I was and at the same time wasn't myself: I saw them all, I found the strangest comparisons and, in the meantime, I looked at myself like someone else, participating as a spectator in my own show. I could see everything, but I didn't notice anything that would have such a mood-enhancing effect, or at least nothing striking."

Have you noticed why an artist is more than a fan of colorful flowers, able to find comparisons between symbols and reality? Because, regardless of the state he has in when utilizing symbolism in art, he looks at himself as someone else, participating as a spectator in his own show (which can be seen from the flowering of the garden).

Visual experience is the perception you form of what excites you when what attracts you is what you admire about yourself through resemblance or comparison to the soul of nature.

The visual experience in which a new image of Reality appears is closely related to the perception you have about the world around you when you are the only witness to the evolution of a theme called: "Personalization of a variety of emotions experienced through comparison."

The Artist And The Beginnings Of His Art refer to the reality of a self-knowledge experience in which the possibility to access a high level of spirituality depends on how you use the true spectacle of nature to perform a personal exploration in order to promote an authentic Creation.

The Artist and The Triumph Of His Art

On May 06, 2017

Assume your fidelity to what is gained through inspiration when you only see yourself accentuated by the feeling of sublime and the rest is no longer seen.

Things had gone mad, they went completely mad as if in a bold painting of an incomprehensible artist that began with a few inspirational splashes. I wanted to capture them in a certain order, in a one second image to modify their parameters before creating too much variation between external determinations, but I didn't manage to get to the end line of normality.

Because I myself, caught in the whirlwind of wandering, in front of the most fantastic theorems of chemistry, which I am not usually sure I would be able to endure, I was the one who painted the world as he wished, limited by the opportunity to meditate on his own survival. Here is an interesting line from a novel written by John Fowles: "When the narrative is based on missed opportunities, you can be sure a bad script will come out."

Constrained by unfavorable circumstances, I began to use my imagination in terms of its connection with objective reality, just as the artist forgets to look elsewhere than in the eyes of the model he draws, immediately capturing the line of a secondary topside that forms to the right of a "multi_match" query to explore other searches similar to an "output" of a reference model.

The need to find a common pattern between reality and the appearance of things difficult to accept, from where the splendor of an art that deserves a thorough knowledge, the configuration induced by an expressive culture, compelled me to draw an analogy between seemingly irrelevant events and assumptions whose achievements did not seem impossible. In order to succeed a tormented victory over science that studies the laws of artistic creation I had to go, in many ways, against individual searches.

Leadership: Do you transform your capabilities and evolving conditions into the premises of an art that gradually departs from the purpose of its creator?

The status you fill when serving as a symbol of the being that aspires to overcome the condition of seeing the world in a certain way, confronting the challenge called "Stay In The Unique Work of Art", is sometimes a deformation of the image of the world you have in your consciousness. Of course, you can refer to art as a game of survival in the face of things that make you pay attention to another dimension of reality, one based on the convention of narration addressed to someone other than the creator himself, and that's because everything you say and think about yourself is the means of delimiting yourself from the routine manifestations of life.

Having access to the values that guide you in life, such as faith, individual freedom or the courage to act, means to sometimes resort to excessive accentuation of features that either slip into the sublime or reflect with a changed sign – into the ridiculous. The art to which you must relate, in terms of freedom to think in images, in terms of story and narrator, remaining true to the ambition to perform in writing, tends to emphasize the sublime of a confession that truly communicates the substance of one's own beings.

Does your perception of reality extend to the depths of your being?

You can, for example, take into account the high-definition image of the "go forward" type that you are making haste on at the very first moment of the reception to identify it as representative. Here, the features of the image indicate an open color, the inner part of the person, such as consciousness, compromise, and knowledge. Or, on the contrary, you get to consider a blurred image that is pronounced for some features with maximum psychological expressiveness, such as introversion, depression, hostility.

When you are an artist you are confronted not only with the easel and emotions, but with the story of a dreamer who only by imagining the worst possible world will be able to turn it into a better one.

In his works, Rembrandt did not describe nature, but the inner world of man. He psychologized the pattern, discovering in the traits of his face the depth in which he alone ventured to look. Here's what it means to fix your attention in a mirror of your own image as an alternate universe, and to measure your identity according to what the face wants and what only the face knows, everything starting from both an instinctual and intuitive act.

To transform your capabilities and evolving conditions into the premises of an art that gradually departs from the purpose of its creator is to use your imagination only in terms of the connection with the objective reality and to lose sight of that reflection of the mirror that you are, along with your character and features.

The best artists consider themselves to be the projection of a mirror image: first they are impressed by what they see, invaded by a whole sense of uniqueness, and then they feel they have to keep a moment of solemnity. Throughout this time, a form of personal power becomes real in their minds that becomes real as the relationship with themselves becomes more prominent.

Leadership is the unique value of the "authentic" work of art that is based on locating the essence of man in the conditions of using an alternative rendering of reality, as a continuity of the experience of being someone else, in the form of an author who continues to intrigue his readers.

The Artist and the Triumph of His Art are two sides of a mirror that makes you dizzy.

In leadership you have the obligation to be more than what you think you are. It means to assume your fidelity to what is gained by inspiration when you only see yourself accentuated by the sublime feeling and the rest is no longer seen.

The Artist's Eyes Are Subordinated To Affective Values

On June 15, 2023

The perceived element tends to manifest itself in your reality, often through a transfiguring perception of it.

If the eye knows how to see, then the mind can grasp the concrete, and the heart is refreshed like a flower that feeds on light. Especially when I am on vacation at the seaside, relaxed, in a good mood, refreshed by the feeling of a mysterious harmony between depth and purity, then the mind works best, because the eye no longer tries to observe, but really admires, recognizes the pure beauty in the painting a world reborn from light. The affective values attributed to the place where I am, confronting them with a restricted expressive element, such as peace or fulfillment, hide behind an image full of meaning Atalyente Dimielasarr Esotrenthis, a moment of self-discovery, of faith, of memories.

I see the sea, I hear the sound of the waves in a place where details matter, and I feel the salty smell of water that seems to replace the air, which instantly relaxes you, eliminating tension, irritability and restlessness, at least in the short term. And this helps me form a broader picture in approaching the artistic phenomenon, because painting is not only drawing and color, vision and perspective, but represents the extension of a sense strongly connected to life.

If my eyes are subordinated to the affective values that the place where I am builds, without feeling any tension release as the brain gets used to visualizing images that encourage relaxation, then the creative process takes place spontaneously and automatically.

And what are affective values? What do they represent in a moment of receiving an impression that changes the movements of the soul, similar to the construction of a poem that finds, above all, the combustion necessary to burn within itself?

Leadership: Do you use the image of figures that become metaphors, to feed your self permeated by the need to express an emotional state?

Affective values are the pillars of recalling an amazing number of very deep sensations and therefore, they are related to the existence of synesthesia, that is, the simultaneous perception of a set of auditory, visual, olfactory elements. Besides that, the affective values, ferried in a certain spiritual density, so without remaining closed in the tiring rigor of an ordinary thought, belong to the manifestation of the Brush-Ink couple, associated with the vital breaths Yin-Yang.

Of course, it's not just about abstractions, benchmarks with general "value", indices that represent the level of consciousness, emotional and psychic development. In particular, the affective values are the result of the awareness of that serene, reconciled state of mind, permeated as if by the mystery of eternal things that surrounds the artist.

Let me list some affective values found in an artist: purity, idealization, appreciation, introspection, fulfillment, satisfaction, attachment, enlightenment, delicacy, exaltation, dedication.

All this eases my need for complete rest, prolonged by the sea in a soothing ambience, enriched with the relaxing experience of viewing an enchanting sunset, a sphere of light colored in a splendid red-orange, projected on the plane of a horizon that transforms any painting into a closed universe, perfect and self-sufficient.

I still wonder if nature has not created this moment of sweet respiro especially for me, so that I can more easily enter into communion with the divinity, so that I can turn the present into a timeless space of bliss and serenity, in a unique design where memories will come alive again.

Leadership: Can the image on which you focus your attention highlight the existence of synesthesia in a natural setting that remains unaffected by the passage of time?

Indeed, the eyes perceive the observable image in a time horizon close to it, passing horizontally through a path that goes up to the "first common superior" and then back down to the plane of real retrospection of authentic experiences. However, the sensation of a "persistent but discreet smell" can provide a framework that transmits feelings. The smell of the sea respects my emotional values, it does not withdraw from me the feeling of soulful fulfillment that characterized the well-known painter Nicolae Grigorescu, in the view of the writer Alexandru Vlahuta:

"Grigorescu did not seek to solve problems, nor to preach. After all, he did not seek anything. From the multitude of soothing moments, from the multitude of impressions, from the fecund powers of his life, a part of himself, a cleaner, more luminous, more worthy of the realm of poetry. This, and only this, became painting."

Even now I remember the sea, with its strong waves, it seemed endless when I watched it from the shore. But since I could not see the space beyond the edge of the observable horizon, I could not know whether the size of the image that was attracting my attention, in its totality, was finite or exhaustible. The sea breeze, the salty smell, the relaxation and the days of rest on the beach, were the assets that brought me to the present state. Be that as it may, every day spent at the seaside was a moment of rediscovery, of unique emotions, of return and, last but not least, of memories.

There are some special moments that deserve to be kept for a long time not only in memory, but also in color...

I still wonder: why did my eyes look at the sea with such affection, forgetting anything and everything? Because the sea also looked at me with the same affection, and from her look I understood that she felt the same. As if, looking at me, she wanted to forget all the vanity of this world. Looking at her longingly, she said something to me before I left, but so that only I could hear:

- On that fine sand that washes away with one breath, only one man, an artist endowed with aesthetic power, left visible, irreplaceable traces. I took the tracks back, just to be sure that he will return to me, and then he will reveal to me what purity, perfection, eternity, peace is, associating them with the image of other colors.

Leadership has in its composition the soul's need to transcend, to contemplate the spiritual beauty, and to integrate into a whole all the moments that are realized through creation.

The Artist's Eyes Are Subordinate To Affective Values if you consider the following aspect: you have to go through all the "impermanent" moods if you want to truly experience a sublime moment. These eyes know how to see, as in clear water, everything that comes to the surface with passion, beyond any honest reasoning, in an artistic image: that inner light that connects you to everything and brings you inner peace, that ecstasy of the soul drunk with freedom.

This inner light will also shine on the outside, in a painting made in water colors.

The Artists Eyes Give The Moment Something Of Eternity

On May 04, 2023

What you see in real time is what you experience when you find your soul's place in memory.

At last week's half marathon, I noticed something interesting. A personal trainer was running alongside his student, a he and a she, and they ran slowly, without separating from each other, as if they were part of a painting framed by the theme: "Impulse Control". Obviously, the purpose of running together was not to aim for a place on the podium, a position provided with a stable soul resistor, of self-giving and hard work, but more important was for the personal trainer to determine "the trajectory of a system that tends towards a state of equilibrium".

So the subject had to be de-stressed, without any extreme deflection, so that it was stable in the central position of running in a straight line.

With a deep, unalterable feeling, I looked at them without my eyes distracting from them. The atmosphere had exerted its pressure on the emotional background of the individuals, from where they could only escape through a "derivative of zero", a status attributed to stability in any direction, in varied terrain, in various postures and positioning of the mind in relation to the body.

Leadership: Do you have to see a close-up picture to distinguish between "immediate action" and distant action?

As I said, the student ran side by side with the coach. Something of one was a part of the other, as if a mixture of rare spirits had taken place in a picture of long ago. It was the immortalization of an auspicious moment in a kind of pure, expressionist painting, of great compositional force, which the artist perceives with different eyes, in a different way, with the senses of an infusion of tranquility, in an extraordinary carousel of symbols and meanings deep. And when they ran, motivated, with the impossibility of putting a limit to their moods, when they strained their muscles only to half their capacity, my eyes could glimpse from time to time a quiet, steadfast, pure self-giving.

They say that every hero has his weak point, this is true. I still wonder who was the hero: the trainee, or the trainer? However, the coach only did what I would have done in his place, he practiced the benchmark of comparison, that "stand by me, without being intimidating and intimidated by one another", representing a pretext for expressing the feeling of satisfaction, trying to conveys a special peace of mind, superior to the usual. Maybe that's why my eyes were calm, because there was a calmness in their gaze, a peace you can't find anymore, which reached me.

Of course, my eyes knew this truth, and they knew it too well: good communication depends on the art of listening. Look how a single look knows how to listen, depending on the circumstances, to a generalized state. He is silent and listens, like a good advisor, to the voice of their gaze, and in the voice the astonishment of an artist who has managed to conquer the unknown, just as at the sight of something delightful but unexpected, without him actively campaigning for the impressionist style, takes shape.

What was there in their running but a way of expressing a feeling of strong affection, born of kinship, admiration for the hero who does not let you down, for the artist who tames all expressions with rare stylistic art?

Leadership: Does the image you refer to remove from indifference the need to escape into a parallel reality where everyone tends to portray themselves as heroes?

As a rule, for a runner, the half-marathon becomes the ideal setting to dialogue with himself, just like a painter who cannot distance himself from his work, choosing to see and amplify the beauty within himself in a stirring universe, very rich in color and varied. Specific to the character of a runner is that short and crazy burst of emotion, when he detaches himself from the style imposed by the outside, removing from indifference the need to escape into a parallel reality in which everyone tends to portray himself as Miltiades.

Everything that comes from the heart, with an amazing inner strength, triggers an alert magical thread, masterfully built around a symbolism as old as the world: that of spirituality manifested poignantly in an exaltation of supreme heroism, worthy of a true veneration. Touching, captivating, noble, the half-marathon was the reason for my persistence to capture an unforgettable image, a form of non-verbal communication that contains a message, a representation of a concrete reality that contains information about its real object, having a status of an independent painting.

Leadership: Can you capture an image in which "everything connects with everything", through the prism of a spiritual perception, independent of long and short film?

This is how things are in art: the painter sees what another only feels, or glimpses, but does not see. Especially, here, a fragment from the book "Egyptologist" by Arthur Philips, when the main character confesses his belonging to an experience beyond time, comes very well:

"I live for millions of years while you only live tonight, someone once told me as he floated away. Millions of years? Don't you want to be interested and join me for millions of years? Can you imagine that we two, man and woman, enter into eternity together, two bodies fused for millions of years?"

Every time I will be present at a half-marathon, confronting the images that flash before my eyes, I will try to capture the vastness of a moment plucked from eternity, through the expressive intensity of a restricted element, capable of expressing comprehensive meanings. Because every time my sensitive eyes, inclined to see upwards and outwards, but especially in the intimacy of a collective exaltation, bodily and soulful, will be willing to believe in a perception of a spiritual order, independent of long and short film, called: "abandonment in the expression of a strong and confident spirit".

The vision that leadership makes available must be a special expressive means, able to reproduce a feeling of consubstantiality with the universe, justifying the correspondence with the spiritual leap through art.

The Artist's Eyes Give The Moment Something Of Eternity every time a soulful event takes place. It is clear that the image that my eyes immortalized then, in the middle of the contest, remains an enigma, because, is it not, everything is connected with everything. I would have loved to spend an eternity watching it.

Or, as someone well said, I will try every time to collect happy moments in a cup of memory, and on the celestial paths to run with my longing...

The Artist Of A Life That Assumes Immortality

On July 10, 2019

Learn to create the environment necessary to reveal your deep feelings, giving credibility and consistency to the time you dedicate to the image of The Other.

I try to relate my perception of the world to the maturity of a life experienced with both ups and downs, conceived in the nostalgia and dream of a red rose, Double Delight, seen as a character with a Kafkaesque interior structure. Constrained by the way in which art is received in a context favorable to creation, I feel more and more attracted, more enveloped by the mystery of this connection that I would most certainly like to tell you.

The connection to art is seen at the level of excellence in transforming a moment of return of the spirit of innovation into a story that is constantly weaving at the level of life-duration of a rose that experiences, gloriously, every second as if it should carry out an eternal project. There is a soul in this rose, beyond form, color, perfume, freshness, manifesting itself actively in the message of a more comprehensive reality than any other writing style, than any major religion of the world, than any experience of beauty and visuality.

Regarding the real mirroring of nature's life in my spirit, I feel like wandering in a labyrinth whose exit is vaguely indicated by strange signs, most often ignored by the strength of memories that guide every man to a better world, a world confirmed by viewing an image that is supposed to be important and positive for the realization of the idea of "eternity".

The need to unburden myself aims to conceptualize and model the image of "Another", too little taken into account by the rest of the world, but always present in my soul. Apparently, in front of eternity, my rose can produce any metamorphosis, resists any relationship with the world, with its things, with any hidden thoughts, with the feelings of a heart that continues to beat into a supreme being, always above the others, with any possible association that would induce the view that the hazard may influence the terms of the transition from ephemeral to meaning.

Leadership: Can you integrate yourself into an image superimposed on the original, highlighting on an echo vibration of the creative process that connection formed between the "I actually cannot forget what I feel" and the embrace of a particular fact?

The idea of eternity is given to the artistic valences of a perfect work that an Absolute Creator, in a wide brush stroke, using only a few tones of color, manages to rush into another world, in another space-time, in another room of memory. The umbrellas and lights that art feels connected, the experience of exploring symbolic projections, the promise of alterity, the revelation of remote connections, all become a kind of enigmatic reality, in which each thing is its very opposite, suspended between real, imaginary and plausible.

The rose is the emblem of a passage from something to someone else, from something entirely unknown to something that constitutes the essence of a meaningful life. The artist, as a black-and-white rehearsal of the same obsessive themes, clarifies his first feelings by highlighting, in embracing a fatto particolare, that state of "nonfinito", the suspension between plausible and real, between natural and mysterious.

Somehow, I feel the whole lavishness of the rose in the face of time, trying to be satisfied with the image of a passing world through the voice of the Egyptian Sinuhe that Mika Waltari captures in the splendor of a troubled history:

"I actually cannot forget what I feel. So, I see myself on a paved road, one I know not where it leads, but I stay on it for as long as I do with my mind full of dust and empty emotions, full of passionate memories. My heart is tired because of telling the story, which made me live my life for the second time. My body is labored. I long for eternal rest. Maybe I'm not happy, but I'm not unhappy because of my loneliness. Maybe I was lonely and farther away from people when I lived among them, because I saw their deeds and understood the vanity of their deeds. All the deeds of men are vain."

The embrace of a particular fact resonates with the production of a reality variant of the type: "an experiencing of an event that is remembered", camouflaged as a learning experience.

In this case, art replaces a concept of the human being in the ensemble of deep resorts of a state of mind which no one can claim as being transient, in the direction of materializing personal reflections that illuminate certain creases of the personality of the artist captured in the hypostasis of a contemplator of society, of life, of his own virtues.

Leadership: Can you value your personality in a symbolic or realistic space, bringing to the forefront of vibration of life a reminder of your transition from a reflexive experience to a sensual experience?

Eternity is a road you travel with the brush on a cloth foreign to the role in your life, but one you familiarize with the nuances of a reality intended to capture each time the imperative of conscience: "do not forget yourself in another version". The rose, captured in the hypothesis of a creator who bows to the moment of association with another character, following the artistic content of a less-known creation, will leave you a "reminder" long embedded in the mind.

In order to understand the language of the rose, the purpose that it assigns to itself in a world researched only by the eyes of an artist, I used the classic convention of rendering the perspective of a human being, creating a sense of similarity – "I have been here before, I have ended up like this before" – as a guideline for the printing of a sustainable style of inspiration for a "naturally" planted existence, in a certain spontaneity of sensibility, creating revealing shapes.

I have endured the torment of transcending a reality compromised by the representation of a passing world, whose meanings are made to serve, under the sign of faith and reason, a work that demands the incarnation of life in harmony with nature. Because life looks different at the heart of a "Double Delight" rose, and I saw her like no one else, confessing to her that it is compatible with the life of an artist who bravely stepped into a new realm, with seductive aspirations, while admitting that his work will never be done.

Leadership: Can you form a distinct personality in the general direction of a life that contemplates itself at every moment and in which the background becomes the "majority trend" in directing creation towards a new interpretation?

The time measured in centuries that my rose has known along a bookish road is revealed as an example of the life of an esthetician who innovates the act of creation through a monologue that I myself, so preoccupied with beauty, am experiencing with so much power in the pages of the novel "Exuvii" by the writer Simona Popescu:

"It is tot past time, lost time, that you are looking for – for nothing has passed, nothing is lost, but a sense in this tangle of which you feed and which breaks you. It is the unity of a being – old and new, a kind of bloomed human coral, younger and older. No, not the time lost, but the parallel time, anxious as a dream that is and is not yours entirely, which is and is not true. And which continues its work. It is not from memories you're made out of – the passive, ornamental, consoling and funeral memory – not from vestiges. You do not have a history. The absolute (and abstract) present, as abstract and present is the time petrified in the ancient conglomerate that carries in its womb sediment and marine shells."

The creation that always honors the interpretation captures that spirit of time whose original organic expression is given by the visualization of the memories that appear near a life that resembles another that you have once been tied to when life seems to contemplate a reality that you cannot leave.

As far as the work of an artist is concerned, which cannot be wiped out by the passage of time, we can say that the background (the thrill of life) becomes a "majority trend" in terms of a suggestion when the reality you relate to becomes a prison, and only the mind can free you, making you better understand who you are.

Leadership is an assessment of past, present and future time from the perspective of a life experience that you experience through the Ego, through what you are prepared to bear emotionally and revealing when you become an inspiration for others.

The Artist Of A Life That Assumes Immortality is the true copy of an image that can be replaced at any time by another, which in turn can receive another interpretation in a life unfolding like a creation in unprecedented forms of expression.

The Artist Of An Infinite World

On January 02, 2016

Learn to recognize the future through what is accomplished within you, simultaneously with the will of creating a different representation of the scene called "World."

I cannot find the smooth path towards the one I truly am and often calls to me under the pretext of continuous turmoil, through the pressure exerted by the mass of the ephemeral, under the force of a lightning strike coming from the space of the necessity to create. To be the artist of a world reborn by applying the method of comparisons, an adept of the vision of the equivalence between fire and water, only from the will of carrying out the most varied of worldly transformations. Without me shuddering in the face of the gigantic informational explosion.

Everything must have a sense behind the world's screen, in the numerous contexts of the mix of real and imaginary. And I feel, with evident curiosity, with the desire of understanding the most profound way the bigger picture, that no matter how much I seek the answers to the great questions of the human condition, of my passing through the world, of the philosophy and the self, I will never find them.

Even if I turn this search into the adventure of my life, a continuation of the tendency of passing to the abstract, a game with unpredictable slides from the sublime to the ridiculous, I will eventually bypass that part of the way that does not belong to me. With all the power of imagination that flexes its muscles in the spectacular race between spaces and places, from every meaning given to objects and processes, of which I fear the time will come to overcome them, will I be able to give life to a powerful synergy?

Leadership: Does the way in which you reveal your inner being serve the role you live in the light of the certainty of life in the forefront of successive events that stir up a certain suspicion vis-à-vis the nature of the reality that you perceive?

I find within me the words of Ioannis Anghelos from his novel, Waltari: "Two moments, apparently separated by many years, are just one and the same. They came to be within me simultaneously. The two moments of clairvoyance, immersed in my being and merged into one another, are the only certitudes of my life, while the successive happenings which I thought were real are only visions and imagination. Weeks, months, years are only measures invented by man. They have nothing to do with real time, God's time."

If I were to be a strong clairvoyant, I could read the strange moment of this morning. In it are gathered, like a necklace of pearls of culture from around the world, all meanings of the incomprehensible formula: birth = life + death. Or maybe my eyes, accustomed with the obscure areas of imagination, are troubled by the misleading magic of a small world encased in the rules of a bigger one.

To answer the call of the artist, leadership can be weighed on the axis of becoming by cultivating the ability of using the real and the imaginary. Both through the knowledge stemming from the line of the present moment, from an experience of seeking answers to the questions of your own identity, such as: "who am I?", and through knowledge resulting from the eventual answers.

Leadership: Can you ensure the driving force that makes the transition from a form of understanding of the type "Low" to a form of understanding of the type "High"?

The Leader-Artist is the man of change who knows how to recognize the future in terms of what comes to be within him simultaneously with the desire of creating a different representation of the scene called "World". Such a man puts everything under the microscope, every misunderstood notion, every feeling, every phenomenon, every moment, as the painter puts together the most different of objects to discover their secret correspondence, and transforms into understanding what is related to the concrete of life to obtain the revelation of the whole.

The ability of generating answers and certainties vis-à-vis the world, with the help of reason and imagination. The ability of countering any idea opposed to its plausible construct by applying the method of comparisons with EVERYTHING around, is the driving force that makes the transition from a form of understanding of the type "Low" to a form of understanding of the type "High."

In other words, a "Low" type of understanding works on the basis of preconceptions or general impressions, but not from experience. While a form of "High" understand, as a product of a creative act, culture and building upon the experience, having influence on intellectual work, works according to reasons coming from reflection, from judgement and reasoning, and not from sensorial or perceptive impulses.

Is what happens within you, together with the will to create another representation of the stage called "World", the quality of recognizing a reality that does not exist and turning it into a reality impossible to challenge?

The Artist Of An Infinite World can fulfill the favorable condition of extending leadership that of being, by researching everything around and by going deeper in himself, much more than what he is. To be enlightened.

Place a piece of what surrounds you in the category of questions, as the painter places a piece of himself in every work, try to find the answer to the conditions of your passing through the world. Applying to yourself the truth you've noticed, in time you will become one with the truth, you will reach an advanced knowledge, and you will be aware at one point of what is essential and what needs to be changed. From an artist, you become enlightened – one who sees reality, beyond death and appearances.

The Artist's Flight Within His Own Universe

On October 22, 2014

Valorize your talent, inspiration and creative imagination, without feeling limited by the requirements based on incoherent or burdensome fundamentals.

Director Sergei Eisenstein is not at all happy in the beginning by the subject given to him for the film entrusted to him, "Alexander Nevsky". The theme doesn't manage to enter his concerns, which are, as we know, pointed towards other directions. The precise requirements imposed upon him by the theme are just as many tyrannical canons for this artist used to fly freely within his own universe.

"Tough situation. The hardest situation in our work, for the creative imagination. To invent a figure for the screen that will strictly correspond to the thematic requirements expressed theoretically with mathematical rigor, in a formula ! This is the formula – create the image based on it ! But there are situations when you've no choice. And it was precisely our case."

With his characteristic irony, Eisenstein thinks of the "saint" Alexander Nevsky whom he had to turn into a hero for his film, after the country turned him into a national hero. *

Leadership: Do you complete your creation by moving science on a "background line" or on a "call line", convinced that you can meet the precise requirements imposed by the theme of your own contribution to the effort to capitalize an image in the most appropriate way?

If you try to increase your value by what you think, through what you create, through what you transmit, accepting the fusion between the demands that are imposed upon you and the producing of innovations that authentically belong to you, it means that you already entered a battle whose real nature can be proved y determining the effects with repercussions on the level of performance.

The transition to a new model of character, possible at any time on the spiral of the need of feeling fulfilled by imposing your own subjectivism, has the role of bringing your level of self-motivation to extremely good rates. A kind of back and forth, without borders, between the position of the analyzed and the analyst, between two disjointed spaces seeking the intermediate area: a free flight in a universe full of abundance.

Tough situation. The hardest situation in your work, for the creative imagination. For a new revival of the spirit of creation exerted over the expressiveness of art is not possible in the conditions of fulfilling the demands that do not correspond to personal capacities, resources or needs. Therefore, the "bottom line" of the science you consider necessary for the practice of art has as a correspondent your concern for creating an image meant to highlight your imposing personality, your presence in the middle of a theme that announces finding answers to those more current enigmas of the contemporary man in relation to the amazing evolution of a controversial character, such as the historical character.

The effort to capitalize on an image in the most appropriate way implies the continuation of the invention of a new character that corresponds strictly with the promotion of his own story about how to act if you reach your personal maximum in another hypostasis.

Leadership continuously transforms not through the isolation of the creator in a static universe, where everything is shrouded in a cautionary speech, but by transposing him in a full universe, complete, exhaustive, enveloped in a dense network of trails of investigating this art.

Who could deny the role the Ego has, as a helpful instrument of the creative artist, as an amplifier of functionality, in the case of future tasks approved by eventual interventions of proactive nature? Does your access to a new stage of maturity, orientation, superior to the previous, not model your perception vis-à-vis the meaning of art in the context of your own universe?

A leader completes his creation by moving science on a "background line", when he relates to his own creative Ego, to the set of prejudices, opinions and beliefs, but in a context comparative with what he has to offer. But also, he can narrow his creative horizon if he moves his science on a "calling line", relating to the requirements and strict demands of the seekers of the exceptional, engaging in certain limits that cannot be exceeded.

Moving science to "a call line" means using a stylistic device, such as analogy, parabola or hyperbola, to highlight the image of a possible cyclical universe, through which you "pass" as an artist to strengthen the credibility of your story under the guise of another character.

The Artist's Flight Within His Own Universe admits the existence of originality and the creative potential based on talent, inspiration, imagination, developed in time to give a novel form to an imposed subject – but which can be limited by burdensome requirements, without a single coherent basis. And as someone stated, in this case you can reach bizarre paradoxes and, while you force your mind to unravel or understand them, you are immediately bombarded by others.

The Artist Who Opened His Eyes To Art

The reality to which you refer your attention is directly proportional to the way your eyes adapt to the sight of an image reflected in your own perception.

I revealed my artistic side by seeing the beautiful way in which the great creations of other artists are presented. And in exchange for a less fleeting reality, I found myself in the face of an unusual reality, meaning the self-denial of perceptions I was not fascinated by. To understand me better, imagine for a moment that you are looking at a painting depicting fresh, red roses in a white vase, all arranged on a gray background. After all, it's all about colors, isn't it?

In fact, I really like the color red, but I don't like shades of gray or white, so this combination of colors can negatively influence the evolution of my vision towards the quintessence of things. Specifically, when my eyes encounter this combination of colors anywhere around, and they will certainly encounter it, they will avoid the possibility of an authentic approach to what I knew to be art. It can be seen that my reality is itself a creation seen through the eyes that open only to what inspires me, but which also regenerates the intensity of my emotional feelings, in the original sensations of knowledge received from the outside world.

Simply put, in my vision, in the pleasure of my eyes to admire a view, a creation or certain things, there is a connection between colors and feelings, at a certain frame of reference. What can I say, maybe I should go through the intransigent filter of a third eye, being necessary to reconsider and reconfigure a reality – taking into account the ability of colors to complement each other and the fact that extremes attract. Life in pink does not mean pink everywhere, but a gray from the serious and sententious one, which is also lost towards white tones, rapidly degrading.

Now, do you understand why I say that sometimes the artistic side of my being understands everything by the way the eye distinguishes colors, using as a point of reference the cognitive component of attraction to the appreciation of beauty as an aesthetic feeling? But before going into more detail in the analysis of beauty, through which any creation can then afford the game of subjectivity, underlying the Logos, I must take into account, as a good method of training, awareness of the peculiarities of conception and language of creation of the artists I admire.

Leadership: Is your gaze a synthesis of the whole being that has lost itself due to boundless pride, sabotaged by the complex of its own superiority?

I was reading at one point in an art book about that painter in Antwerp named Joos Van Cleef, the best colorist of his time. He painted his paintings backwards so that people could see something interesting even when the paintings were turned upside down. He had a little problem with reality, I'd say. The paintings he painted, true works of art, where he saw them from those to whom he had sold them, he sought to borrow back, in order to "correct" them as he said. And so, he ruined them all.

It is a great pity that he ruined such beautiful things, such valuable artistic products, only because of the ambition to give voice to a vision that the eye wanted to multiply, to translate it into a vision that went beyond the limits of the unanimously accepted normal.

Are we dealing with a creator of a visual thinking system? However, perhaps Joos Van Cleef had another reality behind his eyes, an excellent opportunity to test his innovative spirit, less a vision of the rationalist Enlightenment. Probably, his initiative was not perceived in terms of "negative side effects", because these also remained within a different reality. He perceived the opposite side of things, just as I prefer the contrast of colors to their opposite.

It's all in the gaze. And sometimes the gaze is a synthesis of the whole being that has lost itself due to boundless pride, being sabotaged by the complex of its own superiority.

Let me tell you something else. Most of the colors that my eye perceives are not a switch and distraction from the source of a stressful situation, but rather are the result of a specific need, a desire, a belief, and serve the purpose of satisfaction that a freelance artist wants to have. In fact, my eye does not know what Enlightenment is, just as it does not know how to paint, but it has a great influence on how I see the world, things, how I manifest and how I understand to be what I am.

A being that has lost its direction is the result of an Ego that continues to look for causes for which to suffer, continuing to be a Don Quixote, a reckless hero always ready to tilt at windmills.

If I happen to wake up faced with an unknown reality, convinced that I can change it or correct it in my favor, this is because my eyes have sensed an experience where the boundaries between themselves and the rest of nature are blurred. Or, perhaps the eye has noticed an experience where the satisfaction is lower and where the result of the evaluation of the submitted work, influenced by the individual performances, is not considered reasonable.

And as the sensations of sight become attention the moment in which only the eyes capture the essence of external objects, then the reality to which I refer is directly proportional to the way the eyes are filled with joy or anger at the sight of an image reflected in one's own perception.

That's the way it is. Leadership acquires valences of involvement in an act of self-knowledge through an act of creation, through which one can develop self-perception, but can also acquire valences of educating the spirit of self-transcendence. This is suggestive because, through an attitude of supposed superiority, man will lose more and more his value as a being, he will want to capitalize more and more on his potential without confronting anyone other than himself.

How is the personality that best defines you in order to acquire a sense of reality? Are you the kind of man who seeks perfection in happiness and glorification? Are you an artist who finds his perfection in acquiring the resemblance to a beauty seeker who is very much concerned with the external element? Can the branded content of your art be defined as the content of a creator of beauty through the very art of impression by impression? Will this cause you to revolt against yourself one day?

The way the eyes continue to see reality is closely related to the way you feel inside yourself, with the mention that an Ego that is self-convinced and self-deluded that it has a certain power is an Ego that lives permanently outside of it.

The Artist Who Opened His Eyes To Art is a seeker of beauty who only by cultivating a positive sense of self will learn to distinguish the feelings of the being from those of the Ego, bringing a balance in his mind and heart. Such an artist will know how to command his eyes to see only what the mind is prepared to understand, not what the mind is willing to believe.

The Artistic Eye

On September 27, 2023

What you see is what you become in an image that transcends the limits of reality, opening the door to new worlds of endless possibilities.

The requirements of the art of seeing are met, almost entirely, from the first contact of my eyes with the light blue of the sky. I must first recognize what dreaming can make available to me by practicing the habit of ways to enable me to remember. Then I have to make guarantees about the captivating content of a painting theme, and last but not least, I have to bear the idea that the view I have before my eyes, which I admire, which I contemplate, cannot fill the entire circle of vision from a certain part.

So, I am at the sea, on the unforgettable coast of Greece, on the unimaginably colorful shore with all kinds of plants, where tourists walk about with ever increasing admiration. In this atmosphere full of life and activity, with people walking around admiring the beauty of nature, accompanied by an inner peace, art can take shape if feeling turns into painting. It's the exhilarating moment when the artist connects with their own passion and emotion, then puts it on canvas. Every touch he applies to the canvas becomes an expression of his inner feeling, and painting becomes a way to communicate and share these emotions with others.

Therefore, if I walk on the beach accompanied by a state of deep peace and simple joy, it is because through feeling and painting the artist creates a special connection between himself and everything around him, offering the world a unique visual and emotional experience. I also add that the rendering of a painting must be accentuated by the reflections of the sun on the surface of the water, which creates a vibrant contrast with the cobalt depths of the sea that the artist immortalizes in vibrant colors and rich textures, through his reflection in an impressionistic image that captures the unsettling yet soothing essence of the endless blue expanse.

Leadership: Can the art of knowing how to immerse yourself in the immaculate image of an ordinary life reinvent a picture made up of the pieces of a moment that will never return?

The sea, a subtle line between sky and water, mirroring the depth and mystery of nature in a pictorial image, represents for me a way to escape from reality, a way for the artist to express his emotions freely, pure or tumultuous, depicting each wave as a metaphor for life and each shade of color as a window into his soul. In other words, the sea so mysterious and deep, full of life and energy, represents in a pictorial image a mirror of the artist's emotions, emotions that make me a traveler in the labyrinth of the soul, reflecting every commotion, every silence from my depths.

A calm, clear sea can represent happiness and peace, while a stormy sea can represent sadness and anger. Looking at the sea with my eyes that sparkle because of the sun's rays reflected in it, I find myself in harmony with myself, in a Eptastfes Thelesager Loricienta frame, a complete whole of the imaginary horizons of a free soul, specifying the fact that I return from a moment that will never come back, but with precious memories in the heart.

Built from pieces of a moment that will never return, the painting with which I share my deepest and most personal feelings, the painting with which I portray my desire to ride the waves and experience the adventure of the endless seas, becomes a contribution to the eternity of the movement and beauty of nature, a tribute to the sea and its waves in my art.

Leadership: Can you develop a unique visual image by experiencing a sense of great wonder, like a kind of overwhelming revelation in the face of fateful coincidences?

But in order for me to render an authentic painting that reveals the essence of myself, bringing to life my deepest emotions and passions, the sun's rays must dance on the surface of the water, and the foaming waves must be shrouded in mystery and grandeur. Something needs to inspire my heart more so that I can create truly authentic art, something that awakens that inner spark, that reminds me of my passion and creativity, deeply rooted in an Isatieosush Consipyers Starrasul, a feeling of presence beyond time.

Whoever read "the cavern of Steenfoll" by Wilhelm Hauff will remember that farmer on a deserted island, who had gotten used to the thought that one day some spirit might reveal the secret of a treasure. Be careful: that's where the greatest luck could come from !

One day, a huge wave rolled a bundle of seaweed and sand at his feet. A yellow stone glistened among the pebbles: a golden ball, which was in fact the remains of a massive bar that had fallen to the bottom, which the waves had eaten away and was reduced to the size of a rifle bullet. And only now it dawned on him, without any doubt, that once, somewhere, close to that shore, a ship with a valuable cargo had sunk and that he was destined to find the treasures swallowed up by the waves. And this thought slowly grew in his mind, until it took control of his whole being.

Such a feeling of great amazement, an overwhelming revelation, an extasis edificante must also encompass me in order to be able to create an impressionist work from the point of view of art, as a result of a fateful coincidence. What makes my heart flutter with the pride of a unique discovery, increasing the satisfaction of creation, is my talent to offer a personal interpretation of the pictorial subject by creating a powerful visual image.

In addition, the story can also be seen as an invitation to explore and discover. Sometimes to find your inner treasure you have to be a brave seeker on the high seas, not just a mere onlooker who is content with the quiet contemplation of the horizon to feed his soul.

The waves of the sea, so strong and unpredictable, can be seen as a representation of natural forces that are always in motion. And the golden ball, which is so small and fragile, can be seen as a representation of the fragility of my life, putting me in a position to carefully project my gaze on the sea, the sun and the eyes that feed me with their beauty.

Leadership is rooted in the art of turning an idea into reality, and the ability to create an image can only be acquired by looking at images that create a certain identity between the Plane of Inner Exploration and Artistic Vision.

The Artistic Eye is more than a tool of observation. It is a culmination of the effort to reason a real or intuitive experience, it is a mediator between objective reality (stable and consistent), and subjective experience (variable and personal), playing a crucial role in the way I understand and interact with everything around me.

Do not forget that the painter is not only an observer of nature, but also an artist who creates his own world. He is not content to just reproduce what he sees, but wants to create an artistic experience that is authentic and emotional. Wilm Falke in Hauff's book was a simple farmer who lived his life in a quiet way. But when he saw the golden ball, he was seized with a burning passion to discover the treasure that was hidden in the depths of the sea.

This can be seen as a representation of the transformation from a simple man, into an artist who nurtures his desire to learn more about the world around him and to experience new things. In fact, the artist's motto is: "Continuous Exploration and Creative Expression."

"Creative expression" refers to how the artist translates these experiences and feelings into an artistic form, using images, colors, sounds and words to communicate and share with others the depth and beauty of their inner experiences.

The Artistic Level In Leadership

On May 07, 2017

Improve your experience of creating new models of exposing your concepts of the world, man, and life by developing the ability to generate ideas from those emotions and feelings that have changed the trajectory of your own becoming.

I had the terrible feeling that I was living in a sense of getting closer to the art of conciliating physics with God, but inclined to the skill of a Rembrandt who liked to penetrate deep into the psychology of those portrayed. I quickly learned to stimulate "blind variation" by allowing imagination to work freely and to create new associations of ideas detached from the structures of an elementary genetics, randomly generated from the colors of an impossible world.

In that season of hurried evolution, subsumed by the reminder of a foreign and implacably hostile biochemistry, the ever more pronounced death, like the ever-tortured life, formed the branch of a science of victimization. A science whose morphology-dominated power, from the shock-reaction scheme that violated the laws of genetics, was equal to the sum of the variations between the information at hand and momentary discoveries.

Probably, the evolution of my personality was directly proportional to the perfect mastery of the art of exposing new conceptions about the world, about life, in a kind of approach to the pulse of nature, to its sciences. Luckily, nature always asks to be venerated not only by human sacrifices, but through the lens of the resurrection of man to life, on the axis of the art of going forward, but also considering the hope that it will be overcome by all the obstacles, to be able to answer to the reproaches of attempting to return to the origins.

It was a kind of commitment to let myself be inspired by the combination of only two tones that frightened me from the hour of uncertain, red and black liberty, transformation through death and resurrection through torment. Red gave the impression of horror with fantastic elements that suddenly gained a perfectly rational explanation, the black let lay an uncertainty about my moment of glory.

Leadership: Does your creation produce a change in the way of representing reality compared to the act of processing an image that ensures the accuracy of self-representation in relation to an innovative artistic experience?

There was a remarkable resonance between Divine Will and Divine Presence, between interiority and exteriority. A delusion of the subdued world. A work in which art modeled human sensitivity, intensifying it to the most aggressive anger in a present that no longer had the hope of a future. I think that the image of which I had to ensure the accuracy of my self-representation, being in the foreground of a creation called "Reflection on the evolution of the world", was given by the true representation of a reality that cultivates more "news" rather than "fake", so a reality that can suddenly become unpredictable.

In leadership, creation gains exceptional valences from the rule in a psycho-behavioral test that compares what you see - with what you would like to see, measuring your ability to understand a very complex reality.

The same creation, seen from the perspective of self-representation, referring to myself as a small treatise on science meant to strengthen a fortress both on paper and in the evolution of the world, continues with the added value of an artistic experience of the "crossing borders" type. An artist must look beyond the images in front of him, beyond appearances, beyond the horizon, beyond formal education, to be able to master all the conquests of art: vision, ideals, creative philosophy, feelings of a new world, perceptions of a modernism of reality, the alliance between rigor and fantasy.

Everything in the background of the events was colored with an unusual realism, psychotic as in a shaded portrait that refuses reduction and simplification in favor of the nuances treated with amazing truth, which raises the worrying question: what is it like to be alone in the fight with demons?

The traces of the outline of tears dropped to intense linear patterns tried to question the universe of sensibility, full of poetry, of the artist who under the guise of a seeming apathy, but conventional in many respects, had the gift of dissimulating a certain individuality.

Leadership: Do you rise up to the expectations of a role that gives you the opportunity to achieve a beautiful creation, by evaluating your talents in line with an unpredictable continuity?

I thought I would be able to group my thoughts and experiences into a new idea, by confronting them, by solving the seemingly hostile contradictions of a world of transition, an attribute of knowledge and nobleness for which I was predestined – in the face of the terrible suspense of a life full of ups and downs.

The projection theorem says that the projection on an axis of the result of a system of forces is equal to the sum of the projections on the same axis of the forces that make up the system.

This true art I was facing, I felt its shivers from which were born monsters, in turn highly captivated like in a thriller qui touche, qui pose des questions jusqu'à la fin, a thriller that played tricks with my mind, was the perfecting of a genetics meant to solve insoluble problems: "what is life, what is man, what is the world, what is man in the world?"

It was as if I had to give birth to a poetics that would capture in its nets the innovative elements of higher-level thinking but still insufficiently cultivated in the process of evolution on the axis of a system of forces that admitted a single result equal to my moment of luck in life. Of course, I have yet to find the answers. But I'm still looking. I'm still alive.

Leadership is asserted by a quality that everyone should appreciate: to be able to define the distinction between what is happening to you and what makes you continue to go forward, giving you a true picture of the position you occupy within a coherent composition.

The position may be that of an artist who understood life and received it in his works as a vocation and assumed it as a mission. Or that of the artist who, by living in the midst of storm-beaten society, starts to portray that society as an unimaginable human ideal.

The motivation and willingness to participate in the call for change is determined by appreciating the evolution over time of an interesting but painful phenomenon. And, at the same time, by estimating how to manifest yourself through artistic sensitivity. By being able to express yourself on the various plans of creation that will mix the will of the miraculous with that of the supernatural. Through the inward start to adhere to a shred of knowing the truth about what is to be avoided in a context of despair.

The Artistic Level in Leadership is provided by the experience to create new patterns of exposure to concepts about the world, man and life, by developing the capacity to generate ideas arising from those emotions and feelings that changed the trajectory of your own becoming.

The artistic level is even higher, the better you manage to psychologize your whole story, especially the boundary between life and death. And your true spectacle occurs when you allow your imagination to work freely and to create new associations of randomly generated ideas from the colors of an impossible world.

The Artistic Side Of My Being

On October 29, 2018

Optimize your creative energies through a permanent renewal of the image of the man next to you.

I wanted to paint in the same way she looked at me, as a bearer of deep images related to the widest life, in order to recognize my purpose in the mystery of a centuries old tale. She seemed to envy me. She understood everything at a glance of the artistic spirit, as if feeling like a contestant at another moment of life considered to replace the former, like a stranger in a confused world, trying to penetrate the deep mystery of a work of art fed by the overflow of an uncontrolled imagination.

To feel fulfilled you must capture the immediacy of the moment translated to the imaginary of perspective, from hypothetically to possible, taking care of the soul's passion arranged in the symbolic plan of points, lines, shapes and colors.

She was the miraculous presence that announced the outer appearance of things, their contour, their shape or their material density. It was the hidden nature of an impossible reality to be subjected by spirit and will. I seemed to be the vital breath that animated her whole imagination, the surrounding fabric, the world she had created herself. For, after all, what did our love novels teach us, other than the fact that it is good to believe in the poetics of a propensity for imagination and reverie?

In a sense, the creative experience also gave its word before talent, that in certain circumstances, when one looks at your answer to all the questions, when it seems to you that you are part of a whole movement that occurs only in terms of colors, nuances, and imaginary projections, you only recognize that what you really lack is the ability to make someone memorize you in a faraway space.

The meaning of an ambitious young woman, bringing a palpable result into the field of a flawless art, is in line with the desire to make a comparison between what you are you are told you are and what you can offer in terms of beauty.

Leadership: Can you place art in the forefront of the viewer as a creative space of a story you cannot separate yourself from, displaying interpretations of parts of a reality that transmit emotions full of metaphysical mysteries?

Forgive me the boldness, beautiful lady, you are probably looking for the fire that feeds on the sincere existence of my feelings, the story behind my paintings, the crumbs of worries and hope that escape the definitive grasp of art, adding to this that intense livelihood which can be offered to you by the aesthetic participation in the frame of a new world.

I promise not to disappoint your expectations, in Expressionist terms, because I will not cause the exaggeration of formal elements such as color, surface and patina to express emotional narratives in the images of a nature that awaits the sign of the separation of reality from the unreal. My art is a lump of imagination and hidden desires that I prefer not to reproduce in a fairy-tale painting, although it tempts me.

The whole view of a feminine youth is closely linked to the meaning of life that works with the strengthening powers of the artist wishing to extend his understanding of art by placing exaggerated conditions on the creation of a distinctive visual identity, evoking only feelings of admiration for the purity of beauty. Her sensitivity seems to belong to a world imagined by an artistic preoccupation, a world that tries to convince you that there is no death, but only a continuation of dreams.

In other words, this being inspired by love and admiration is more than an early modeling of the peculiarity of the high-intensity experience in which man imagines himself when he acquires something beyond expectations. Predominantly, it invites you to a teenage vision of living in a star-sign that abstracts time and takes you into the worlds of the absolute, betraying in this way a striking outward intention of consciously controlled spiritual states. More and more, it betrays that emotional power of line poetry or chromatic sensuality, which an artist must know how to use for the purpose of capturing a glimmer of expression in a unique portrait.

Leadership: Are you struggling to reinvent yourself in a new aesthetic dimension to decipher through intuition a hidden reading on the backdrop of an intelligence that encountered at the right time the school of thought - destined to visual expression?

A talented artist always vibrates with the gravity of the image that troubles him, without allowing any other inspiration from outside his muse. From this point of view, I think I am very much alike to Mr. Cunningham talking to Miss Westcott, from a novel by writer Mary Balogh.

"Allow me to somewhat explain to you the process of creation. I only speak with the person I want to paint, I observe and listen to it. I get to know her as well as possible. I sketch while we talk and then choose my themes by appealing to a half-symbolic reality to cultivate the mystery that she will pursue with bathed breath. Finally, when I feel ready, I make a final sketch and paint the portrait after her. It is a slow process that takes a long time. It cannot be rushed. Or varied. It is a bit chaotic, maybe, but that is how I work.

Indeed, there is nothing orderly in the creative process. You can give it time, effort and discipline, but beyond that, you have little control over the art that comes from the soul. I'm not sure this is the right word, but I have never been able to think of another more correct one, because my art does not seem to come from a conscious part of the mind."

Leadership: After all you have experienced in a moment of inspiration, do you continue to question the reality you perceive by amplifying the existential mystery and imaginary's role in shaping it?

She seems overwhelmed by a certain degree of blurring in the correct appreciation of the overall picture, in an a priori of making a sense of thought on something that many are afraid to admit. Undoubtedly, her mere presence is a sign of reverence and unforgettability for the artist who seems to act in the sense of an illusionist thought, not allowing her the luxury of presenting an impeccable final work without taking into account what someone less experienced wants to see regarding the expressionist phenomenon.

The chromatic dialogue between the pale red of your lips and the transparent look of the gaze lost a little in dreaming reveals the sensibility of a love of the beauty of a poem emanating from eternity. Admirable, you are like the one who first imagines a happening, until he accepts it as a reality, then puts it in a dream state. I flee from reality, run away, but I always return to it and put it on paper in a drawing that seems to be the answer to all the enigmas of the world.

That is why I would not dare convince you of the plasticity and the eidetic mood of the one who comforted the words with the charm of a perfect artist, with that hue full of the meaning of an endless story. But I would do it so that everything seems to come from you, with all your heart's desire to free yourself as soon as possible from the anxiety instinct installed in front of the unknown horizon to be revealed through creation.

I have not yet decided how I should understand you without ignoring the willful confusion that is part of the surrealist collage of a dreamlike life imagined as an extension of the desire to explore the potential of a sincere look that curiously raises to the height of another world. The one you, in a certain way, abandoned.

Not for nothing, my conception of art is akin to the curiosity of the new entrant in a faraway world, as an early modeling of the peculiarity of experiencing the cosmogony of a suspended friendship in the alternation of tones of twilight-red and tan-yellowish.

Leadership can represent the charm you find in a creation whose power of persuasion depends exclusively on the effective use of the perspective (of communicative essence) between what you can do with the "Forever" mark and what is hidden beyond a supposed appearance called "the dose of fiction".

The Artistic Side Of My Being can only be understood by the young and beautiful young lady who has gathered so much about me, both in my favor and in favor of art, plunging into my thoughts with the impetus of a dream that becomes reality. She knew how to apply with the brush of sincerity the color of her lyrical vibrations upon the canvas of a painting that is still hanging on my wall.

The Authenticity Effect

One of the essential conditions of a successful action is to give yourself totally at the moment of creation, not holding it back and not truncating it with anything.

Any talent has a lot to gain if it gives itself totally to its nature, not letting itself be embarrassed by any kind of external considerations. This is the case of the former hockey player Doug Dorsey from the movie " ", to whom destiny entrusted the task of asserting himself in another direction, similar, but still so different: figure skating. In fact, the transition from hockey to figure skating enlivened his dull and dusty existence in a way he could not even imagine, because any sign of a change in activity, a focus on new ideals, is for a former champion reached a pathetic stage , similar to Christ's resurrection from the grave.

One of the essential conditions of a successful action is to give yourself totally at the moment of creation, not holding it back and not truncating it with anything, so that the potential of the reaction between the result and the personal value is proportional to the effort invested. Such a state, such an impulse that heals wounds, even if it is not yet inspiration, is still very close to the point that determines success, being able to even bring the individual to a world of stories, where dreams come true. In this "there is no other way" context, figure skating is born and becomes a fertile substrate for a return to the fertile ground of glory.

And, of course, as in any action movie where glory is accompanied by misadventures, one gets an effect of authenticity only when one thinks about the effect, when passion merges with hopeless love. His new partner, the talented Kate Moseley, at the same time a former champion, is an example of stability in the reaction of the "otherwise" type, being motivated by the desire to shock the whole world, having in her, as it were, a champion gene that catalyzes success only through determination and perseverance.

Leadership: Do you try to find your value in the variations of contrast between soul and creative expression, so that you present your individuality through gradations of shades of your artistic vision?

All this seemed a very heavy task for many men, not for one. We can only imagine his efforts to start over, having as his partner precisely the most capricious skater in the world. Dorsey refused to be Kate's puppet, whose stage was everywhere, and whose strings stretched far up into a charming and exclusive paradise. And Kate was forced by circumstances to give up Ego.

Motivated by universal impulses, they had no alternative but to simultaneously approach each other, through a kind of soul connection, considering that time was flowing as quickly as possible, and the ironies between them only led to complications. In this case, the term "variation" represents the difference between an individual desired outcome and the average of a set of gratifying outcomes.

On her, something determined her to be different, a kind of magnetism of elegance that attracted the eyes and inspiration, but with wide ramifications in a kind of Ermatos Thaeae Umhiaoscul , a bridge between the heart and the divine mind. Moreover, something of her soul seemed to be revealed throughout the film, regarding her new partner. Through the attitude, on a subtle level, something of Kate seemed to convey to Dorsey, especially before the final test of the competition where they barely qualified:

"I am simply giving you my knowledge that you need to move forward because, after all, you are the fruit of my love, and you must not be lost. Your continued success honors us both. The Creator was proud of you , even if in a moment of weakness he tried to leave you. That's how the gods are sometimes, capricious. Now is the time to give your best."

Leadership: Can you explore the process of receiving an image that will follow you all your life, adding an imaginary reversibility and a view that includes the "measure of the superlative"?

"Don't stop being more than you can be" - this is without a doubt the moral of the film, which is worth revisiting every winter. Both protagonists, in relation to the true orientation that leads to success, having in their souls the presentiment of their ideal future, carried the seal of their Olympic origin on their foreheads.

To experience the sensations of a very successful figure skating number means to carry, to feel in your own soul, the entire richness, the entire depth of the protagonists, the entire length of their content, to suffer from their sufferings, to go through the torments of their bitterness, through the happiness of their joy, of their victory, of their hopes.

And even if I don't know much about skaters, few of them having the happiness to stand out in the great arena of champions, like divine stars, I can say that watching this film I had the opportunity to feel how the particular perfection was combined with the great merits of love, divine treasures that are only really highlighted in the last minutes of the film.

Yes. Flexibility in meeting a change of plans, a situation you did not think about, is the key to an unexpected, but triumphant and very rich, material and spiritual success at the same time. This fact in no way disturbs the elegance of the divine work, but reveals by itself the fact that the process of transposing a dream into reality, provided you are actually gifted with an original talent, denotes a remarkable achievement, sufficient to authenticate your presence in the creative universe, adding your own original and authentic stamp.

The measure of the superlative, in leadership, is given by the unexpected result that you reach with great difficulty, one that reflects your authenticity and artistic genius viewed as a divine gift.

The Effect of Authenticity resides in the achievement of a realization to which God has contributed, you yourself being the divine instrument that transposes into reality creations enlivened with the image of divinity. So, the effect of authenticity is gained through a remarkable achievement to which divine inspiration contributes, along the lines of some twists and turns of situations that make you say: "Yes, this actually happened in reality, even if it seemed like just a dream."

The Authenticity Of The Self-Thinking Man

On March 15, 2020

Be an example of thinking for your own thinking, not the thinking that the thinking example of others gives you.

I really liked the personality of the young writer Wilhelm Hauff, not because of his humble origins that gave him a tremendous creative boost, giving up a career in priesthood, but because of the image he built of himself. It is the image of an idealist. A pacifist. Of a philosopher. Of a thinker full of the consciousness of his exceptionality. The feeling of peace and fulfillment you have when your creation becomes the subject of the image of a new reality can also contribute to this image: "What you build about yourself changes what you are for a different perspective."

When I read Hauff, with much consideration, with much emotion, with much charge of soul, as through a kind of secret and distant call, I feel that I am able to find the symbolic correspondences of a Shakespearean interpretation in the dreams of a Kafkaesque world. In any image, dedicated to such a personality, making a connection to the activity of existential values (such as dignity, reputation and integrity), is reflected the highest distinction of the soul: "Be content with yourself ! "

Leadership: How do you perceive the idea of making your way through the world with "your pen", in an authentic way, shaping a work that will last in the spirit of beauty and goodness?

Fixing the balance of all the qualities necessary for deep writing, as a remedy for loneliness, the manifestation of the personality subjected to the process of internalization is found in the following fragment cut from a monologue of a narrator meditating on his condition in a troubled century. Immediately, the affective support of internalization depends on the direct result of the motivation to communicate one's point of view regarding the experience gained through the individual assimilation of the Great Knowledge. It is not necessarily about achieving success, but about the authenticity of one's own story, the authenticity of one's own feelings, the authenticity of one's own vision.

Here is what Wilhelm Hauff wrote about himself in a brief moment of lucidity:

"I am just a poor young man forced to make his way around the world with his pen. I belong to everyone, I belong to myself, but I do not belong to any school... I do not feel above me any master or teacher to whom I owe obedience, apart from the eternal laws of good and beauty, to which I tend, even so, in an imperfect manner. I may not be able to keep my form away from the influence of time, but my spirit will remain untouched."

Leadership: Do you treat your power of thought as an act of advancing in a "higher meaning" attributed to the manifestation of your personality in a sublime process of internalization?

There are two kinds of artists: the authentic and the helped to become authentic. The former learns everything on their own, from nature, the latter learns everything with the help of someone else.

Herein lies the difference. Those who learn everything on their own develop their own thought patterns. He who learns everything from someone else, takes over the thought patterns of that individual, even if his work is considered unique in form, finish, design and quality.

Overcoming the narrow framework of personal experience, artists become more than creators, enriching their perspective of seeing the heart of things, their hidden beauty, their purpose, their different side in an image of "Myself". That is, the fact of living life in another plane, of symbolic emotionality.

This "Myself" is the enriching framework of the writer from the experience of a point of view located at height. In fact, the freedom to be an artist can be interpreted only through the screen of an Ego fed by a permanent admiration for good and beauty, from everything that surrounds his being. It is a revitalization of the feeling of thankfulness, of value, of gratitude brought to the freedom of expression that offers new perspectives of interpretation of the reality experienced through writing, through a long reflection on the writing to which you dedicate your life.

Authenticity means owing nothing to anyone but yourself.

The teacher teaches his student to draw flowers. The student learns to draw some wonderful flowers, more beautiful than those in the master's drawings. But he could never have reached art without a master holding on to it. All his work will be reduced to a point of view of the "Other" who stood behind his becoming. Always, the success of his creations will be due to the lessons offered by his master.

For this reason, I have to believe that the artist who makes himself the masterpiece of his own thought lessons is more valuable. He owes nothing to anyone but the joy of the results of working with himself. Authenticity means not owing anyone anything. So, it is not just about making some wonderful drawings, more beautiful than those of others.

Be an example of thinking for your own thinking, not the thinking that the thinking example of others gives you.

An internalization process must reflect a part of the creator's personality in terms of thinking laid out on paper with the consistency of a simple, honest, free life experience, able to give the ego the impression of unity, integrity and autonomy.

The Authenticity Of The Self-thinking Man is the proof of the great esteem offered by a poor young man forced to make his way through the world with his pen, which is more than an ordinary writer, it is the confession of a spirit that possesses burning lucidity of his characters. It is the expression of a spirit that will always remain untouched.

The Background Of A Long Repeated Artistic Experience

On November 06, 2019

It is an artistic quality to be able to recognize a red color addition in an image with a glossy background in the hues of a pronounced attachment to the divine Self.

I have always imagined that I am more than an invention of the universe, a proof of the continuity of living in a space delimited by aesthetics and composition, discreet and obedient, like a rose personified as an artist whose presence in the world enchants by the suggestion to give in to the desires and instincts of belonging to the unusual relationship between a star and a titan of the Renaissance.

It is no coincidence when the art meets the spirit of observation of a lover of nature, in a unique and exclusivist concept, of the type "similarity through simplicity". The rose is like a candle to me, like a sun illuminating the heavy path of creation, when I try to restore my connection with providence.

Each of us, as we have been conceived by the supreme artist of the unlimited universe, as two drops of patience in the immense ocean of humanity, have at our disposal the endless enigma of the great science to rediscover our roots and to embark on a start-up of the idea of shaking the heart in the face of the wonders of nature. Fire colors, hues, contour points, are used to obtain a 2-in-1 image, through a mastery of realism that ensures that the aspirations of convergence to One, natural perfection, a single Whole, whose elements are from This.

Because everything that resembles us, in adding a dash of light that enriches the brilliance and beauty of both of us, is more than an image game in which we try to demonstrate the belonging of a work to symbolism. It is a gift of the spirit of order in the landscape of thought thirsty for the emotional depths that the mystical union between Christ and soul crosses.

Leadership: Can you create an expressive image of nature, characteristic of the perception of a living being, related to the impression of a correspondence between the Divine Logos and the Artistic Logos?

Investigating the results obtained by diversifying the modeling techniques of a creator with mystical powers is done with the specific means of artistic language (contrast, proportion, symmetry), ideas, moods and affective dispositions of the characters represented as ambiguous figures, but in reality, being eyes of the heavens, stewards for the mysteries of eternity.

There is a big difference between piously contemplating a delightful work of art or a magnificent landscape, and contemplating the blessing cross of a God-Man, experienced as an obligation, not as a choice, between yellow-reddish inflorescences that open gradually, only in the presence of the sun.

The rose hides not only the artist's enthusiasm for a sacred image, admirable through the boldness of the approached symbolism and the mastery with which the glorification of eternal life is worked. It also hides the ability to capture and produce aesthetic emotions through pure thinking that teaches you to convey first-class values in science (such as original intellectual creation) through simple, direct and expressive writing.

The logo of an artist is the symbol of a banal man who feels the impulse for a new spiritualization, the initiation to the highest degrees that the revelation of "the Double of One" implies.

- You got me into this story, now you have to support me, I confessed one day to my rose, trying to immortalize it on a linen cloth. In a way, this was the attempt to reconstruct an enigmatic life, such as that of Miranda Gray in John Fowles' novel, which had the same sense of seriousness at the serious thought that by an attitude of acceptance launched by visual artists, in a single moment of escape could have ruined everything he had built before:

"If you are a true artist, you give yourself to art with the entirety of your being. If you keep a small part of yourself, then you are not an artist. You are not what G.P. called a craftsman. You're not invading the world. You don't have to have little ready-made drawings or preconceived ideas to turn on people in order to impress them. Sense and patience due art have to be present, first of all, as you are."

Leadership: Can you attribute to your creation that sensation of "delicate like a touch", by conquering the perfection caused by a certain accumulation of feeling effects?

What for a writer is the feeling of the call to an eternal beginning, the great secret that nature whispers, for a rose is the mirage of a rescue from the wreck of oblivion, the expression of a twilight nostalgia, so rarely pronounced.

Looking me in the eye for a second and then suddenly looking away, as if afraid to acknowledge a great guilt, the rose responded to me with that intensity, warmth and affection, with which the painter used to color the deepest feelings, the emotion and the dream, using without passion only shades of red and yellow:

- I confess my guilt for being a tool in the hands of the Lord, a plea for true friendship, through the authenticity and the high craftsmanship with which they manage to convey spiritual feeling and artistic image, with great power of evocation. All hope I put in a kind of forgiveness that starts from the sincere desire, full of regrets for something difficult to achieve, through the eyes of a lot of states that test my friendship: jealousy, rivalry, possessiveness, unspoken envy, guilt not to rise, somehow, to the level of His expectations.

I wanted to become a great leader, someone whom the world would reward through a higher admiration, and God prepared me to be a great artist, His equal.

Leadership: Can you control, through your creation, the suggestion of a permanent need for renewal in the aesthetic plane, without eroding the image with artistic load released by a Creator of order?

And forget how it is interposed between the two of us, between a rose and a receptacle for emotions, the message of a titan of expression through metaphors, by the name of Victor Hugo, which seems to willfully watch us from a 19th century drawing, from a self-portrait of personal knowledge, sketched in real time, in a symbolic framework, by drawing subtle and stylish contrasts:

"An ordinary man will be able to do regular work at any time, but only the high spirits know how to order a composition. Regularity is a material and purely human combination. Order is, so to speak, divine. The Creator, who sees from above, orders. The imitator, who views things from up close, adjusts. The former proceeds according to the law of their nature, the latter following the rules of their school. For one, art is inspiration, for the other it is only science.

In two words, regularity is the taste of mediocrity, order is the taste of genius."

It is an artistic quality to be able to recognize a red addition in an image with a glossy background in the hues of a pronounced attachment to the divine Self.

Leadership is the high craftsmanship with which you manage to convey a spiritual feeling, with great power of evoking a unique visual identity, through the voice so powerful of the consciousness that draws your attention: "Do not try to create something extraordinary just to impress the world ! "

The Background Of A Long Repeated Artistic Experience is captured by the awareness of a closeness to things holy, through a resemblance to the soul of nature, with the splendor of the image of another reality, transfigured, an image of the Kingdom of Heaven, transformed into a flower decorated with a red cross charm.

The Backtracking Function

On June 15, 2016

Be open to the unity between creative work and vision, referring to the self-image parameters given by the tendencies to assimilate the accommodation experience to a whole new situation.

A true revelation occurs when at least one figment of imagination becomes a reality, when to unleashes so powerfully, full of all the advantages the rational "operator" can give it, in the geometry of macro-rules such as selection, abstraction, and other operations that reduce the complexity of a singular work, wishing for it to be fabulous, to a single idea that will dominate the rest of the world. An idea that has its starting point in the imperative: "Enter an area and stay there ! "

To my joy now, I have avoided that area, feeling the supreme contempt for a true image of perfection, the contempt of the man who always insists upon what he needs to accomplish beyond his limits, through his experience of detaching from himself and of rising above himself in order to be unified under the power of a colossal idea. I do not know why, but I have always been attracted to unexplained phenomena, mysteries that are desperately sought to be resolved, new things that few could understand, trying to adopt their rules as a kind of mind game, spoiling me with the benefits of a unique, rigorous system, full of rules and procedures, that perfectly counterbalanced the revelations of my fears.

Such a man, singular in the equation of superiority, becomes a complex number related to the elements of a battlefield where healthy tendencies are at war with unhealthy ones. I wonder, what happens if its idea and image drawn in time manifests itself in a perfectly articulated system that encompasses the nature of a particular situation from which it may happen that there is no exit?

I would probably have put myself in the same situation as Luigi Galvani, who at one point noticed a curious phenomenon she could not explain in the beginning, but whose study eventually led to the discovery of live cell electricity. Here's what this phenomenon is like, as Emil Bittman writes: Galvani had suspended with a few copper hooks a few iron-foil frog paws on the balcony of his house in Bologna. At every stronger breeze of wind blowing over the city, the tip of the frog touched the balustrade of the balcony, and with every contact with the iron, the paw muscles tensed.

A man who is possessed of an idea always gives preference to the relationship with the nature from which only he can profit, including a rapprochement of best practices only from a curiosity of knowledge.

Leadership: Do you throw yourself in an attempt to explain things differently from the perspective of what's happening to you, but the more you think you understand, the more you seem to be farther away what you think you know?

I managed to overcome my inner cry of passions passing through the throes of a huge attempt of expressing an elusive real, which formed a determinant with a custom-quantitative value, able to produce accuracy in my valuable gift of forging works of thought in honest form. A determinant justified by the order of imaginative ability, from which a new perspective of interpreting universal truths shone.

This explains why I had so much consideration for the way in which I would assume the teachings and guidance of science, functioning above the limits of the accepted normal, like the old alchemists, between the differences of thinking and points of extremes, because I very well knew that no one will be able to unravel me.

Finally, I have managed to control my thirst for superior knowledge, developed with the most important means of reason, away from the world, along with meeting the most disturbing difficulties of learning and developing the hidden. I was permeated by the feeling of a definite regaining of my vital values, such as balance and discretion, the two expressions of my inner power that were worthy of primacy, forming a sort of stem of personality.

Leadership: Do you opt to place yourself between the differences of being yourself negative and yourself positive, so as to form a new concept of "all in one"?

Do you like games? Nova is a Terran Ghost that was supposed to appear in the canceled Shooter called StarCraft: Ghost. Instead, Nova Covert Ops, the first mission pack for StarCraft 2, does not incorporate elements from Ghost. Christ Sigaty, executive producer for StarCraft 2, said that this expansion "will focus on a story that is much more... intimate and gloomy. We have focused so much on the galactic conflict and on the galactic story. We would like to explore something much closer to us." *

One of the obstacles that prevent you from capitalizing on the fruits of leadership is aimed at the attempt of exploring something close to you, focusing on the expansion of a reality, of an existence whose main reference point does not incorporate elements that make up the highest essence of your being.

Leadership, open to the unity between the work of creation and vision, where the perspective of positive transformation is based on the link between balance and discretion, must be reflected not from the position of a prisoner of its own world, but from the perspective of a man that rediscovers himself through the fire of doubts, searches, and observations that lead to the healing of any passions.

The way you relate to the hypostases in which you experience the privileged space of creation mirrors the way in which you assume the confessing duty of portraying a desolate reality that causes another.

How do you perceive yourself between the creator's hypostasis that exists through Himself, which has all the perfections, which is absolute, and that of the discoverer who only acknowledges his mistakes when they turn into a blessing? Are you a unique reference value for what should be able to compensate for any error and any deviation from the path through which you are trying to achieve a goal?

The way in which you assimilate the teachings and guidance of science, relative to searching for a form of understanding of an experience from the angle of distancing one's self from the tendency of dominating the world, through the idea of entering an area and staying there, depends heavily on the availability of living between differences of thought and points of extremes, knowing that no one will ever unravel you.

If you opt to place yourself between the differences of being yourself negatively or yourself positively, so as to form a new concept of "all in one" that aims to develop the quality of your access to a new version of personality, you will be able to promote a character, an image and a reasoning that stems from the recognition of an alteration resulted from the deep precariousness of highly advanced knowledge.

This makes you into a leader who knows how to manage his moods and knows how to lead under the pressure of his own weaknesses, under the pressure of his own (esoteric) obsessions, under the pressure of his own errors of decision, relative to the elements of a battlefield where healthy tendencies are at war with unhealthy ones.

To enter a non-resistance area and to stay there is to abandon the old beliefs that have turned out to be bankrupt in time, for a different belief that burns only in your heart as a confirmation of the curiosity of the one who has the certainty that there are many things to say about a proposed issue.

The Backtracking Function targets the search of that reasoning that starts from the recognition of an alteration resulting from the deep precariousness of highly advances knowledge, making possible the "delivery" of personal characteristics: the power of overcoming habits or the power of defeating your biggest temptations. Such as the temptation of leaping, through the continuous increasing of knowledge, towards the immeasurable.

The Beautiful Unknown Woman Hides Her Secrets Under Seven Waves

On June 06, 2014

Involve yourself directly in releasing any pattern of science perception, gathering together all those unalterable virtues you need to remove the defects harming your value.

Eisenstein begins to "blunt" the art methods. He had a study consistency. But now, he feels that the study of mathematics and Japanese hieroglyphs was useless. A little while later, he would understand its advantages. But he does no realize that his current method of study is the result of years of scientific education. He diligently studies the art theory. He begins work systematically, like an engineer, but he soon remains baffled. With every approach of the art essence, he sees that "the beautiful unknown woman hides her secrets under seven waives. An ocean of muslin."

The frontal attack fails. "It is common knowledge that a sword cannot cut a feather pillow... It can only be cut with the edge of a bent blade, from an oriental scimitar... The scimitar's curve symbolizes the long detour route that you need to follow in order to dissect the secrets hidden under the muslin ocean... There is no problem ! We are young. We have time, the future is ours ! First, it follows the path of study through creation. He notes amused that, in this case, the 'grinding' period may be immediately useful." *

Leadership: How reduced or how enhanced your personality would be if you were the equal of a superior science?

Being the equal to a superior science, when we claim that it helps us define the significant spatial cutout to symbolically represent a definite image, concept or product, is to choose from the multitude of patterns, styles, trends, that which you real need in order to obtain the essence of a dynamic of the living, the essence of an artistic chemistry that manages to transcend time and other worldly obstacles.

An art critic could show the injustice committed and how much reduced the personality of an artist would be, who wants to be the equal of a superior science, though not giving full importance to that important chapter of his research and intellectual development activity.

But for a good practitioner of leadership science, directly involved in the release of any innovation and inspiration patterns made over time, overruling, out of a principled despise, this major production of arrangements out of which immeasurable benefits can be drawn, is equivalent to a fall in an inferior state of mind.

Leadership, in its possible ascent in relation to art and scientific research, gathers together all hidden secrets, all exploitation forms of creative resources in perfect harmony with those unalterable virtues that man needs to eliminate defects harming his value. Of course, without besoiling or destroying the truss frame of the entire compound from the study of production and representation processes of new forms of "swords".

Art is a way of recognizing yourself and especially of assuming yourself as a particular creator who, by using a material called "symbol" and integrating a multiplicity of interpretations, manages to actually introduce a new qualitative goal.

In leadership, the sword is the powerful tool to determine the character of what is conventional and also appropriate to ensure coherence between "general" and "particular", between "systematic" and "unsystematic", splitting in two the "all-inclusive". And here, it is worth mentioning a quote belonging to Victor Hugo: "A gun is nothing in itself, it exists only through the hand that wields it."

Unlike the scimitar's curve, which symbolizes in art the long workaround that one must follow to dissect the hidden secrets under the "muslin ocean", the sword symbolizes in leadership, at the same time, the way out of the social convention patterns that connects you with others aspiring to a higher professional status, but who do not have the same inclinations, the same desire for affirmation, the same tendency towards deepening knowledge and promoting it into society.

And having little price of the desire for affirmation means overlooking one of the ways through which your genius is revealed, in his immense complexity, but especially in his immense capacity to customize the background of science.

The essence of art is to build an idea starting from what is behind the attempt to give it a new interpretation in concordance with the truth.

The beautiful unknown woman hides her secrets under seven waves designates that science acquired only through experience coupled with sound knowledge and practices continuously used, but especially with the desire to surpass and affirm oneself and to get out of anonymity.

The Beetle

On November 21, 2023

You can integrate into an environment conducive to your aspirations, only if the image with which you present your true value is appropriate to that environment.

I will now tell you the story of a survivor who ended up as if by reverse psychology in an unknown but easy to explore environment - "the university". It is about a treasure discoverer who wades into a mire full of impurity, mud and an unbearable stench, through which he advances very easily only by canceling any virtues, any spiritual norms, any ethical standards.

The weather and the terrain were advantages for this ordinary individual, important resources that he knew how to use well, certainly having other accomplices, of the same subspecies. So, this is how you could get into a mire where there are interests, underneath, compromises, an environment in which a beetle cannot get stuck at all, precisely because its limbs are equipped with perils that help it move on swampy surfaces, wet, and at the same time slippery.

This obscure individual was received as a guest of honor in the fertile framework of a vast vegetable kingdom, without crawling at all on compacted earth, without encountering any pesticide to kill him. It would be said that the earth vibrated in the climate conducive to its development. He himself, a kind of sovereign of the microbial biodiversity, integrated himself wonderfully into an environment that provided him with sufficient food, water and shelter, without having any special merit for this blessed heavenly manna. In a well-kept garden there is room for seemingly harmless insects, right?

Who notices the existence of a small universe, hidden under the leaf of an autumn seedling? This precocious life form, native to the earth sign, symbolizing adaptability, stepped into academia with the same caution as a newcomer explores an unknown garden. Like a "surprise visitor," he brought with him his own breeding aspirations, wanting to thrive in this new habitat until he reached the stage of "King of Cultivated Insects."

Leadership: Do you adopt an "outside-in" perspective that emphasizes personal responsibility and ethical freedom, being open to all that represents "image transformed by reflection into model"?

At one of the seminars, the new teacher, dressed in a four-pin suit, unfolds his life story, speaking briefly about his humble beginnings. As if leaving mysterious seeds in the soil of a fertile garden, he began to share his knowledge and experiences that, at first, seemed to be unique and interesting. Like a cockroach's egg capsules, the information it shared could not be easily assimilated or replaced by others.

But he took his mouth in advance, as if his humble past had pushed him from behind to free himself from the burden of an exhausting weight. The little polyphagous pest that should by no means be ignored, related a fact of essential importance, a secreto muy personal , a certain event from his life that had to be kept in a safe with the most complex code. When it comes to information security, insects cannot be neglected.

He confessed in good faith that he faced difficulties in adapting to the academic garden, just like any new visitor to an unfamiliar place, full of vegetation. First he became a teacher, then he had to choose the discipline he was going to teach. Arriving on this agricultural land, ready to work, he flirted with several disciplines, but none of them were to his liking, so he took a specialized course where he obtained a diploma that allowed him to specialize in another field which was not listed on the "available" list of fertile land.

Leadership: Are you called to initiate a new profession by exploring otherness through overlapping images, only to later specialize in the nuances of a unique visual expression?

Here, the question is asked full of the shine of the clean face: first you become a teacher, and then you specialize in a field to practice? How come this? I mean, they put a bunch of different subjects in front of you, and you choose to teach any of them, without knowing any of them?

Well, this well-received and welcome visitor to the land of diversified agriculture, Leptinotarsa Decemlineata , an insect species that is frequently found in "culture" environments in Romania, has discreetly stepped into the university garden, a fact that illustrates an initial adaptation process. But it also highlights the difficulties he encountered in fulfilling his role effectively. However, you want to live instinctively in a favorable atmosphere in vain, if you do not value your ability to hide the "dirt" with which you are covered, the mud in which you wallow every day.

So, in the academic context, it is essential not only to manage the place where the beetle "hides" its mess, but also the way in which it is managed, because where it leaves its eggs, in a kind of silk cradle, stuck to the underside of a loose leaf, there the larvae will develop, which must also go through a process of development and growth to reach the adult stage. Of course, this intruder must disguise himself as a ladybug, something colorful and pleasing to the eye, with positive symbolic connotations, so as to gain positive recognition. It then typically opens its elytra, spreads its hind wings, and flies to freedom.

Leadership: Are you taking advantage of your connections to fill a role for which you are not ready, thus risking to turn this opportunity into a visual illusion with potential repercussions in the compositional balance of your image?

More jokingly, more seriously, let's see what charges can be brought against the individual who first became a teacher, and only later took courses that would allow him to practice in a field he knew nothing about.

Usurpation of office: The individual occupied a position for which he was not qualified, taking advantage of his relations and other accomplices. This may be considered a form of fraud, which may have legal consequences.

Imposture: The individual obtained a teaching position without meeting the necessary conditions, namely the knowledge and skills necessary to teach an academic discipline. Most likely, the individual lied on their resume, where they stated that they have knowledge in a certain field.

Fraud: The individual has misled students and the institution of higher education by posing as a qualified teacher.

Favoritism: If an individual received special favors in the hiring process, or was favored over other candidates, they may be accused of favoritism.

Professional incompetence: Considering that he did not have solid knowledge in the respective field, it is understood that he was not prepared to perform his duties as a teacher, a fact that would have led to the teaching of erroneous or outdated information, or to the creation of an atmosphere of disinterest in among the students. And the fact that he divulged the secret of his arrival can be considered as evidence of neglect or negligence. Big mistake !

Negligence in the selection process: If the educational institution did not carry out a proper assessment of the individual's qualifications before hiring or promoting him, it can be accused of negligence in the selection process. It is known that Romanian universities are number 1 in the world in terms of "muddy" individuals who become professors overnight.

Conflict of interest: If someone from the management of the institution has a personal or business relationship with the individual in question, and has influenced the hiring process in his favor, then it may be a conflict of interest.

Abuse of position: If the individual obtained contracts with various companies through his position as a teacher, this may be evidence that he used his position for personal gain.

Depending on the available evidence, the individual may be charged with one or more of these crimes. If found guilty, he may face prison terms or other criminal penalties. And even if he is not found guilty, after so many years, surely God knows everything. And that's enough...

Leadership manifests itself as a kind of recognition of the image that your creation reflects, from which you must eliminate imitation and miming of some continuities in the process of asserting originality.

The beetle remains a beetle regardless of the environment in which it manifests itself, regardless of the visual setting in which it is found, just as a corrupt man does not change his nature wherever he is.

This kind of "living woman" has no inclination towards creation, discovery, invention, but only towards tricks, tricks, betrayals, intrigues, flattering words, unscrupulous manipulations, secret plans. Absolutely nothing spiritual, nothing close to the divine resides in his soul, in his mind, in his consciousness. It all boils down to profitable aspirations.

The Beggar Who Gives Alms

On April 09, 2014

Find the motivation that can get you to be what you really are, for the evolution of your spiritual background to not be stopped or temporarily halted.

They live with great prudence, making a little fire every day, as very distressed people. Jean Valjean didn't replace any of the furniture he found there at first: he only had a full door made in place of the windowed door for Cosette's little room. No one could guess that, in fact, he was the same wealthy Monsieur Madeleine, who concealed his identity. And returned to that lower part of man that he actually was. The modesty untapped by the passing of years was asking to be recovered.

He continued wearing his yellow waistcoat, black trousers and worn hat. People on the street thought he was poor. It happened at times that a merciful woman would turn around and give him alms. Jean Valjean received and bowed to the ground. Other times he happened upon some wretch who was begging. Then, he looked around so no one could see him, approached the beggar stealthily and sneaked a coin in his hand, often even a silver coin, and then rushed away from him. This thing could bring him inconvenience. In the neighborhood people started to know him as the "beggar who gives alms". *

Leadership: Are you a distinct case of negotiation between an insurer and an insured, from the perspective of experiencing a hurtful humility in front of a dramatic situation that helps you to evolve spiritually and to save your soul?

Every leader, driven by the urge of changing his lifestyle, to finding an equilibrio between functionality and context, between inner power and the responsibilities of his function, is a distinct case of negotiation between an insurer and an insured, due to be treated as such as a theme whose solution lies within human consciousness, not outside of it.

On the one hand, you ensure the necessary independence for yourself, on the other hand you acquire a new outlook on life. The insurer is synonymous with the reckless feeling of an implacable destiny, while the insured can be correlated with the permanent struggle against the reality of a fallen world, dominated by suffering and materialism, or by the struggle of memory against forgetting.

To evolve spiritually towards a higher consciousness, to a greater degree of wisdom, is to show your generosity in the situation of a remorse that can give new meaning to your inner world.

And not just that, you still need to show your generosity in front of a retrospective look at what has been given to you, to hear, even in the absence of arguments that do not identify the legal branch, no uncontradictable logic. Faith is the meditation on a past that pursues you as a curse, from which you must draw conclusions in the sense of those sustained by a fresh, renewed consciousness, from which you must learn what mercy means, what it means to be gentle, sincere, loving, honest, a peacemaker.

To reach yourself, at times fighting even against the wish for power and glory, discovering in the mathematics of the abstract world you're experiencing, guided by its own equations, rather a problem of affection than of logic, under the influence of the means of ensuring a balance between internal and external. This is more than a caress, bringer of pure thoughts, it is rather an absolutely conquering way to play your feelings to others.

From the science of harnessing the virtues that surround you as an aura of self-confidence, to the art of accepting yourself among others as a guest among hosts, the uninterrupted recognition of beauty plays an important role in the manner of better developing and defining yourself, of discovering new things about others, about the world. Leadership becomes a masterpiece whose composition, inspired perhaps by a summary of the past, shows man in the fullness of his background qualities. Of the greatness that is given to others to admire of him moment by moment and even support it.

Leadership: Is the situation in which your superiority is born a rapid improvement in the experience of accessing the variable "check your perceptions about what life is meant to be in a miraculous way" that you place at the disposal of the soul of the world?

It is not enough to live according to the harsh laws of leadership, you must also sprinkle a little peace on the inside and outside of your being. Life symbolized in a miraculous way can be perceived as a triumph against all the shortcomings, sins and passions of the world, a triumph that encompasses you when you follow the trail of the past that haunts you and you want to forget it so that you resonate and identify yourself with the one who can suffer, not just the one who overcomes.

As the brain is programmed to absorb any model or structure of reality that it observes and investigates, so too is man, subject to the norms regarding the quality of leadership, programmed to hook up for a long period of time to the network of spiritual energy that develops in perfect harmony with life and the surrounding environment.

Essential elements of leadership are the sparkles of wisdom from the experience of a life where suffering has often overwhelmed the moments of happiness.

The great writer, Victor Hugo, urged: "Let us take down the old plaster that hides the façade of the house. There are no other rules nor models."

To fulfill the conditions of the art of leadership, casting over the nakedness of your beings the veil of feelings that have nothing to do with science, but with your manifestations in the context of the society that casts you at a level of resonance compatible with the human dimension of existential commitments, you must get closes and close to what you really are. TO the man that finds wisdom and gains deep understanding of the fact that something other than the material part completes him and brings him balance. The book of life can be opened without keys, with a simple scanning of the being.

Leadership is the gratitude of experiencing an experience of suffering on the verge of a situation where you feel too inclined to the superiority of your position, or when you feel bound or too dependent on the perfect form of a life that truly deserves to be lived.

The Beggar Who Gives Alms refers to the specifically human aspects of leadership, dominated by specific laws. Leadership must be "clothed" with humanism, as in all other fields, relying mainly on the unwritten law: to give, not only to ask.

The Beginning Of Any Change Is The First Cause

On December 22, 2021

Try to validate a decision taken from a unique perspective of the phenomenon of "circumstantial resonance", in an attempt to recognize in you the source of a new form of consciousness.

I saw a cat crossing the crosswalk, and I could only study it with stone eyes, let alone watch over it with the unceasing call of divine mercy. It seemed a decision taken from an unprecedented perspective of the phenomenon of madness: the proud selfish little girl assumed the prolongation of the state in which the judgments arising from the senses do not even correspond at all. The cars stopped, others bypassed it, none of which mattered much at that moment of balance. The animal walked slowly, elegantly, without knowing what the risk or danger was, somehow imagining itself as an unforgettable moment in a space of infinity, as the hero of an unparalleled adventure.

Surely it is mad courage, devoid of rebukes of conscience, unconsciousness in the face of relentless death. The cat might as well have waited at the traffic light, but it wanted to be the first to cross a horizon of events that can only be seen in Hollywood movies, as if experiencing that tendency of the human ego to be wild, to be a creator of new worlds, a TIME-TRAVELER. Immediately, it must be taken into account that the cat is just a lone predator that surprises by attacking the mouse and the sparrow, without thinking for a moment that it could be in danger by crossing two lanes.

Obviously, the cat did not wait for the color green, did not want to reconsider its decision, but seemed to play the king in an absolute safe position on a chessboard that responds exactly to the instructions given by an irrational exuberance. Because, as someone said: "Waiting means adding moments to moments, squeezing them so that space-time is compressed, to remain in the deep self the illusion of its dilation in the short respite together with an illusion that sometimes seems so real."

Leadership: Can the result of your decision be interpreted as a relentless unfolding of the outside world, analyzed by a confused interiority?

At the sight of this suspenseful scene, I felt like a prisoner trapped in a time trap determined by a destiny of transcendence (lived involuntarily), trapped in a moving circle with a blinding ray taken to the causal point of a decision taken under pressure, conjunctural and without perspective. What is certain is that I could not undo the effect of an analgesic arising from the difference between desire and reality. There intervened the correspondence between a black dream, lived with open eyes, and living a life without limits expressed by an extreme mobilization, by an effort of the moment to overcome time and space of the dimension called "a super-factor of personality".

For this solitary presence in the middle of the street, life meant "me first", not others. In no case did its soul ache for what it was trying to do. But if the animal is generally denied rationality, negar el papel que tiene en el proceso de conocer la realidad, and especially because it does not take into account the feeling of being a victim, then man can be forgiven for his sin of forgetting one's purpose of being rational in case he manifests his will to cross the road with a single direction of circulation: the sense of finality close to that of the final cause.

In any case, we are all cats at some point when we cross the street. But we must realize the value of that certain "something out of the ordinary" to explain the true meaning of the life we live: finding a reason not to fall victim to our own recklessness and exaggeration. This, of course, in the implicit intention not to become a target of more intense moments, not to consider ourselves as an annex for the conscious cultivation of the ephemeral in a world of doubt and insecurity.

Leadership: Can you take responsibility for an identity that brings together the experience of a life from another life, in an attempt to rediscover the "negative" of the being who incarnates in a game of duplication?

Certainly, my negative was embodied in a game of duplication, when I felt that I was part of the life of another being endowed with a different genetic configuration. The negative indicates the confrontation with that side of the interiority not expressed in words or orally. I fell silent instantly. And then the restraint of subjective aspirations, their removal from the path of relative normalcy, was the beginning of my fall into a state of paranoia in which I forgot to analyze my own mistakes, my own motivations, my own feelings, and to observe those of others.

It was a state of stillness, loss of hope, a demobilizing pressure as in the face of inevitable death, the syndrome being followed by a feeling of guilt. Those who want to know exactly what was going on in my soul can study the story "Buried Alive" by Edgar Allan Poe, especially when the inner grinding of the main character takes place as a relentless unfolding of the outside world:

"I tried to shout. But in my endeavor my lips and dry tongue moved convulsively, and no voice came out of my cavernous chest, which, pressed as if by the weight of a fallen mountain above it, panted and throbbed alongside my heart, at every hard and heavy breath. In this effort to make a cry, wanting to open my mouth, I noticed that my jaws are tied, as is customary for the dead..."

To better understand what "circumstantial resonance" is, you must consider that "transcendence" of interiority by its coincidence with exteriority, because what you experience through the temporary feeling of doubling can be passed through the filter of a life experience lived on the border between what is meant to happen and what is possible, but not necessarily.

The broader dimension of my identity, as a psychology of duplication, is equivalent to living a life behind another life that sometimes loses its compass to find it in the form of an affective predisposition capable of amplifying or diminishing the cooperation between chance and free will.

That's how I came to consider myself a loser, the main subject of a bad thought, because I resigned myself to a difficult situation believing that I have to get used to living with it. So, only by the simple unfolding of an event that aroused my full interest, only by recognizing a prophetic dimension of conjunctural synchronism, I was on the verge of changing the course of my life – by a resignation to the destiny that only does what it wants anyway, by giving up will, by accepting to be what the outside dictates me to be.

Or, to recognize in myself the source of a new form of consciousness means to analyze each life experience as a shield against the shameless incursion of the outside on the intimacy of the inside. This awareness is partly explained by the perception of a discrepancy between what I think I can do in someone else's place and what I can do to overcome a self-centered mindset.

The Beginning Of Any Change Is The First Cause when the "first cause" highlights the situation in which the Higher Self (or subjective mindset) has separated from me and reincarnated in another animating vehicle, in another being, in another reality. If you noticed well, before I changed, there was a change in the current line of events, a change that I perceived as an extremely important responsibility towards a hurried and emancipated being, similar to me, but much more able to teach me life lessons.

The Being Whose Essence Is The Infinite

On April 18, 2014

The leader is like an actor on stage who must be both a character and a narrator.

What terrible mistake did I make when I employed myself into practicing the most solemn ways of thinking, fueled by the game of approaching and distancing yourself from the fascinating world of science, symbolically woven through letters and lines, around the measured value of the concentration of the artificial and the natural, the personal and the impersonal? Had I let myself be influenced by the mystical force of the subconscious, to which the conscious mind gave shape to, transmitting suggestions to it based on your lived experiences?

In what extraordinary mistake was I cast into when I hoped to offer my knowledge gained with ample work as food to the mostly experimental science, instead of the intensity of living, of the peculiar emotion that akin to the river which flows into a sea without tides, knows only a part of what constitutes the core of an existential approach?

If the characteristics of a vector quantity are the valued measure and orientation, by orientation meaning direction and meaning of size, then I was, symbolically speaking, only a position vector, i.e. an oriented line segment, with origins in the origin of a system of Cartesian coordinates that cannot be solved. Can anyone limit a being that carries within its essence the infinite, but that sees itself torn and scattered from the reality of its own existence?

I would've wanted to be a benchmark against which the undeniable quality of life can be measured and set, or rather the owner of the absolute truth for the benefit of manifestation and transformation of consciousness, able to live in a complete different world, tailored after my own heart, opposing any interference that may deviate from my course of action determined by the requirements of beauty and humanity.

Maybe I should've been given the authority of creator of meanings, but I think I wouldn't have known what to do with it. I would rather have wanted to be a benchmark of existence based on using inner resources, a body animated by warm rays of light, not a dividing line between dream and reality. From where the power to enlighten my way had to have come?

Leadership: Can you call yourself the sovereign of in-depth continuity of your inner life, depriving yourself of the copyrights of exploiting that "conventional" of story that meets the need to overcome the opposing appearances?

Leadership is like a story from which each draws their own conclusions, but also the direction to follow, which we often do not even believe in because it contains a lot of morality, a lot of new information, suspense, mystery, but also a dose of selfishness. Sometimes this story is dramatized more and more, thus gaining weight and complexity.

Enumerating the two landmarks in the ever-larger string of observations concerning the relationship between life and reality, such as freedom of thought and freedom of expression of beliefs, we can say that man is a sovereign of continuity through one of the two major functions of himself, "fast forward" or "rewind". The former has a clearly defined share in assessing an uncertain evolution and the latter tends towards an obsolete state, altering core values.

We confirm this from the fact that the writer may can not be alienated by the world he finds himself in, showing himself indifferent towards all that is beautiful and human. He is able to measure perceptions that create emotions, at the same time with the experiences that induce a trance state, from which the images of the great script will then be released. Or, just as well, the writer can be a self-model of attachment towards the evolution of a profession that exercises its prerogatives on the border between unlimited knowledge and the maximizing of potential for the dissemination of ideas through the production of scientific fuel.

He can be a man whose soul closely resembles a puzzle easily represented on the map of life, the pieces being found in the way he is involved in renewing it.

Leadership: Are you linked to trying to replace the "infinite that keeps your life in a vacuum" trying to justify the story you title "In dialogue with MY SHADOW"?

Two instances attract in the writer's field: the intelligent word which, if placed properly, can tangle or untangle the thread of the story; and the need for a possible change in content and style that can give the writer a sense of strangeness or a feeling of unreality (acting as a sweet poison) that inevitably continues to exert secret influence on his life.

The leader is like an actor on stage who must be both a character and a narrator, a reference point for life and a reference point for science, developing within the game of reciprocity a certain autonomy in collecting private funds of the "index" type, which stores values that seem most important. Some guide his behavior and way of thinking, others determine the quality of his moods, his faith, his actions and relationships that he has with the reality of his own existence.

If you want to live in a completely different world, tailored to your heart's content, which opposes any interference that could deviate you from the course of action established by the demands of the beautiful and the humane, then set your leadership inwardly when you play a huge role on the stage of life. Writing is the first step towards that reflection on the meaning of life, coming from the presence of an artist of language imaginings that wants to interrogate the way the world is made, how everything works so closely with his state of mind.

But can you, maybe, do this – one hundred percent – without losing, for even a second, the connection with the desire for ascension that pants within you the aspiration towards conquering a different world, of the infinite that maintains your life in vacuum? Your soul feels the need for a merger with the infinite that you constantly create from your account of a man addicted to a reality that self-transforms?

Life in the void is an as of yet unwritten story awaiting its narrator. And the infinite that keeps life in the void is the time, the state of expectation of an inspirational spark that may or may not come from higher people who could enhance their artistic abilities according to the outer and inner realities.

A story that you title "In dialogue with MY SHADOW" takes into account man's fundamental need to express himself as he is, to rediscover himself, to detach himself from the world through a living transfiguring emotion.

This emotion may range from an approach to the temporality of inner life, to the representation of the timelessness of a pleasant conversation with one's own consciousness, as well as an elaborate metaphorical construction.

The Being Whose Essence Is The Infinite is the protagonist of a stunning tale of hope, faith and the miracle of life, which only knows the monologue of a man alone but empowered with horizons that are much greater than things ephemeral of this world, caused by the emergence of much more different realities than anticipated.

The Big Charade

On March 25, 2010

Leadership is the art of penetrating the inner world of others, to guide outer transformations through a deep understanding of their feelings and emotions.

In the books written by J.K. Rowling, there is this character Dumbledore, being portrayed as an old sage with a deep understanding of human nature. He can read the thoughts and emotions of those around him, often anticipating future events. In fact, Dumbledore doesn't just give advice; he subtly manipulates events to guide those he loves to the right path. For example, she hides the truth about Harry's past to protect him from pain.

Every man is an unraveled charade. Therefore, you must endow yourself with the gift of the second view, that of a wizard and visionary, of the man who cannot avoid in any way the whole complexity of feelings and emotions that others live. So that you can adjust any change in their inner world, which precedes their outer change. As a man endowed with the skillful description of the feelings of others, you will manage to adjust any change in their personalities filled with ups and downs.

The stages preceding the whole process of human psychical and inner change succeed in a natural, almost identical order. Regardless of type, size and form of leadership you practice. But constantly, just as an editor who identically renders the events, struggling hard not to add anything, no fake elements to his story, you must respect the condition of objectivity which, I repeat, excludes the delusion caused by a false or superficial knowledge.

Leadership regularizes the complexity of inner feelings, through a vision that anticipates and harmonizes inner changes.

This long process of "unraveling the big charade" helps him quickly calculate his area of influence, nesting easier among barren and moving, gentle or steep hills of human soul (which, for most, it is questionable).

But not all rivers flowing into the sea form a fluvial system. Not all actions have immediate effects, not all leaders who pour their ideals, principles, values into the holy grail, full of unexpected of every human type, can amplify leadership.

It is your merit of being notified that people need you, of your resources of knowledge, of your ability to plant in their existence the seeds of some values that would complete their personality and to fulfill them on as many plans as possible.

However, for your leadership to take shape, for your influence to be effective, you must rely on yourself, on your way to conquering the "magic" just as the football game relies on applying tactics. Furthermore, last but not least, you should be able to delineate your reality to that dynamic reality, in a latent state or manifested by other people.

Mastery in leadership is reflected in the ability to create an ecosystem where each individual can discover and manifest their maximum potential, thereby contributing to a larger vision of progress.

By building an awareness campaign of your own capabilities, the management of that attitude that keeps you in touch with yourself, and then with the other people, must be part of the objectives of all your guidelines.

A doctor, by subjective symptoms, sometimes vaguely defined, determines on the basis of some objective criteria and based on some adequate reasoning the cause of the disease and the probable limit the patient's life. In the same way, the leader as to integrate more easily in other people's reality, as to make way through the finest and thinnest branches of their existence, and to be able to produce the complete change, or even partial, must point out the light of a reasoning that would serve as a reference standard of his mastery to lead and to handle any situation with maximum results.

Depending on their acceptance or refusal to grant their confidence to you, whether to provide to you or not all resources necessary for their development, you will be able to highlight your real qualities of a leader. Remember that those who completed their leadership, those who managed to climb the lofty heights of the human soul, and then had the courage to descend into the most hidden depths of the true character that defines the moral essence of human, only those attracted enough "white balls". Only those understood how it is created, how it is controlled the "magic".

The concept underlying the implementation of "magic" is based on the experience of recognizing you as being dependent on the desire to exteriorize your inner feelings.

The great charade is about deciphering the true nature of man. This, especially when we encounter difficulties in deeply understanding the experiences of others, because without this understanding, any attempt to guide their external transformations remains superficial.

The cold statistics of the finest emotions, the strong will to collect and transmit the finest subtleties, all the triggering emotional elements, mental, psychological - from the smallest gesture, from the slightest fraction of a moral idea, up to the liveliest feelings of gratitude, of communion and fidelity - all this creative stages, of unchaining the human potential - are indispensable to leaders.

The true human nature cannot be tested, nor easily or indifferently viewed like in a mirror, as a final aim. And its knowing, its evolution in time, in the long period of formation must be simultaneous with the very act of becoming itself. The moment it heightens the wings of cleverness and assiduity to the high sky of accomplishment. Or the moment it denies its high values and gets lost behind a hopeless horizon, like smoke in rags of clouds.

In the case of leadership, we will always have to deal with the "gift of second sight", that is, even if we do not feel fully prepared to comply with the demands of the situation, we will not be able to bypass the full complexity of feelings and emotions that others experience.

The Black Cobra

On December 12, 2013

Build a vision about the Man you portray which would depend on the result of reason and on the full awareness of the consequences of negative character manifestations that you can not combat.

"My daughter, Catherine, is very gentle and kind. Talk to her and you will see. You have the power. You can do it. I know you can feel love and compassion. You have the chance to show the entire world that you can be as merciful as you are strong, that you are good enough to treat Catherine better than the world treated you. You have the power. Please."

Convincing, the voice of Senator Ruth Martin sends and inoculates an improvised feeling, based on the idea that kindness is the path towards good, towards getting healthy, towards redemption. This prevailing emotion must accelerate a temporary paralysis, to numb the nervous terminations and maintain the stability of positive elements which Buffalo Bill needs as anchors. Thus, she tries to reduce the negative consequences of psychic instability which strongly influence his evolution.

Agent FBI, Clarice Starling immediately observes the intention behind the voice: "Jesus, she's smart, she's really smart. He repeats her name. If Buffalo Bill will look at Catherine as a person and not as an object, he's going to have a hard time killing her."

Leadership: Can you gain access to a new depth of feelings that can help you become more generous without falling into the trap of a pseudo-effect of "silence" in which man worships himself in God's stead?

But will the impossible become possible? Like a volcano sunken for a long time in a deep sleep, will Buffalo Bill let his positive Ego to show itself openly, through a good deed? Or will he lash out with even more violence out of the inertia inoculated by the spiritual weight of these calculated and determinist words?

In order for that dark individual to cast atone his sins with the help of a contritio, through a complete repentance, is not enough to be fully taken over by that tension fueled with soothing, undiluted positive energy. The affection behind these words must rush in his blood and influence his blood flow like a regulator. And in a second, it should provide that purified fuel which ignites his sensitivity, ensuring an even temperature of his manifestation.

Mentally, Buffalo Bill fights with a black cobra, with the venomous influence of his own arguments, but he lacks the balance parameter. He can't reach that state of complete stability corresponding to a normal social functionality. He knows he can be a good and generous man, but he refuses this luxury with obstinacy, because the venom he carries in his genes is too concentrated. Still, he keeps his firm and cold attitude, without bearing the weight of any remorse, without blinking at the sight of Senator Ruth Martin's face.

The Black Cobra is an animal that tries to hypnotize its prey, penetrate into the depths of its soul, and if it fails, it must at least feel that liberating pleasure that is at the same time the purest, the most exalting and the most intense, coming from contemplating a transformation of the essence of man (manifested through a look of worry and pain).

Leadership: Are you trapped in the imprisonment of vices, in the face of an exacerbation of vanity that, in the vicinity of absolute power, feels honored to continue its work?

A live demonstration of the man's unsuspected resources, established, as paradoxically as it would seem, at a psychological and spiritual level, and it reflects the amazing power of the mind. And sometimes, the length reached by crossing the windings of a narrow road, by taking small decisions, to a position considered as being unattackable in the short run, but without no survival chances in the long run.

What makes us deepen our leadership with more sense of accountability is the constant "to be" of the man who demonstrates his qualities and true potential by giving up his dependence on the challenges that challenge his vanity. Based on wrong, even aberrant reasoning, you are tempted to denigrate or deny unanimously accepted values.

All these indirect connection movements to a different type of vision, by a self-kept image which sends shivers instead of inspiring respect, make the passage to a conflicting mentality, less directed towards dialogue and cooperation. Finally, the spell triggered by the way in which man interprets reality and relates to it, makes a lot easier the transfer of self-accreditation in the area of cold, emotionless thinking.

Vanity has the primary effect of maintaining a state of expectation or non-involvement in a critical situation in which you have an obligation to intervene, especially if you are responsible for its consequences. Irreparable, man achieves some kind of a resistance against possible external influences and destruction, but on the other hand it shows a moral superficiality that takes over his whole being, overturning those arguments which can't support his social and professional evolution.

By alternating his nature, by adopting a sick reality, man, caught in the chain of events leading to enclosing vices within himself (those absurd outbursts which Jung described as characteristic to the psychical infection of our time), points his life towards suffering, anxiety and lastly, to emptiness.

Leadership: Do you take into consideration the reference of a spiritual orientation when you become immune to the "pain" that people around you face, according to your intentions to be vulnerable to the feeling that is passed back to you?

The man who takes seriously his role as promoter of changing mentalities can't move from a conflicting mentality to one directed towards dialogue and cooperation – if it is not first powered with concentrated, reassuring positive energy. He can become indestructible from a moral point of view only if he survives all transformation processes, both individually, as well as collectively.

A denial of his own nature, by installing some overtly extended mental blocks or emotional indispositions, announces the beginning of annihilating his identity, a destruction of his own being, both psychologically and socially.

Carl Gustav Jung, the founding father of analytic psychology, observed man within psychological treatment. The personality and identity crises occurring within a continuous self-observation and self-correction process, inevitably lead to confronting the patient with his shadow, with that dark half of his soul that he discarded by projections or depictions of deniable positivities and negativities that could be denied in turn. Basically, man can be influenced by alternative personality states that create the premises of an inadequate argument.

To take into consideration the reference of spiritual guidance, means to get rid of all the vices you harbor within you, so that you don't turn into the slave of urges and feelings that haven't been shaped enough by education, culture, experience and understanding reality, which could trigger evil around you. This guiding point is represented by that incorruptible part of conscience that opposes ignorance, malevolence or deliberate act of abuse of power, certifying the innocence of the path you follow in life.

The only way to achieve the balance parameter that you need so much in order to clearly draw the path you need to follow, and in order to be convinced that the future is in good hands, is to fight the "black cobra", with the venomous influence of own arguments and perceptions.

Is the main reason for the failure of your leadership due to you not recognizing your manifestations of selfishness, intimidation and vanity that accompany abuses of power capable of restricting other people's right to choose?

The Black Cobra aims at that spiteful and tendentious Alter-Ego, which negatively influences thoughts, arguments and ways of action. We all are a combination of white and black, of good and bad, the percentage between them depending on those two parameters that could be reset at any time: the power to expose one's self to new experiences and challenges and the way in which we react to them.

The Black Curtain Of A Hidden Weakness

Carefully polish your own aspirations, as to better position in relation to yourself.

The idea that began to take shape in my mind was that I would manage to escape. To leave the suffocating and antipathetic state that I reached, proper to a traveler who crosses a land full of obstacles. I didn't have such strength of thinking as Spinoza, Kant and Locke that would indicate a road in the confusion that still continues to indulge many philosophers, whose prime rib is that real spark of the dream unharmed by the attainment of a vision of bliss on the world. So I was willing to accept any kind of provocation from the coldness of the mind.

It was obvious that in that moment I was not myself. I was not more a wanderer, un solitaire sur les royaumes de l'objectivité, a convict to a certain fate, to a final judgment that kills the spirit and enslaves the mind. But, a philosopher searching diligently for the field of unknown. Have I managed to cheat easily the fate?

I was following the punishment of a crime, like a character from "1001 ghosts" of Al. Dumas. And if it was true that I committed the crime of which I accused myself, this leap towards the correct self-assessment would be a sin. The terrifying "crime" was the one to serve a different purpose, more brilliant, more sophisticated, and more meaningful than it would have been able to make someone like me, a stranger into the world of illustrious, of artists.

Beyond the borders of my conscience, was outlining a viewpoint that emerged almost out of nothing. As if I was suddenly enveloped in darkness and in all this sinister darkness would have appear a beneficial light that mysteriously transmitted to me: "You can be somebody else."

Leadership: Can you live from what you do not know about yourself, allowing yourself to be penetrated by the solemnity that is due a finale belonging to the necessity of stimulating duality "artist-magician"?

I was living out of what I did not know about myself, that is, I was allowing myself to fall prey to the fantasy of breaking free from rules, breaking free from mediocrity, self-introducing myself into the "laboratory" of the great writers of literature and science, with the observation that the boundary between literature and science was often artificial. Almost hopelessly, I had launched myself into an outpouring of intelligence and charm, on a space-time route to an impossible purpose: to be an integral part of an experience encapsulated in mystical writings.

I tasted the quivering pleasure, the spicy drunkenness, intense of a total transformation. I longed for experiencing it again and again. I gathered my entire will, all courage to start the movie script, like a man who throws himself again and again in the stormy waves of a devouring obsession just to relive that stimulant sense of transformation.

The script "The Magician" my first incursion into the sphere of my inner world, the instrument of formation of a different type of personality, one hidden under the precious cover of a total renewal, was to be a much harder attempt than I have imagined. How tempting could be this story, this incredible option of perfection?

The art of being someone else is how to value your precious talent of verisimilitude, manipulating the magic of making an illusion of yourself in the most beautiful way possible, making you forget that you are reading from your own unique reading experience.

Regardless of the script and its impact, I launched myself in a completely different kind of understanding the world, life, and universe. I felt more freely, less subjected to erosion. I removed the black curtain of my hidden weakness: of wanting to find out what I wish I did not know. I became someone else. Totally foreign to those who knew me. The magician made the connection between ordinary man and the artist of an infinite world, a world where once integrated I could look beyond the appearances of so-called normality.

I could play a character quite close to what I was in reality. With thirsty curiosity I descended up to the deeper areas of my passion, from where sprang impetuous and determined all ideas, all ideals, all my virtues, where all forms of knowledge were combining and merged into an absolute mastery. And, just like a chemist experimenting with new chemical reactions, combining various elements, I managed to develop the key element, the essence that could maximize my creative ability.

What I wanted was closely interwoven with what I was. What I did not know about myself was closely intertwined with the reality that imagination created. The artist-magician duality brought to the forefront the capacity to turn an absence into a presence, rendering a state of reality as plastic as possible, that is by placing an emphasis on things that depend only on me to be illuminated, manifested in various forms of existence and infinite in time and space.

Leadership: Can you measure the force of your thinking according to the adventure of losing yourself in the world of the characters of a story about the spectacle of everyday life, so you can benefit from the image of the ideal of being someone else?

One of the fastest ways to shape your personality is to train your Ego for accepting the change. The way you highlight your qualities, especially your power to intervene in the evolution of things, reflects that part of you, that positive momentum that you unlock when you want to surpass yourself. Consequently, concern yourself more of the nature of your being.

Just as the fashion shows follow to create a novel of shape and color, raised at the rank of art, based on a good knowledge of trends in "Haute Couture" and the public expectations – in the same way, leadership is based on a better knowledge of yourself in relation to the stimulation and boosting the development capacity of the optimal level of performance, but also on the expectations of others.

You become someone else only when you manage to play a character quite close to what you really are, and of what others expect from you. The adventure of seeing yourself as the character in a book or a movie will bring you closer to a new dimension of your personality, one approachable through the human image that can be separated from the old landmarks and the old reality.

Being someone else means perceiving yourself as compared to bringing someone into a more representative, primordial image, in a completely different background, with diverse ambience, to face the challenge of being part of a story script that has all the chances to become real.

Are you devoting yourself to the "awful crime" to serve a different purpose, more brilliant, more sophisticated, more meaningful than you would have been able to accomplish? Do you have the courage to investigate diligently, like a philosopher, for the field of unknown? Or, you prefer to remain a wanderer, a convict to a certain fate, to a final judgment that kills the spirit and enslaves the mind? It depends on you and your choice.

Leadership is a unique masterpiece variant called "It will hurt a little", which comes with a comprehensive view of what it means to be someone else, close to the obsession of the artist looking for untapped territories, unknown worlds, as of yet undetected human dimensions.

The Black Curtain Of A Hidden Weakness expresses the reason, the implacable force of mind and thought, which prevents you see what you lack to be you, which is essential in defining a wider horizon. Highlight the force that seeks to hide your head characteristics towards you and others.

Do you remember the Little Prince from the work of Antoine de Saint Exupery? He said: "I've always loved the desert. You sit down on a sand dune. You see nothing. You hear nothing. And yet something shines in his silence. That makes the desert beautiful because it hides a well somewhere... "

Leadership dissolves itself; the boundaries between knowledge, perception and reality become permeable if you do not know yourself well enough. By starting the exploration of your own Ego is like looking for a well in the desert. You can understand the "mystery of shining" only if you intervene in your evolution process, but without "distorting" the final target of yours and others.

Only if your searches are based on concrete elements detected with specific "tools" - mental or material, you can find the source of knowledge and the subsequent way of progress.

Carefully polish your own aspirations, as to better position in relation to yourself.

The Black Second Of The Passing Time

On June 24, 2013

Moderate your need to acquire the highest knowledge, so that you avoid that conflict with yourself that can take you on the edge of a sad ending.

Johann Friedrich Böttger was an alchemist, chemist and German inventor. He was the one who invented the porcelain of Saxony, leading to the founding of an industry that has become traditional in Europe. However, his fate was unexpectedly deceptive. Here's what we learn about the famous alchemist from the writer M. Solomon in the book "Lights in Retort":

On January 23rd, 1710, Frederick Augustus, King of Poland, signs a decree establishing a porcelain factory, whose income would contribute to improving Saxony's financial situation, severely shaken by the invasion of Carol XII of Sweden. The decree confers special rights on eminent people who are involved in the production of white porcelain.

But Böttger is in custody under the threat of death penalty for a hypothetical scam. He serves the king only to gain his freedom. Thus, encouraged by the success of his discovery, the alchemist moves to new trials. He is haunted by the thought of finding a clay with the same vitrification properties, but white. And he succeeds.

The King is very pleased with Böttger's work, who, in turn, feels within his right to demand his release. But Frederick Augustus does not want to get rid of a man of such value, he always imputes a hypothetical guilt, or a debt or various mistakes. Böttger did not know how to make gold, but knew how to make porcelain. And this secret had to be kept.

Böttger remained the king's prisoner all his life. At age 35, in 1719, he dies a poor man, tormented by his desire for freedom, ruined by the alcoholism which pushed him to his tragic fate. After Böttger's death, the king continued to collect revenue coming from the manufacturing in Meissen.

Leadership: Can you improve your ability to respond effectively to less predictable life situations so you can get a clearer view of the "conditioning-sacrifice" relationship?

In understanding the dependency between developing social and culturally-professional life, I don't hesitate to warn, and even to reproach someone with a much too rich vision on the relation conditioning-sacrifice. This kind of a man walks on the most advanced line, which happens to be the thinnest, self-reducing himself to the prototype of a modern human, of the discoverer, of a scientist who can stoically go against any emotional drawbacks.

The essence of his life can get lost in the essence of time, for satisfying his noble desire to know, to pierce through the secrets of things, in the center of the great conquests in the backstage of science. In all this time of searching the unknown truths, his spiritual and emotional force can gradually fade. A crown of laurels that hardly ever withers and leaves deep marks his being, all the more because the knowledge of accepting who you are is covered by the knowledge of living in harmony with a self-imposed reality.

Every time you try to escape the routine you're used to, in the attempt to develop your leadership potential, you find yourself in front of the opponent's gate: logic and reason. After you have superbly passed all the opponents, you want to open the score. Your reason of being and your own identity suddenly change. And everything you do gravitates around your new moment to score a success. But they can be in contradiction with everyone else's reason. You are happy, but at the same time, someone loses – your Ego.

Leadership: Do your discoveries force you to contribute to creating a new image of yourself as an addict to a significant life-saving "cost" in terms of validating a single possible option to justify non-capping decisions?

The enormous mistake made by Böttger was that the result of his experiences came to the ear of powerful people without proposing a contract to the extent of his discovery. And not only that, he was "taken" from the plane of normal life because he claimed he could get gold by translating brass, an attitude that at the time was just a delusion. Practically, he lacked the ability to perceive the value of his discovery.

And when he discovered the porcelain formula, which cost almost as much as his weight in gold, it was too late to change something. His image of the world had gained the aura of a gladiator cast into the arena by a system he can no longer stop, and the only "cost" of his life's maintenance was merely his affirmation in history, he's entering a legendary status.

The Ego is the measure of your own lack of knowledge and your own ignorance, contributing to the validation of a single possible justification for not limiting your decision: "Be special by not making yourself known too early", otherwise you risk becoming a prisoner of a time when "they all want to take advantage of you".

The more the Ego pushes you to be prouder of yourself, from the very first discoveries, the more you have to keep away from the eyes of the world. Otherwise you risk not being able to separate yourself from other people more capable and more powerful than you, who will know how to take advantage of you.

Leadership: What can be the measure of your own happiness at the height of prosperity if you cannot enjoy the benefits of an investment that you have gained in time through an internal reconfiguration effort?

Consequently, the fire is out of control. You enter this temporary loop; you're suffocated by a bunch of difficult questions, paradoxes, ambiguities and deviations between meaning and direction. Misunderstandings of causes and effects. This rises an unjustified fear similar to the question "who could save me?", which reduces your activation energy and orientation reaction.

And leadership, thus, limits its quality, because you can't detach from that part of yourself that commands to throw yourself in an endless battle. A fight in which knowledge can always make you knockout, because you will never fully comprise it.

Moderate your need to acquire the highest knowledge, so that you avoid that conflict with yourself that can take you on the edge of a sad ending. The personal reconfiguration effort requires you to evaluate your chances of success in a certain direction, so as to not contradict the image you expect to see in case of failure.

The first law of alchemy is related to how you use your ability to perceive the value of your discoveries so that you do not get converted into the prisoner of your limitation in the various aspects of life.

The Black Second Of The Passing Time brings forward that moment in the life of someone who wants to become an exceptional leader, which determines him to find answers to absolutely all the unknowns in his and others' evolution, dissecting the past, the present and the future. Of course, throwing a glance in the past means to remember the important mistakes of others in order not repeat them in your life.

The Blackbird's Song

On September 17, 2012

Personalize your road towards yourself, until you manage to unravel the darkest mysteries of the real part that characterizes you.

Like a man overwhelmed by a mysterious feeling, tempted by an unknown phenomenon of which I cannot disembarrass, I felt myself lost in a world torn by contradictions, un monde de nulle part, that I did not know and which I could not master. I pleaded in favor of a deep consciousness existence, mystical, as if coming from another realm, from a different dimension, from an immeasurably space, from an Avalon.

Probably I was going through a trance of routine. Something was repeating like a pattern, like an obsessive refrain, ironically, with all sorts of connotations, generating a great mix of exaggerations and falsehoods laced with erroneous conclusions, which conveyed a special emotional charge. Like a phenomenon of ectoplasm: something seemed to dwell in me, emanating a certain vibration. A kind of force, an intense feeling, a so rare self-awareness, a crucial virtue that could raise me or it could rather make me knock out at any time. I did not believe in the wisdom of the "Man" from me. I looked tired, with discharged batteries.

What it was happening, was more than the appearance of new states of consciousness, was a decisive and triggering factor, the deep burden of sweeping and unhindered emotion, which died, taking the place of a lesson of life. The evolution put face to face with the revolution of individual responsibility. The overwhelming anguish of an entire world, of a continuously changing whole, of a life lived mostly through the eyes of a passerby who notices the other side of the world, marked by a steadiness that for some people is hard to imagine.

Leadership: Do you lose yourself in a world torn by contradictions that you cannot master, in an attempt to shape another perspective on your life in the form of a state of mind that is "the beginning of the release of all contradictions" ?

Once with each entry in "trance" with every great breakdown of a deep knowledge form, were taking shape other unanswered questions. The reason was letting itself be touched, almost defeated by the void passion of my own spontaneous dilemmas and contradictions. The essence of my own existence being conditioned by another way of interpreting the reality. Only one contradiction put my thought and feelings to the test: that I could observe the unseen part of a world, without knowing it so well.

And only the reality that triggering "song" of positive changes, for wider visions, whose composition was more or less like anyone else, and whose strong message woke me of trance, made me feel good with myself, and to give new meanings to life. More real, more comprehensive, less private. The song, reflecting my mood, was the conclusion of a whole life from another point of view.

It was something in my transformation, similar to the anguish of a bird locked in a cage, and that bumps stubbornly on the bars until managing to regain the sky. A blackbird can regain her freedom only through her song.

Leadership: Do you follow a certain path to reach your nature, turning yourself into a passerby who notices the other side of his world?

Steve Farber, a former vice-president of the company Tom Peters affirmed that the true leadership consists in returning to some simple principles that have been overlooked in the context of the existence of something different from ourselves and beyond us.

Furthermore, I would add with all confidence that the lessons of life you receive in confrontation with yourself represent the first step towards achieving a sustainable construction of a world that you do not know, but you feel and hope for it.

A leader is like a passerby, who observes the other side of his world, comparing it with the world around him. The leadership bends down, therefore, with equal interest to people, as an indivisible amount of features and values that he can learn by himself, through self-observation, by practicing a self-control of his manifestations.

In leadership, the evolutionary unit is the "Man" which in his turn represents the concentrated force of a deep knowledge, perfect, causative, existentially assumed, appropriate for his progress.

We may know what it means happiness or sadness, we tasted the laughter and the cry, but we still do not know too much about the primary resorts, the most subtle ones of our own being. We are what we are at the end of a series of events. And, leadership is rather the last point of our own ascension. But also the biggest obstacle.

Leadership: Do you endure the consequence of key questions that cause impactful answers and generate change, thus contributing to your transformation from a man confused by numerous contradictions into a representative example of the convergences between parts of the whole?

After more than three centuries, Francis Bacon highlighted that the truth arises more easily from errors than from confusion. I agree with this. For an error of your own perspective, discovered in time, can be remedied by resetting your own way of being. While a confusion can result in a continuous state of tension, of total perplexity, like in a hypnotic trance, in which the conscious control of your actions is considerably diminished.

All progresses are opened to people, except one, which, like constantly disadvantage or aggravate them: the transition from simple to complex. The truth about who you are, and who you can become, arises when you connect to your own nature, when you free yourself from the cage of uncertainties that surround your prospects. And, above all, if you do not get lost in a world torn by contradictions. Here, I refer to an evolution that faces the revolution of individual responsibility.

The whole to which are subordinated all impactful actions over your search results, troubles and dreams, has as a reference value the subjective appreciation of the circumstances that form the content of your life.

Leadership: What is the "chorus" that you feel constantly in your life, on the road to excellence, so that you can prove your belonging to the existence of a multiple self, both episodically and narratively, these two hypostases of the self not in any way being a report of opposition, but of complementarity?

We are increasingly interested in trends and developments in technology, in the factors influencing our business of tomorrow than in ourselves. We should come back, is not it, to a series of simple principles that have been disregarded in the context of a fierce competition in the business world. For example, the principle of the multiple self, which says: "To live as if you were someone else is the same as when you build a new world that serves only you."

Do you let yourself tempted by an "unknown" of whom you cannot get rid? Do you feel like getting lost in a world torn by contradictions that you cannot master? How do you interpret your own reality? In what way your reality conditions the essence of your own personality? Do you continue mobilizing that real part of you, or you continue to feed your desires or needs to a "false ego" of a "truncated ego"?

What "song" characterizes you? How can you adjust the song in order to get the refrain? What is the "refrain" that you constantly feel in your life, on your road towards excellence? Do you unconsciously obey yourself to some rules that transform your freedom of "being" in a closed area? What effect exercises your own way of being over the leadership that you practice?

A self that looks at the world around it as a look at a unique way of expressing itself, through which it transmits emotion to the surrounding world and at the same time calms its soul, is a self released from the overwhelming burden of doubt about its own worth.

The Blackbird's Song is a revealing metaphor signifying the idea of liberation from the cage of appearances and uncertainties concerning the nature of your personality. The freedom to escape is rare, sometimes impossible. However, the refusal to recognize the key, and to open the door to a different kind of "being" will lead you to a perpetual ruin, and can always make knock-out of your evolution as a "man" not only as "leader".

Personalize your road towards yourself, until you manage to unravel the darkest mysteries of the real part that characterizes you.

The Blessed Tranquility After A Chaotic Fever

On May 10, 2013

Avoid the alternatives for "to be", which could jeopardize the sense of your real identity, eliminating the unnatural of your inner fulfillment.

Two gentlemen take Laura Quinn's and lead her to the immense deposit of diamonds. And it suddenly happens ! A thrill ! Stupefaction ! Anxiety ! Fright ! It stops immediately. She can barely breathe. She looks around. To her left and to her right, a total chaos, as if the place was crossed by a true tornado. All the boxes were empty; the diamonds were nowhere to be seen. They completely disappeared !

And still, this sad, unexpected sight lures Laura through a curiosity that incites her senses, impatiently wishing to vibrate, awakening in her the instinct of finding a mystery.

You can read her true mood on her face, that signalement of ecstasy, but also of profound deception, of surprise, of agony, of the impossible. All her thoughts race in her mental sphere, shuddering thoughts that can't be shaped into words. These very different feelings suddenly invade her overheated brain, creating a state of artificial, chaotic fever that rises gradually. The true personality alternations happen instantaneously.

Leadership: Does your presence in search of a better world determine you to wonder what else you have left from condensing experiences that have hurt you more than you could have sustained?

Laura falls in an uncertain dimension, full of unpredictable, feeling more and more uncomfortable. Dark thoughts pulsate at her temples with the power of a typhoon, generating a state of despair. A fantastic irritation of the nerves that attack the muscles, leading to temporary paralysis. Through an unstable chemical combination, the elements that generate the tension state are arranged in a different order, enhancing the probability of side effects occurrence.

She becomes trapped in a suffocating silence. A kind o mysterious power that we don't know about, turns to stone her every cell, making her tumble in an agonizing cascade of energy – equal to a power surge that can't ensure a basic potential able to open the junction between the "True" and "False" areas.

Basically, Laura enters that horrible state of uncertainty, due to a great enigma. How could this happen? A word harshly lingers in her mind: How? How? How?

All the internal gathering of defining elements automatically rebels through a form of communication and relating, needing a certain decoding, a disclosure, a presentation of some actual states. Everything becomes very crowded in Laura. Everything strange to her knowledge generates an abnormal curiosity.

Leadership: Do you have to coexist with your defects and qualities so you can appreciate all your good parts, taking into account that state of consciousness generated by your own values?

Oh, if I were able to pierce into this unquenched curiosity and fully control it ! This mystery of all mysteries that lives and seems to mock me, that has me as its main character. To feel connected to it, to tame it and finally to order it !

I do not know what my eyes see, what my conscience whispers to me, what my heart begs me to find out. I am very small, I get lost in a maze of clues and inter-connections, in a dazzling vortex of backstage plays. I am thrown in a puzzle of psychological games and permanent uncertainty. I tremble because of the impatience, uncertainty and worry. To find the truth ! Come on, show yourself ! Show yourself, you coward, parasite, people scarecrow ! Let's talk ! Where are you? I planned the robbery, how can you of all things deceive me, truth?

The perfume of the inexplicable surrounds Laura as a bitter layer of fragility and helplessness. But who should she be angry with? Her incontestable individuality is completed and accentuated by her contact with this way of feeling, with this new quadrant of the unlikelihood that discloses her inner mechanics, the splendid duality between void and matter, between known and unknown, between true and false.

A sparrow left itself prey to the unforeseeable, exposing itself to some thwarting currents. It experienced uncertainty, risk and its darkest fears. O complete confusion separated it from the two main constancies: "to be" and "not to be". Her values remain thin as endless pins. Lying, falsity, and worry are experienced as failures that question the personal consecration of God, transformed into an ambiguous attitude toward what is happening to her, in an attitude that is not condemned by a mute abandon.

Leadership: Do you find yourself in a compelling attitude of an exemplary life experience that repeats itself to the illusion that you represent the trophy of a farewell moment from what you have done before?

The uncanniness of your inner perfection confirms the presence of spiritual pain in the midst of unexpected events, causing you to continue to trust yourself in a prediction like "if it is not white, then it is black". The only strength that Laurel has left is ambition, she works and deals with a certain thing she wants to accomplish without making a theory out of everything.

Talking about leadership in these circumstances, of futility, of inner void and despair, is similar to trying to define happiness through very poor words in expressing its essence. I have to take into account the state that man experiences when he felt that his happiness is not shared by his other half: consciousness.

Like Laura Quinn, you may feel a prisoner in your own life, perhaps due to wrong choices, finding the only way to escape belonging to a series of values that are not necessarily Christian, but which are necessary for a kind of excuse "I was stupid that I did not accept to change in time". However, after you've gone through everything you've been through, you've learned to rid yourself of thoughts that are running continuously, to be more aware of what you are doing.

But do not fall under the illusion that you represent the trophy of a farewell moment from what you have done before, because you will never forget what changed you, just as you will never forget how it all began.

Leadership is what you feel you can sacrifice on a spiritual level without compromising that state of consciousness generated by the achievement of values of great significance in what progress is in life and in the profession: opening up to novelty, tolerance and responsibility.

The Blessed Tranquility After A Chaotic Fever describes that complex state of "being", which has to be reinstated; the essential condition of bettering the being, challenged by a disorganized delirium of feelings, produced by a mistaken perception of a certain situation or of one's own Ego.

If you want to understand yourself, avoid the alternatives of "being" that could jeopardize the meaning of your real identity. Eliminate the unnatural from your inner fulfillment.

As cells are the vital parts of life, so are the various, multiple, complex aspects of the stressful situation you're in, vital parts of the course of your self-knowledge and evolution process towards a conscious leadership.

The Bloody Red Tip Of The Bullet That Puts An End

On March 03, 2012

Strictly control your system of values, by making it unbeatable in front of the passing emotions.

The new world of Kevin Lomax began to take shape. The oldest one was almost completely destroyed. Time was beating as an enormous heart of God, enlarging and contracting. The beautiful Christabella Andreoli, whose seductive power was so eloquent, drops her dress. Kevin looked with relish at her naked and heated body asking for its "rights" - while the Devil himself, in the person of the multimillionaire John Milton, was enjoying this stage of his son's initiation, into the world of sin.

- Hey, after two minutes you will forget Mary Ann, whispered Christabella looking eagerly into his eyes. She approached her voluptuous lips to his, kissed him with the most perfect passion, then twisted her body on the altar table, intensifying the flavor of her sensuality, motivating skillfully and earnestly the desire to be touched and completely given to his being.

Leadership: Is the hard part of the meaning you give to life the "paradoxical courage" of giving up on yourself in favor of the outcome suggested to you by faith?

And, suddenly, on hearing his wife's name, Kevin hid the following thought in his heart: "Yes, I want you, Christabella when you are just a fantasy in my head. But I'm a man who terribly loves his wife, besides this, I still feel an immense tenderness for her, even if she no longer exists."

It was only a need, a need of the body, but that could not overcome the need of the soul. The same chains, the wonderful chains of love, entered into his flesh. The desire's clouds were thinning, vanished just like they came. Kevin sank into the tranche of his own mind. He was feeling like everything around him was moving in a reverse order, as if something had exploded into his being.

The end of the movie "The Devil's Advocate (1997)" is brilliant by the message that it transmits. Kevin, seized by the biggest guilt, felt a distant pain, which occurs in another dimension, and that he was supposed to receive. He took out the gun from his waist. Pulled the trigger. The bullet penetrated his head and got out fast on the other side, evacuating a large amount of blood from the open wound. The red tip of blood outlining the way towards the end of his being.

A sacrifice for the salvation of the soul. This gesture must come from the depths of the soul. Love does not get tired, does not disappear. But, saves and convicts the soul. The bullet has brought his salvation. His soul was freed from sin, bringing him back to the life full of candor along with his wife, Mary Ann.

Leadership: Do you have to take a stand against building a destiny depleted of content, pointing your attention towards the loss you feel when you are included in a plan higher than your level of expectations?

A true leader secures his means of outlining his qualities and making them known, by orienting his decisions in the direction of the emotions and his deep feelings. Can you recognize the dough from which is made the leader, by watching how he reduces or increases his brilliance of the soul? He can conquer the highest peaks of leadership only through a new and full understanding of his essence, by rendering the positive side of his being in all its intensity - by adjusting the strong contrasts between appearance and reality, maintaining a the right balance of judgment, without accepting too much indulgence.

Your development as a leader must start with establishing and mastering of a scale of values and promoting your own values that would stimulate your personal progress and would maintain your spiritual balance.

Just as the blood volume is inextricably linked to the blood composition, so "the metabolism" of your leadership, which reduces or emphasizes your negative personality traits, determining the reactions towards actions - is inextricably linked to basic needs of your soul. In other words, your emotional stability may be shaken at the impact with a certain outside "aggression" if it is not based on real values strongly rooted in you.

The test of character begins by accepting the fact that you represent more than what is destined for you to become in a moment of fate in which you are forced to experience self-sacrifice.

Are you ready to become a martyr or saint?

The adoption of an attitude that does not guarantee the obtaining of a positive emotional reaction is like a small fissure in a dike that can turn into a bigger breach through which the water gushes with an increasing force.

Almost in the same way, your transit to third values that are not in accordance with your faith and does not motivate your existence, will create a "fissure" in your leadership from which will gush only dissenting judgments and unprofitable action, and even of suicide.

The supreme testimony of faith is an instinctive act of self-sacrifice from which emerges the soul's salvation.

The bloody red tip of the bullet that puts an end, aims the adoption of that attitude that must highlight your most valuable qualities, such as "soul warmth" and "moral duty". At the same time, expresses the moment when you come back to the high steps of the scale of your values, demonstrating your ability to be firstly, your own leader.

Strictly control your system of values, by making it unbeatable in front of the passing emotions.

The Book Between Borges And Hauff (II)

On February 14, 2021

What forms the most chosen knowledge is the essence of an a priori experience that you always encounter in yourself.

Sometimes I feel that I have become someone else, someone deeply interested in the possibility of renewing a spatial horizon of knowledge, according to the value of truth attributed to a universal consciousness equal to the infinite dimension of the Creator's work. And if I feel deeper affinities with the passion for reading, for writing, for creation, saying essential things, so creating something beautiful, it is because I managed to relate to Borges' writing universe that expanded and was guided by the time zone of a parallel universe in which Wilhelm Hauff is the ultimate reality.

As a result, my life written in a book of prose is the summary of the books of the two mystics explained in a single book that no other book in any library in the world contains. There is a desert belief in the secret books of the two mystics, and which my book nuances wonderfully, with contemporary accents, with an imaginative softness, by replacing one identity with another identity.

I am sure that no desert contains more sand than you find in the tales of Wilhelm Hauff that Borges spoke in Arabic with the desert wind, with the specification that every grain of sand present in the expanse of their desert is a consequence and a continuation to my book, a rediscovery of myself in a past life, or a rebirth of myself in a future life.

And if I were to recite my life in Hauff's universe, of which Borges is a part, I would find myself in the legend of the famous traveler who wrote his name on the sand of time.

Leadership: Do you have the ability to influence the direction and pace of change of a "search you own self in the end of a new beginning" function as a consequence of your ability to change the micro and macro universe of an Alter-Ego?

At other times, it will happen that you feel that you are someone else, as it often happens to me, full of relevance, in the context of the causal model of reality, when I read Borges. And, like any true writer who speaks to mysticism and especially to scientists, I feel that Borges' ideas belong to Hauff's ideas, and that Hauff's own ideas are the fruit of the formation of a mind the size of Borges.

And when you will feel this, and this will surely happen to you if you read the books of the two writers, you may be able to get into the mind of the one who is now writing these lines without which you could not be you, but you would be a another that always follows a new cycle of incarnation and metamorphosis. Who knows, maybe one day you will understand the Mystery of the Incarnated Word.

Leadership: Can changing the way you look at a situation change the way you perceive and understand it, as you relate to a moment that does not belong to you, but resides in you?

You will become desert, you will become sand, you will become easy to shape into compact forms of pure poetry, in association with a high degree of independence in a cyclical, non-stationary universe, and you will return to the point where you started. You will make the transition from micro to macro, each time re-energized, purer, so that you can understand and recognize that the identity of the soul never dies, but is always transposed into words, feelings, images, numbers or colors.

This is true both for you and for those who have activated in their memory the function of searching for the following passage from another book of the desert, written by another scholar named Mika Waltari:

"I still don't know why I lived. Finishing this last book, I'm even more puzzled than when I started writing. Writing has been a comfort all these years, in which I have had only the sea before my eyes. I saw it red and black; I saw it green during the day, I saw it white at night. I saw it blue sometimes, on hot days, bluer than blue stones and I'm already tired of looking at it. The sea is too big, too scary and a man can look at it all his life without getting bored, because it is always different. Just looking at it, he becomes sad and starts getting dizzy. I feel my heart sink into a bottomless pit as I look out to sea.

The desert is like the sea, it is always present in my thoughts, in my soul, being the symbol that will continue to give me confidence, in another view of life."

You have understood my point of view, dear reader, of which I am also a part. For so far, I have told you all about the great knowledge, or the Great Universal Work, as some call it. As you may well realize, the micro and macro universe of an Alter-Ego includes that form of incarnation and metamorphosis that can last indefinitely, but also that short story of a moment of insight (which incorporates reflection, emotional intelligence, self-awareness and motivation) experienced through an identification with your own reversible nature.

Leadership is a structure of depth related to the miraculous interweaving between the fascination for the story invented by the human mind and its real existence subject to a revision of the image that represents it in another hypostasis.

The Book Between Borges And Hauff is the path you take from identity to otherness, with the specification that who you are and who you will be does not say much about you, but about your unconditional adherence to a universe that seems ruled by chance, so, inevitably, absurd. This universe is not related to direct experience of reality, but to an a priori date.

The Book Between Borges And Hauff (I)

On February 12, 2021

The story of a creation of great universal scope is the expression of an artistic manifestation that promotes the idea of an art created according to already existing models, in accordance with the experience of being what you are not, even if in reality you are someone else.

I have often imagined myself to be a lively, telling, and thoughtful book, written in first person with the language of art springing from the emotional attitude of creation secretly and inexplicably. And, knowing that no book tells a more beautiful story than a character who experiences his story in the real world, I decided to imagine an endless world, perfect by the equivalence between living an a priori reality and its true image, indicated by the tension of a fulminating otherness.

The very fact that I am a book without a name, from an endless world, says a lot about an artist whose horizon is different from those of the artists of his generation. For if my mind were one book, and my soul another book, then the world would have two books that tell the same story differently. And if I were a sum of stories written in a single book, maybe someone would still find a new book in each story that promises to recreate another world. Endless. Immeasurable. Artistic. Sparkling. Out of the ordinary.

And you, dear reader, of which I am a part, please consider the following. Every new book you read with insufficient attention, being anchored as if in a unitary background of the universe that evolves only through creation and originality, imagine that it is part of that unique book that instructs your soul to make a distinct description of itself.

And even if you read more books, written by other authors, if you don't really live the life of the characters in this unique book, then you will never feel the spell of endless stories. I think, in fact, it's important not to read a lot of books, but to learn to integrate into the story of the character in your favorite book.

Leadership: How do you justify your choice to live an authentic way of being through the relationship that is established between the privileged moment of reflection about yourself and the possibility of expressing the mirrored feelings in a world identical to yours?

Reading this book about myself, you will meet Wilhelm Hauff and Jorge Luis Borges, under the same star that lit my way at a time when I had lost my compass and drifted, the universe being my witness to how difficult it was for me to become a Creator on the shaken background of reflection on reality that has reached a layer of Cartesian, spectacular, excessive intelligence.

Everything is favorable to the level of depth. Over time, in terms of what is considered an experience I can only know a priori, I learned from Hauff how to be Borges, because my feelings were increasingly embedded in the immortal characters of a reality prudently revealed from the perspective of multiple lives of the soul that predominates over matter.

After many years of artistic writing, with a miraculous significance, with that dose of intimacy that should remain secret or accessible only to creators, I have become mature enough to understand that a journey into a great desert never ends. And if I will always be part of Hauff's soul, because Borges made me love each of the 1001 nights immensely, it is because my life seems to work according to the principle of multiple lives that are found only in the area of a seemingly endless desert.

Leadership: Could you create a vivid painting without looking at a picture, but just rendering what you see with your mind's eye, so that you feel that there are more similar patterns of thinking in you?

And so much did I find my soul in the stories of Hauff and Borges, and so much did I travel with them in the desert area, that I felt like a single grain of sand sifting through the hourglass of time is a body from the breath of a universal experience and boundless freedom. The soul is also a story, but it deserves to be retold only by doubling it in another dimension.

Even now, through myself, in this other life that shines in other lives, in these lines written with soul, with feeling, with the warmth of the desert, lives the same Hauff perpetuated in reality visible only to the eye of the true sage and clairvoyant named Borges. Thus I justify my choice to live authentically, through the written reply I give to a life lived in another life.

As you can see, I always remember Borges in my book, because he reminds me of Hauff, and because Hauff reminds me of the desert I crossed disguised as Borges' characters. Yes. I imagined I was Borges as I read Hauff. But I became Hauff because my philosophy was endowed with Borges' thinking.

Starting from this, I myself will be Hauff thanks to the moving sands and the desert wind that buried Borges' huge library, but kept the golden words in perpetuity: "Time must wait".

Leadership is the thinking that you personalize by suggesting a reality in which you manifest your superiority as spirit, as body, as energy, as attitude, but so that you want to know more about yourself.

The Book Between Borges And Hauff opens a new perspective on a reality that you are obliged to analyze with the meticulousness of an Alter Ego, so that in the future you can promote the thinking of a new ontology of "difference" in trying to be someone else.

The Book In The Park

Everything has a more expressive side, and that is the secret of his life.

There are things hidden in the depths of my eyes that dare not confess anything to me, but I would like to ask them to reveal themselves to me. Let them reveal themselves to me without reluctance, without shadow, without hesitation, sharing their truth with me with absolute sincerity. Because that's how things are: simple, but confused, unforeseen or unforeseeable, beyond that Ulaeassio Sahtos Athesancha , an open window to the artistic universe, meant as if to absorb the colors and shapes beyond the limits of the canvas.

As I wandered through the park, quiet, dreamy, I noticed something strange on a bench partially hidden in a shadowy corner. It was an old book, a thing overlooked by the other passers-by, uma eternidade de solidao se estendeu diante de mim , with a worn cover and pages yellowed by time. It had no name written on it, no indication of author or title. Piqued my curiosity, along the lines of a symbolic visual representation, something pushed me to pick it up, open it, flip through its pages, like a painter exploring colors on his palette in search of divine inspiration.

The experience of discovering something new, even in unexpected places, often awakens curiosity and inspiration, similar to how an artist searches for his muse. Like a strange call, my eyes were bewitched by this old book, lost and forgotten on a park bench, its weather-yellowed pages testifying to the merciless passage of time. It was as if I had to recreate the oldest painting in a museum, so as to restore that forgotten story and bring it to life again in the light of the present. Somehow, I felt like I was connecting with the past in a deep way and carrying its story inside me, like a keeper of lost memories, ready to bring them back to life through words and imagination.

Leadership: Is the inner struggle you wage daily essentially a balancing act between seeing and not seeing, in a constant search for something that, though invisible, must be seen?

Many pages, many lines were missing, but on the first page I looked at, which was actually page number 21, the following words of the author were written somewhere in the middle, words written with soul, with skill, with nostalgia, with sincerity to one who does not hide his thoughts behind words, but still cloaks them in mystery:

" An ancient struggle was his life . Every morning it brought him a new hope , and every evening a new despair , like a kind of alternation between light and in the dark. The eternally dumbfounded by his work , laughing at the ten times he objects , leaves and returns ten times to the same corner of nature , who always told him something different from the great mystery, and he always asked , feeling that beyond the visible lines and colors , there is something that cannot be seen, and which still needs to be seen . Must. That this is the calling of an artist in the world - to make you see forever and ever what nature shows only once , in the flash of a moment , once , in all the incomprehensible and terrifying eternity of time . "

By some accident, I reread these words several times, once again and once again, in a figurative context, but in such a way as to grasp in my soul the obvious emotion of a traveler through untold worlds. An expression of wealth simplified, synthesized, reduced to its essence, pierced my imagination with a kind of transcendental clarity, making every word vibrate in my heart like a divine echo. Lost objects, found in unexpected places, can have their own story, invisible but full of meaning.

Leadership: Does a serendipitous discovery lead you to a deeper appreciation of how each moment you live in the present extends beyond what your reflection in someone else's past reflects?

No name, no author guarded its worn cover. Only a deep mystery pushed me to open it, to feel it with the hands of a painter, as if I had been called by an invisible force to explore the hidden secrets of a parallel universe. In it, I found scattered fragments, unfinished lines, hurried sketches, each page, torn or not, a window into the soul of an artist who once poured his heart and thoughts there - but did not throw them away, as negligence, but gave them eternal life, as an echo of immortality in the soul of one who knows how to see beyond appearances.

Immediately, I realized that each word was a thread in a much larger fabric, a web of artistic experiences stretching across the boundaries of time and space.

I followed the clues left by this soul on paper, each leading me to unknown corners of the artistic world, hidden symbols, unforeseen metaphors, teaching me about the beauty of life's complexity. This incident of the found thing, not only took me through unexpected corners of the artist's soul, but opened my heart and mind to the understanding that every object, every person, every moment has a story to tell, and sometimes, the biggest treasures are hidden in the most unexpected and mundane places.

If you find an old book, don't throw it away, because in it can hide a good, generous soul, who knew that one day it will be read by someone like him, someone who will understand and value his message. And it will take him further.

Leadership: In the moments of final revelation do you feel that you become part of a continuous dialogue with the past seen through the prism of a reality that transcends the immediate?

I googled the words, found them. I found both the book and the writer. I remembered reading it a long time ago and I'm sorry I didn't recognize it from the start. And, also then, I came across other words that seemed to make me reflect more deeply on the earlier words:

"If you have put in a verse a tremor of your heart, let it you know that , even in a thousand years, whoever reads it will feel the beat of your heart in his heart . If you didn't put anything, what do you want to be there? It 's the same with a painting."

Further, the journey through the lost words of this book, found entirely on Google, made me realize that this book was not just a lost object, but a deliberate gift, a message in a bottle thrown into the sea of time, meant to unite wandering souls. . In a revealing ending, I was invited to add my own fragment to this legacy, before allowing it to continue its journey, to be discovered by the next explorer of life.

This episode of discovery not only took me through the unexpected twists and turns of art and life, but opened my heart and mind, teaching me that every object, every person, every moment carries within itself a story worth telling, and the treasures the most precious are often those hidden in the most mundane places, right in front of eyes that don't see them.

Like art, authentic expression of feeling in leadership maintains its resonance and value, standing the test of time and inspiring generations. And every experience, visual or personal, is an opportunity to learn and pass on the values and meanings captured.

The book in the park is actually the object of a view that, although exposed to apparent uncertainty, manages to retain its mystery. Just as every sight feeds the eyes with its distinct beauty, making every heart flutter, so every object, person or moment carries a valuable lesson worth exploring and sharing.

The Book Of Books

On August 27, 2020

I don't need inspiration from other books. I am my total inspiration.

I have a book and a pencil in front of me. They both have each other. But my eyes see rather the hidden meaning of the book than the pencil annotations on the book, largely because my eyes react independently to the ways in which the object and the artistic process are received, based on the relationship between author and work.

What I see is what the book lets me see, and what I grasp with my mind, soul, light and truth, is what the pencil indicates to me as a priority for the perception of an image that is always read differently, at each reading.

Repeated experiences of writing and reading have brought me to the realization that I am traversed by a mysterious fluid, invisible, spiritual, undiluted in time, which is in a movement of flow compared to the horizontal imaginary journey of a world built of words.

I don't need too many words to describe the book or the pencil. I only need one word: vision. And, yes, I am a visionary because I read in a book what I am now writing with a pencil, without being included as a character in that book.

There is a connection between the brush and the pen that can be found in the way of sending a letter, more a letter in which you find moods, moods and states that go up and down in the vein of thoughts. Their work is always unpredictable, as is the destination, the feelings we rise to by reading or watching do not always have a reason, the story sometimes ends before we end the thread of imagination, but the colors always belong to each other. And, of course, the creator is a magician who often makes a journey between the need for diversity and agitation, between memories and dreams, some stringent, others too clear.

Everything becomes complicated and extremely simple. The imagination is like a telegram sent from the room of the one who combines writing with painting as if he were pressing a button, sometimes he remains frozen in the tension of creation. In the same way, reality is always different, sometimes in blurred planes, sometimes as if it were detached from a window whose glass seems familiar to us, sometimes pink, sometimes blue and often has a color that we do not know how to we read very well.

Yes, that's how it is. The Creator, in his act, wants to agree with you, even if you are a fleeting presence, even if life is ephemeral. Troubles and struggles, through what they create, for an artist, the pen and the brush are like a cleansing, a release, he puts all things perfect through talent above words, above sunset and sunrise... (Ioana Sarah).

Know how to see, even if you do not believe. Know how to believe, even if you do not see. And distinguish the signs at the same time with the first flashes of intuition. Look closely at the stars, look closely at the leaves, and try to find similarities in one way or another.

The signs are never better shown than on quiet days, when apparently nothing special is happening. Be very careful about everything around you. Pay attention to how the wind blows, pay attention to the flight of birds and pay attention to the shape and light of the moon.

Especially, learn to know what to do with what you know. Don't forget God when you see or when you don't see. Evil never changes.

When each individual writes, it is as if they were part of a novel in which the characters are not known, as proof he sees and does not believe, or believes without seeing. Writing is a kind of postman who sometimes reaches the door of the human soul, other times walks in detours, as when it snows heavily and the paths get snowed in. We sometimes slip into writing as if we were running down the stairs, so that we arrive at an otherwise unscheduled and not expected meeting. Yes, writing is like a silence when autumn leaves fall, every moment being watched by God, it is like a mother turning off the light when everyone is home. (Ioana Sarah)

I met someone who ran well. Then I met someone else who ran even better. Then I met someone who was not running at all, was sitting on a bench, quietly, and looking into the distance.

Another day I sat down on a bench. I saw an artist who painted wonderfully. Then I noticed other artists who painted much better than the first. But I'm a runner.

Here is the understanding I give to tonight's thought. No matter what I emphasize, form and content are not always on the same plane. I will learn to be penetrated by a perfect match between part and whole.

I'm listening to a superb song. I've been listening to it since I was little. I will also listen to it in my old age. I will always listen to it, because it reminds me of me, of the past, of the present. And even though I will always listen to it, I will do it differently, just as I am over time. Different.

The song has par excellence the character of a moving whole, vibrant and invigorating, especially if I am the key to a whole universe. And, I know, without this song the universe would have been different, because I am no longer the same.

Only because of this fact I am still looking for myself, hoping to find myself in those musical notes carried by a soul predestined to a special destiny. The way I see the world depends on the kind of content that makes me feel myself, the one I currently am.

The song still mesmerizes me... and the universe still encourages me to get carried away.

I'm watching the night. I'm in the dark. The moon is something small and bright that wants to receive me in its world, but it also leaves me at the sign of the first cloud, giving me the blessing of a hope in the rebirth of a high consciousness. But the autumn night does not care about the light, rather it prefers that state of numbness of the senses, of the spirit, of the sensitivity, to ensure a forgetfulness of oneself and others.

The light of the moon becomes an alliance against darkness and loneliness, a kind of square parenthesis placed next to two vertical points: the bending of the senses and the disturbance of sensitivity due to the illusion of being separated from the whole, separated from the rest of the world, but close to the sacred. It would be said that my breath in the darkness of the night is the rebirth of a feeling called nostalgia, the integral, uncensored version of a thought from another border, from another experience specific to my youth. Of course, that's another story.

So, I am in the middle, between the dense darkness and a part of the story of a light that makes me believe that anything is possible. It is not about the courage to shine in the dark, but about the fact that my spirit is drawn to the denial of an origin that should be discovered. A complicated thing whose meanings I still strive to understand.

The moon still hides in the night when a being seems to seek its own foundations in an enlightenment of the soul. I am no longer myself; I am the one who finds myself outside of everyone.

I read at least one hour every morning. I read non-stop. I warm my mind, or perhaps my mind demands that I be the proof of human endeavor to know the Great All of the world in terms of duality: between content and form, between hidden dream and concrete reality.

And if I read, and read daily, well, this is obvious in the field of art, where every page becomes more than a page, it becomes a stage preceding alchemy, mastering the language written in fiery letters in the vocabulary of a universal language, recording in writing of an observation concerning a certain universal grammar which could constitute a kind of common ground of all languages.

I decided to see and constantly render a well-organized whole, with a pulsation of life story, between truth and challenge. So, here's how I get to the same result: I repeat a certain operation on several lines of code spread in the world of words, and I realize that the only code that matters is, par excellence, the mirage of a possible horizon, but perceived only by the heart.

The artist's eye is the heart of a place full of mysteries, and the artist is a man who deciphers mysteries in steps of words.

I ran about 8 km at the stadium tonight, I especially kept my vitality. In the end I took some pictures with my running friends. Somehow, I felt trapped between two worlds, between no and yes. At first, I was myself, locked in my world, then they were themselves, locked in their world.

I could not help noticing the difference between us, although the difference was a small progress in terms of the accuracy of the actions initiated, the training a little different, but just as intense.

In my world there was the obligatory condition of a spirit enlightened by the ideals of art, which seemed to have programmed a mission to be fulfilled, in search of a perspective of creation or innovation. Or in the world of others, it seemed to be done only to evaluate athletic performance in a context of knowledge sharing and provide practical and relevant examples.

Here's what I understood tonight. An artist always thinks like an artist even when he practices sports, at the same time with the act of having an attitude of loyalty and performance. So, even when you're running, don't forget that you're an artist whose practice ranges from philosophy to leadership roles.

I was in the botanical garden a little earlier. The sun casted a pleasant glow over everything, almost as pleasant as summer. I took about 3 pictures, after which my phone's battery ran out. Overall, it was a meeting with myself, with the sun, with nature, everywhere a slight autumn yellowing.

And I walked, I admired, and I breathed fresh air. Many people. But a strange silence spread all around, as a constraint and a limitation, as if no one was allowed to converse. Just looking was mandatory. The rays of the sun passed through every thought, through every look, through every heart eager to receive energy.

If everywhere the feeling of spiritual satisfaction predominated, a reconciliation with the self, this was due to the artistic intellect and the taste for beauty that sent their sensitive threads to the specific constitution of each thing or each being.

Sometimes the art of being a nice person occurs as a connection between what you feel when you don't run to get attention and what you think about yourself when it becomes possible to be lonely in the crowd.

In the short time left until the end of the year, so much will change in science. You just have to know what to change.

In the short time left, no one knows what will change, humanity is still stuttering, what to change becomes difficult if everything was blown up. There was a good saying; a smart man throws a stone into the water and ten fools can't get it out. Everyone can believe anything and dream away, the statements are in words, and to change reality you need facts, especially since the good deeds are undertaken by the strong, the others are just like when you go to the park and out of immense love you feed the doves....

Every day, regardless of the moment, humanity reads and assimilates new information, otherwise books would no longer be sold and if they were not sold, everyone would write for the relatives who would read. Which would be a kind of "alms" to which you call relatives and acquaintances. In the field of art there are still literary works, writings that enjoy many appreciations, awards and so on... I'm not talking about paintings, but they are also valuable in terms of those who buy them, otherwise a person can die peacefully with many unappreciated works...

What everyone does personally and in the quiet of their home has something to do with art. Art is also when you wash the dishes, knowing that within this activity certain guiding motives dominate, corresponding to the different values of efficiency. Maybe art is when you exhibit or sell works and people step on their feet to buy or see them, it's like when you print books and they sell, people are still looking for them... But at the same time, art depends on the number of people who remember you even after you died: Eminescu, Brâncuși, Nichita, Labiș, Enescu, Grigorescu, Sadoveanu... it would take me until dawn to enumerate all of them... what we simple people do is feed the soul, no matter how much we would struggle ! (Ioana Sarah)

There are two kinds of people:

Those who live only to live, and those who live for the intensity of living transposed into the reality of a fabulous universe.

Some bring change into the world, others never find meaning in the world. Some honor their claim to scientific status too little, others perfect the vision of the universe.

And every time you think you've fooled a world, remember that you didn't know the mystery of the mysteries of the universe.

And every time someone else does the work for you, know that he has a huge gain in understanding the universe.

There are key people who draw the lines of change, and there are people without any God who do not even know how to face their own ignorance.

There are people who live only for luxury, wealth and stability, but they cannot comprehend the vastness of the sky. Only angels have cheap wings, but their wings are always stretched out to the kingdom of heaven

I ran this morning, from 9 o'clock. Through the forest, on the hills. It was a wonderful route, about 12 km. I ran next to other runners, most of us knowing each other very well, especially after so many workouts together. Also, many runners were missing from our group.

It was a normal day for running, the mud seemed very slippery in places, the frost was also prevalent, everything was wet. But the sun winked at us at every step. From 2 degrees the temperature rose to 7 degrees in just an hour and a half. We all felt great, just like when we climbed the mountain in compact groups in the summer.

And here's what I learned this time. Everything comes naturally. Physical strength, endurance, being able to run many kilometers upstream, the will not to give up, these are just a necessary minimum that preserves the opportunity to be part of an unforgettable atmosphere.

Sometimes you lose yourself in your effort to be yourself, absorbing in the direction of your own system of values a deep experience, which originally involves that feeling of the heart to recognize another, distinct, in each of the others. What stands out here is the capacity of consciousness to be sovereign to a collective, living Memory, meant to carry forward a sense of continuity, of the endless beginning.

The message and the image say it all, the only thing remaining is for each one to pass the written thought through the prism of his own understanding.

I walked through the park; I always do that. It was not only peaceful tonight, there was also a kind of peace of mind whose existence I had never known before, suggesting a certain way of my consciousness to open itself to a more restrained world, more withdrawn from the vibration generated by the hustle and bustle of the city. And I continued to walk, slowly, dreamily, thoughtfully, doing everything from an assumption of the condition of the one who dedicated his existence to the universe called "Myself".

I thought of nothing but the silence so eloquent, so solitary, so penetrating, that at one point I thought I was part of a certain section of the "Moonlight Sonata", a strange parallel world, resembling a hypnotic trance. It seemed to me that I was hearing a slow, faint song, with some comforting lyrics, yet so foreign to my personality.

Late autumn spoke to me through the way I looked around: breaking a little from my understanding, because I tried to perceive an emotion that would transpose me to another world, without feeling the emotion of a special moment. The moment to live fully here and now.

I did understand one thing, though. The possibility of immersing myself in the emotion of an experience of silence, in a quiet park, lets the objectivity of a clear and honest vision of human nature dominate. A man cannot know himself better until he meets his natural complement in a form of communication with himself.

Silence is the only intonation expression of the self.

I prefer to be myself, especially when I run, knowing that what makes me a better athlete is the insistence not to present myself in the false position of a person without a strong character. And so, I have long given up certain guiding motives, corresponding to the values of great attraction, with claims of exclusivity, which could highlight too much my sporting qualities.

I'm not a speedster, nor a symbol of endurance in marathon running. The moments in which they appear quite transparent, free to feel at ease, in the bosom of which ordinary life catches the eye only in the pattern of a form of self-expression experienced with the power of artistic sight, are unique through my spiritual faculty of writing, of finding myself in a single story. My story.

Or the pattern of a soul projection that becomes the image of a defining dimension of my personality, is repeated when I run. Only when I remember myself, the one who can restrain one's self, the one who rests mentally by accepting the status of a model of humble thinking.

One error, however, lurks at every step, an unfounded creation, a naturalness devoid of any suggestive force, to any act of self-evolution: that I will never be able to choose for myself the moment when I will become someone else.

Perfection is the value of man who suppresses his tendencies to differentiate.

I try to forget what I don't have to remember. Memories themselves are sometimes a burden, much harder to bear than the possibility of no longer being unique. For it all comes down to the need to forget that I have not always been who I am now, worrying about the importance given to a search for what I have always wanted to become.

An isolated soul faculty, because I have assumed many failures, chimeras, distrust, unclear self-image, unrealistic attitude. Even now my soul makes the agreement between then and now that distinguishes the deep intuition of a cause of emancipation, affirmation, superior patience. No wonder so many times I have made too few appreciative judgments about what is beautiful about me, the world, the universe.

The deep struggle with myself was the pride of controlling my destiny when my soul was ignited by the desire to see that "more special" something in people other than myself.

Probably the ways of seeing that something we look at daily are offered to us by the choice of a version of a self-observation in which the soul is not well enough baked to emerge from the thick fog of confusion... in the light of a never-ending age.

And if you told man to change, he still wouldn't change, ever. Not even change changes man, but rather puts him in another world, in a nebula that has nothing to do with reality.

Such is the man who has no God, he is unchanged, unchanging, and, of course, considerably devoid of character. In this case, it may be nicer to listen to the advice of Marcus Aurelius:

"Nothing is more shameful than the friendship of the wolf: above all else, beware of it."

I always look ahead, but sometimes I forget to look closely, considering that everything that distance has to say is more useful than what proximity has to say. In the case of the original Ego, the situation is completely different. I am perfectly right to analyze myself from a neutral point of view, that is, without the influence of any stabilized view around me, because I do not put pressure on the feeling of belonging to someone.

This thinking is very justified, even emancipated from the rule of the vital sphere of the idea of authentic contact with myself. The self cannot predominantly reach all corners of the world, towards the views of an external authority, in a vast production of perspectives, but it is always recognized close to the depth of a moment experienced through the innocence of unitary orientation.

The self has the quality of being alone. I have to support my state of definition of the experience whose intensity gives value to existence, summarizing my being to its original depth.

I drink hot mint tea at the first infusion. Not only do I drink it, I enjoy it with all my being, as if I were introducing into the body a mysterious cure that promises eternal life. This whole process can designate a certain overlap between the miracle of youth and the devitalization of the end, a chain of simple thoughts between the superior force of the enduring and a momentary reaction against the ephemeral.

Somehow, here and now, I feel immortal. Only tea is to blame, because it shows me that it still retains a character of permanence, an orientation in the sense of sustainability and timelessness, better expressed by an excellent mood, an increased level of energy and a more restful sleep.

Yes, from time to time, even the immortals rest the fatigue of living longer and longer in the present.

But in connection with this I must emphasize something special: the power of tea has no unitary connection with everlasting youth, but relates to an existence that is still rehabilitated by sipping a conversation with myself.

Therefore, tea acquaints me with a profound aspect of the world in which I revolve: everything that manifests itself in agreement with myself must necessarily be immersed in the absorption of an experience that is not similar to another.

Tea makes me feel the experience of a reality that transcends what is transient and that moves only what is not seen.

I was coming back from a run. Many leaves had fallen on the boulevard, many of them torn by the footsteps of passers-by. I picked up a new leaf, looked at it intently, but not through the eyes of an artist, but rather through the eyes of an ordinary man who does not try to discover a hidden meaning in anything around him.

And I looked at the leaf as I walked, quietly, with endless pity, without communicating in any way, without knowing the reasons for the gentleness in our eyes. Somehow, I felt like I was entering the underground of a slowly but inevitably decaying world. And the leaf, as good as it was to people, looked at me with naked eyes, as if it saw in me its own emptiness, disintegration.

And then I understood the message of nature. In everything that deepens my thoughts lies an appearance, something that is different from what it seems at first sight, an appearance that tells me "come on, open up to me, feel my presence in nothingness".

For a moment I interrupted the circuit of my soul in the universe and floated in a gross ignorance of reality, in a soft and lazy entanglement of senses and reason.

Yes, I too am an appearance of the leaves possible to be perceived only through a look of nature thrown on the limits of what is human, on the existential drifts of what is human.

The leaves fall in autumn and are always just as beautiful, reality has subtitles and always fulfills something in our lives, the leaves fall as if in a pleasant silence all the time, some rise when they are trampled as if they were abysses. They look like each other just like dewdrops, you don't have to be an artist to look, the artist lives forever and is unmatched, the rest of us are passing through life. (Ioana Sarah)

I ran about 10 km tonight. But I ran as if I had not run, proving that I am a bridge over the time of an interview given to my soul to be always the same, steadfast in its spiritual communion with God. And this is because in the depths of my nature, of my thoughts, of my feelings, there is that understanding of the writer with the reader.

For all that you have done for me, you, wonderful soul in the most secret caress of a memorable time, I owe you a thousand unimaginable words, but at the same time I owe you an explanation: I want to strengthen my sense of belonging to something greater than myself.

In the world of soul essences, the miracle of making meaning and being coincide, the agreement between form and content, the taste for the independence of a free life, dominate.

This is where understanding lies. No matter how much I tried to run, as well as possible and over long distances, as in any case, whatever form I would give to situations of maximum concentration, the beauty that unties my words still follows my steps towards an unknown target. I am a runner who chooses his words well before impelling his Ego to believe in the impossible.

And the logic of the runner is nothing but the faithful expression of the principle of identity, that is, of agreement with oneself in an open, unhidden way, in an infinity without which life would make no sense. I will always run so that I never leave. To never look. To never be indebted to the rarity of finding the right path to enlightenment.

I will never be discouraged on the road to absolute perfection as a man and as a spirit. I will always run alongside my spirit.

I listen to ENIGMA, because in the middle is something that has always surprised me, inspired me, offered me that something I have always been looking for: a meaning where meaning has suddenly become absent.

More than anything, and always, I resonated with this spiritual project. Another Romanian was the initiator of the Enigma project, another creator, another unsurpassed talent...

I sit in a chair, looking around at everything in my room, including those that cannot be seen with the naked eye, my gaze not being altered by the superficiality of an image-governed world. This is also a kind of comfort, because I can adjust the real and transparent mixture between banality and nobility - in my compensatory dialogue with the inspiration of great poetic and artistic character.

Somehow, I want to feel that I am rising to nobility, not descending to banality. But the chair holds me in one place, like a prisoner of the absurd or of my own devastating anxieties, without being able to advance with my gaze and thought except to the imperishable, which are not seen. And yet, the shape of things rendered through the colors and meanings they have, by combining patterns and sizes, convey a message from ancient times: everything can be arranged and rearranged, in one way or another.

With the obvious predominance of the individualized aspect by the practical sense of a designer, to acquire a new thing means to get rid of another. Should I give up my chair or everything else around me to rethink the way I live, especially the way I perceive the artistic phenomenon?

Clearly. I have to admit my subjectivity. Although everything is aging, dusting and falling apart, I carry in my mind, until exhaustion, the same image of the narrator who, constantly in search of the absolute, exaggerates with too much text the relative and the particular, the apparent and the conjunctural.

The Book Of Creation

On October 23, 2020

Whoever understands the meanings of art and the language of science, understands God's way of thinking.

Sometimes the pen with which I make annotations directly on the book seems to me to write alone. It seems to contribute to my awakening from the reality of the book in which I integrate my soul. It seems to be the common denominator between expression and content. An artist like me identifies with all the tools of his work, and assimilates them as a true creed, then integrates them into the secrets of his self.

The pen and the brush form a whole that contains body and soul, uniting life and death through their magic to create an unparalleled work of art, beyond time and space. What makes the pen express itself through the control of the constructive imagination, forgetting everything that has been said before it, is the very experience of seeing the brush that begins to move based on light, even if the intensity with which it applies colors is from pale to bright red.

Of course, the pen can write freely, invigoratingly, sensitively, in the name of art and the artist, but first he must go on, standing tall for as long as possible without fear of falling. His writing will be perfected during the period when the brush will fulfill its second youth, through discretion and wisdom, considering itself close to the sacred ones, being able to take over the movement of the brush and turn it into a form of concretization of language and highlighting the literary expression that survives too high views.

In the celestial world, both the pen and the brush send rays of light in the form of spirit, influencing the stars from the first to the last page of the story. The artist uses both as an act of honoring God, to perfect his reality without denying himself, but doubling as a being.

I am an exceptional artist because the pen whispered to the brush what to paint, and the brush painted a hand that writes alone, black on white, that I am the subject of the rationality of creation.

The pen asks the brush not to take into account the patterns of a language of classical perfection and rigor, but to highlight the features of the hand that easily leads his writing to universality. The brush took advantage of this opportunity to say that if the pen had been in the foreground of the painting, contained in the hand that writes about the plurality of worlds, then art would have been easier to digest.

Or the pen was not correctly informed by the brush's suggestions to give writing a greater accuracy in the philosophy of art and aesthetic experience, apart from any divine intervention, so as to easily do what was necessary for a painting to gain life through the words experienced in the presence of Creation (springing from effort and soul, from legend and truth).

And so, the artist, the young man who described the landscapes of other worlds in the book of worlds, no longer accurately assessed the pen's ability to transfer imagination to paper and document the invisible in other words, but continued to paint an endless, two-sided mirror as if his hand were the one wielding the brush in the great illusion of reality.

I know that the pen will never claim to belong to the brush, but it will certainly pass on what the brush had to express in vivid and inviting colors.

This is what it means to be an artist, to be able able to treat the brush as the author of a secret manuscript that describes, step by step, the path of existential and artistic truth, and to treat the pen as a manifestation of the acrylic spirit that is expressed only on the easel through the divine way of creating shapes and images.

The nature of the knowledge that an artist demonstrates is in accordance with his degree of reception of the "sensitive beauty" specific to a rose, and this is due to the sensible way of being the angel who knows another angel.

The artist can know the "sensitive beauty" the most, and can make the rose known and loved the most, the more he resembles an angel in nature.

So, materiality must be excluded from the area of aesthetic criteria, by invoking the senses and the mystical thrill, the alterity that cultivates the idea of the artist's fulfillment in his responsible relationship with the beings of nature, in a divine universe.

To capture the connection between a rose and spirituality, a mediator was used, namely a symbol full of deep understanding, the Sign of the Cross.

In turn, the cross being formed by two lines arranged perpendicularly, intersects the field of art and culture at the point where spirituality and painting become a literary composition.

Can a straight line drawn from the representations of art intersect another straight line drawn from a vision of colors at the point where the symbol becomes an experience in revelation?

If so, then I think of myself as a visionary of the spirit of independence in thought, who traverses with a brush through the whole idea of Creation, beyond words and images.

Art is received by the sentient man in accordance with the way of being spiritual. The intention of the senses to take shape through divine intervention requires a special feeling, related to the composition of a delicate painting with the help of a brush full of charm and imagination, which defies the laws of time and space.

Therefore, in order to become an artist, you must be connected with what is sensitive and has the capacity to be captured in a painting whose peculiarity consists in the identity and spiritual resurrection of a mystical thought.

He who feels must be perceived as the essence of an object perceived by the senses, just as only a saint perceives the presence of angels.

When I see something colorful, I perceive the color with the particular reason of a painter who walks his sight through the gardens of heaven. The painter compares the fabulous features in the portraits of his characters with the feelings of a sensitive conscience, just as the reason that God has placed in us compares universal intentions.

The mastery of the painter can be felt through the quality of colors essentially perceived by another sense, that of communion with sacred things, as happens when you see something that can always be seen differently.

I have always imagined that I am a hero of words, able to favor a special artistic vision. The answer of my pen is immediately necessary to the visionary imagination, but at the same time it is shrouded in mystery, because it often resembles a brush that, by mixing color stains, acquires the equivalence of the means of expression of poetry or plasticity (composition, valuation, stylization, generalization, and so on).

The pen must ensure the pictorial transposition of what could have been expressed just as well with the brush strongly influenced by the appearance of a thing in progress rather than that of a finished object.

The force of my vision is modeled in another space, beyond accessible, or accessible only to the gaze that meets at a polyvalent level with a mystical reality. My pen knows this and condenses its mystery of writing beyond ordinary comprehension, but in such a way as to capture the true nature of my being, here and beyond.

Thus, I manage to translate myself into a sacred, parabolic, allegorical writing, foldable on an artistic reality, giving the pen the importance due to a brush that, bypassing the universal laws, opens in the eye of consciousness beyond me, beyond this world. My words are the ink of a life that is not written on paper.

There is a way of writing by which the soul of the pen can be united with the soul of another sensitive body, such as the brush, to which it can administer a real, living, immaterial or spiritual and immortal substance.

In addition, the virtue of this soul is diffused outwards, through a formation of powerful symbols with the help of the UNIVERSAL FLUID, that is, through the act of creation, with the help of the brush. The soul cannot be attracted by matter to give life to a form of exteriorization of artistic beauty, if the pen does not contain the generative virtues of a masterpiece: chromatic chords, expressiveness of plastic language, meanings giving unity, clarity and fluency.

So, if I thought of myself as a pen that runs through the tip of the brush a thread of story, I would probably find it appropriate to analyze my condition as Creator in terms of ambition to exploit the virtues of a highly refined technique: that of creating depth where all the events of life are decanted and all its ideals are projected.

You can't play with science without being yourself an enchanted pen transposed into a colorful, visionary brush that generates the fantastical.

Probably the most remarkable and characteristic manifestation of my art is the acquisition of the pen to feel the brushstrokes in forms of expression of surrealism, conceived as a juxtaposition of two distant realities united to create a new reality.

The visionary effectiveness that enhances the initial powers of the artistic imagination is given by the power of a big brush to highlight the elegance of a brush that masterfully treats the expressions of my soul in an infinite number of universes.

My pen possesses an awareness that I have rarely met before, it possesses an evolved spirit which, if I succeed in mastering it, I will be able to penetrate deeper into the heart of the universe, just as a navigator has a well-calibrated compass at hand and rushes more and more out to sea to discover new shores.

The complementary instrument to the pen is the brush with which the artist moves in the world of oil colors, also having a pure, lucid and subtle spirit, able to complete a lucid vision, an image of space exposed chronologically as science evolves. And the pen and the brush, both so twinned by an artistic language, can make the pure blood of the heart flow into rivers of purple only if they are directed by the "hand that leads chance" to universality. At the same time, they cultivate the taste for visual culture, imposing the tendency towards the monumental and grandiose.

I think that's where I find myself. Like the enchanted candle in the holy chamber of the alchemists, the well-formed eye of the pen sheds its ray of light on a mysterious parchment, anointed with the pure blood of the heart, and at the same time the brush being possessed by the spirit of an artist of sacred writing, will influence the rays reflected on the surface of the easel as, at the same time, the means of expression of the divine soul.

I go even further with this reasoning, saying that the artist takes possession of the soul of the pen to enchant the inventing minds with that incessant flow of blood – burning in demiurgic words, but at the same time the artist delights with the force of the brush to give sensitivity to the commotion his soul is making, as in the case of magic, the crystalline rays of a crystal globe penetrate the hearts of those who understood the art of charm and incantations.

I am not just a unique artist by expressing the space and the way I give life to ideas. I am a pen thirsty for truth, accompanied by a brush inseparable from the strong essences of the artistic imagination. They are a ray of the solar spiritual being accompanied by the light coming from the antithesis of the natural worlds and the man-made ones.

I read at least one hour every morning.

I have learned that every morning is another essential page of a life whose subject is knowledge.

The requirements of a beautiful writing are given by the sense of taste for the art universe that the pen awakens with its uniform breath, a taste that we find in the tactical sense of the brush that cultivates the interest for visual culture.

He who has noticed well, in literature, as in painting, the hand that discreetly paints the space of the story is the same hand that gives the pen the characteristic of the living to transform endlessly, pushing creation further, and gives the brush that fragile serenity of vision with which he meticulously draws his miraculous passing life.

When the pen warms the substance of its unique expression, through imagination, and the brush arches its divine movement on the surface of the easel, then the hand that coordinates them both, depending on how the intermediate environment is affected, has the quality of crossing the space of two artistic realities: the expressiveness of the artistic language and the creative transmission of some emotions.

Of course, a sensitive object does not change the hand that uses it, but it is always touched by a hand sensitive to the vibrations of a deep and very nuanced feeling.

Conclusion: A cold hand will always react in a material way in contact with cold objects, and a sensitive hand will act as a spiritual anesthetic in contact with fragile, sensitive, artistic objects.

To define surrealism, you have to build the image of an artist from the future of a work of art that moves the present with the plasticity of a spontaneous feeling of Deja-Vu.

The future, subordinated to the analysis of the expression of images signed by a virtual reality, moves the work of art of the present towards the plasticity of an authentic expression, metaphorizing in a score of epic memory.

If you can, build your image from the sense of freedom that surrealism gives, thinking of your memory as a combination of all the predominant artistic elements in a time that unfolds continuously, like a wheel of existence in the Ring of the Universe.

An entire personal promotion strategy is a construction of the image of the present made by an artist of the future.

The present is made from the personal promotion of an artist who builds the image of the future from the directing movements of the plasticity of his paintings.

There are so many people who have discovered the sacred things only with the help of their eyes, but have not been able to dominate them with the spirit. Others always pass by carelessly, and most do not know what to do with them.

Holy things are too holy even for the saints who sanctify the icons.

The fundamental property of a pen is this: by any touch of the sheet of paper it can shape at least one word. And the fundamental property of a brush is to highlight with the help of color the essential elements of an image.

Basically, it is useless to know how to use the word if you do not know how to link the color to a vision or a memory, so as to touch the subject of a Creation full of story and mystery.

Likewise, the talent of a writer intersects with the talent of a painter to the point where the pen can mimic a brush in the sense that each word can hide a feeling or can retain the monopoly of a color that he feels is consistent in promoting an image.

Let's try to draw with various words a rose whose colors surpass in meaning the legibility of a well-written, relevant and precious content.

In this case, the wording must equal the softness of the brush, through the tenderness and sensitivity of the sensitive hand of an artist who rekindles the divine spark inside and seeks harmony in lyricism, in the mystery of nature.

So, we can say that drawing is a word that the artist expresses in the form of color with the help of the brush.

To be an artist means to paint everything in words, taking into account the fact that any word is the expression of a form of devotion to fluency, originality, inspiration, specific to a personality that has become a symbol of an assumption of nature "sub specie interioritatis".

My pen seems to be driven by my visionary and polyvalent imagination towards forms of expression that herald the image of the "Renaissance" in a new, flourishing world. And if this happens at the suggestion of the graceful brush, which aims to model an image from another world, in a futuristic space, it means that we have fulfilled a Christian duty.

Probably, the symbolism of a good Christian is the quality of the pen to be transposed into a brush that can give a lot of color in a clearly surreal composition.

A connoisseur knows how to unite an object with the matter of a body, just as the painter knows how to unite color with the deep expression of a true feeling. As such, in art, the natural way of being of an object must be understood as a physical way of being of a form.

To know how to receive a form immaterially means to put the feeling in a color that does not change the state of use of the object (or its state of rest), but makes it different.

I wake up every morning at the same time. I don't know why this is happening, I never set the alarm. I think it's the sun that lights up my room with a smile so wide that it fills me with energy. Then I start reading, and I don't get out of bed until I read for at least an hour.

I conclude: it is important to be enlightened in order to wake up, and you must be awake before you are a learned person.

I learned from books that I don't have to read much to write well.

More important than reading a lot is writing as much as possible.

The talented artist will never be a product of the teaching brought by the school, but will rather be a product of creative work.

Two spirits dwell in me. The first is characterized by the tendency towards unity, the other is characterized by the tendency towards multiplicity. The first is reason, the other is life. The first calms down, the other stirs.

As far as art is concerned, even if this is how alterity is achieved, I believe that I am the common expression of the two spirits, that is, they are nothing but two clearly opposite conceptions of a spiritual being on a magnificent journey called the "Science of Living Through the Other".

There is a very obvious connection between me and the bringing of art to life, so obvious that the style I have adopted re-edits the intimate features of the Renaissance.

The Renaissance itself is largely connected with the persistence with which my spirit surfaces in different eras, wearing various forms of visual expression.

My style retains a permanent specific character.

See beauty in a universe of stars that deserves its place in the book of a life full of meaning.

The book of life deserves 5 stars if it considers the conceptualization of natural beauty.

My writing speaks about a charming character who lives in two worlds, that of Hauff and that of Andersen.

Writing itself traverses these worlds, from mirror to reflection, and does not stop until it finds its balance between the Philosopher's Stone and the Secret Doctrine, so that the newly shaped character seems to have the quality of a creator embraced by the bliss of the Renaissance.

I am identical with the impulses that lead to what is called in art: "Imperceptible Beauty" and "Expansive Reflection".

I'm reading a book written by John Grisham. The important thing is for the world to remain loyal to the way I describe it. I'm a brilliant director.

I will write a book with famous quotes. First quote: Celebrity is the sum of the words that make up my name. Do I still need to introduce myself?

I am reading a story written with a divine soul. Words begin to be part of me, of my story, even if my life is different from the life of the one in the story.

The words are to blame. They are hypostases of the manifestation of my spirit in the matter of a simultaneous universe that applies to the ALL ONE and to the Unique ALL IN ALL.

The existence of my creation is so insistently demanded by science that I call it "Light", from a spiritual standpoint. Therefore, art, like science, manifests itself in everything that is differentiated by the purification done in spirit of Eternal Cause.

Only the keen eye of a clairvoyant sees light where the normal eye perceives only darkness.

You learn something new from people every day, and you are never determined what to do with what you have learned from them.

You better let everything be lost, so that you don't get lost in order to satisfy your curiosity.

A connoisseur knows why a thing can have one form or another, different from its original form. The way in which this can be interpreted, from the empirical point of view of the knower, depends on his quality of being simultaneously in six complementary dimensions: in heaven and on earth, in matter and illusion, in art and in the artistic mentality.

The connoisseur can traverse the substance of the object in the same way that the brush crosses each point of the canvas, with different colors, from one side to the other of the frame. The connoisseur considers how to be the intellect of that object himself.

A connoisseur has acquired the knowledge necessary to change the form of things, all the more so since he knows how to observe in detail the difference between their "essence" and "nature". In fact, the parallel between the knower and things must be made simultaneously with the distinction between "essence" and "nature".

I am a connoisseur because my essence is in the nature of things that change their form due to the object of thought that I produce myself.

Each character in my work has the symbol of a spiritual attribute, which resides in the periodic appearance of man in two distinct worlds. An earthly one, that of the rose, and an artistic one, that of the artist.

The experience of the soul unites them both, and unites them through the concept of writing and thinking, interpreted as a visionary movement, crystallized in a separate science that touches all existences.

The pen with which we take notes or write, sometimes saves us, for the simple fact that after writing beautifully we ourselves shine in front of us. In writing we reread our own reflection in thoughts. Maybe the things I never exposed are like a wood-burning stove and, being dark, pictures are drawn on the ceiling, the quinces are sitting on the window and waiting to be tasted. Everything smells like memories when we write...

It's easy to read in general, some people read on the street, for the simple reason: why have a bad memory in your free time and a good one when you borrow books? We explore the time depending on the situation, it is a postcard that we send daily, especially in the morning...

Every day you become better and more valuable. Much better and more valuable than you ever thought you would become.

Every day we all become simpler and more accessible, the good words we receive are like love letters, we never have the strength to do without them...

A flower says a lot through its perfume, and if you don't smell the perfume, it doesn't mean that you don't like the flower... but just that its beauty is so attractive, that sometimes you forget to look inside it.

Small steps, one today, another tomorrow, can turn into a huge step in 15 years. The skilled man is the one who took a huge step with the help of small steps.

Vanity is a tree with too many multicolored leaves, but with fragile roots.

Learn to grow with strong roots, rather than colorful.

My art is a chapter independent of the genres of beauty, in that everything that seems beautiful to others is for me just a strain on the feeling of total freedom that leads to the quality of being a Creator.

It is no less true that my art defines itself as an "expression of the self" loaded with the potential to reveal a world transfigured into a work of art.

The quality of being a Creator emanates from your attitude towards the effects of science.

The longest story of Creation is the fulfillment of the science of being a science yourself.

You cannot broaden your horizons of knowledge without looking at the world as a bee that produces honey from nectar.

Look at yourself as a flower would look at you: through the eyes of a bee.

At first there was chaos. Things were beginning to connect, but in a rather twisted and even strange way. Then the order followed. Things began to be arranged, measured, and interpreted in such a way that they made sense.

I think that the final form of artistic writing results, in fact, from the various nuances of grace with which you make things come to light out of darkness.

Every morning is like the snow that falls at night when we sleep. We wake up and every day we step on a new day like we would on snow, sometimes the wind blows and snow spreads in front of us, other times it's like reading the best book in town, possibly bought from an antique shop. On that day, maybe someone reads a weather newspaper on a train. Maybe he doesn't know how to get off the train to look like it's in a short story written by Balzac (he was asleep at 6 o'clock, woke up at 12 o'clock at night and then wrote for the remaining 18 hours).

Don't wait until everything is perfect. It's like buying a lottery ticket and putting all your hopes into Sunday's draw.
Waiting for everything to be perfect is like stepping forward with your right foot. Buying a lottery ticket is like writing a letter that you never send, luck at gambling is blind luck, to have it you don't need it...

A tip for all children: learn as best you can. But at least one of those who will not learn anything at school, will reach above all.

I wish upon all students that just started school that none of them learns how I "learned". However, I would be interested in the single one that resembles me.

It's not worth fighting in a war that doesn't deserve its victory.

It is better to obtain a victory without fighting at all.

There are great people who know what they want even when they have nothing.
And there are people out of nowhere who don't know what they want, even when they have everything.

I reflect every morning on yesterday. What did I lose sight of? Why did this happen, and not otherwise? What is the measure of the things I valued? Etc...

This is the process of true thinking: do not give up what you did yesterday, even if today becomes tomorrow. Realize this truth: nothing remains unchanged, or in the same state.

A catalyst for reflection could be this: what you see now you will never forget.

A star sets because it is no longer able to illuminate.
The universe prefers intensities in order to better understand its depths.

A crumbling castle is like a lost soul: you can't know why they both retreat into oblivion, but you can feel the deep meaning of their solidarity.

Surrealism is the freedom of expression that the creator gives himself, although it is on the border between the inner world and the outer world, it cannot be marked exactly, but it seems so real. It's truly real if you start seeing it as imaginary. (Ioana Sarah)

The brush and the pen come to life in a room inhabited by a man who is always unhappy to the point of confusion, everything that the creator shows on the outside is like writing an epistle. Whoever creates something is like paying for his own pleasure. And the ink with which someone writes and the colors of one who paints are a kind of balance, otherwise the seasons would be hard to bear. (Ioana Sarah)

A cold hand is like a theatrical performance. Sometimes the pen is powerless and sad, as if projecting the sky when the clouds are gathered and it is going to rain. And the brush is like a faint postcard in which women's voices are heard. The hand is a terrible impatience that for the creator, if he didn't have it, would be the smallest thing... it would be like a letter sent on Saturday when people are not at work... (Ioana Sarah)

Some people understood that 2 + 2 = 4. But they did not understand why, first of all, it was 1 + 1 = 2. And they didn't understand the rest of the math behind physics and chemistry.

Some people understand a lot and don't feel as much, some know from math that there are only 4 seasons and they invent the fifth one in an autumn when the sun's rays draw shadows on the walls through the leaves that do not come off the branches so easily, some bloom frozen as a demonstration against a law of physics about gravitational attraction. Last but not least, some people understand chemistry from words and pass it on in feelings, feelings that mathematics does not talk about. (Ioana Sarah)

The pen when it starts to leave marks on the paper has a special clarity. It builds everything with the care of one who carves wood, framing in mystical connections special letters that lead to the birth of words, then shines through objectivity. While the brush is like an exterior author, it has a liking, if I may say so, for colors. Both the pen and the brush thus combine everything that a creator can give, as if he were an aesthetic reality taken to the absolute, as if he were a sky full of clouds waiting to rain.

The artist, however, has his clumsiness, whether he expresses himself with the help of a brush or pen, he expresses himself through subjectivity, he possesses everything with romance, he discerns the obscurities of the soul, ascending through creation somewhere above them. He is a contemplative and always has a fear, whether or not existence must be rendered with a critical sense. (Ioana Sarah)

Whether we use the pen or the brush, the artist's temperament manifests itself in an appropriate plan, thus being caught romantic or enthusiastic, rudimentary or utopian, always serious, depending on the times he experiences. The artist driven by a real and generous attitude, turning work into an ideal. Everything acquires an immense significance; he uses the spirit of discernment by establishing a graduation of the events that thus become values. The one who creates with a pen or brush does a job as if he were building. From his work all sorts of teachings unfold one by one. He becomes a master, with a remarkable finesse of symbol. The present becomes too small as if one were seeking refuge in the past...

The creator is put in a position to think seriously about all the hardships of life, thus seeking answers with serious solemnity. Sensitivity exists in a way that forces you to react to all of this from the outside. (Ioana Sarah)

The Book of Sand

On August 28, 2020

Do not try to be different than you are, because anything different does not bear the fruit of one who remains the same.

Dear reader, I wrote these lines for you, with a lot of feeling, with a lot of sincerity, but also with imagination, as if I had written for myself only about myself, pointing to a man transposed into a multitude of souls, foreign to him... and yet none like him. I wrapped the lines in a sand book, full of words as penetrating as the sun's rays, as a continuation of the volume of the famous Jorge Luis Borges.

Every year, when I get to Mamaia, on the Romanian coast, I step on the sand so full of shells that have probably been in a pile of other dead shells for a long time. Only children pay attention to them. I listen to what the waves, the wind and the seagulls have to say, with the hope that I will be a little wiser at least with a second of amazement and understanding to the vastness of a sea that stretches forever, and that devours some for a harsher reality. You will notice that my eyes run to a sky colored in red or orange, so endless as in a book full of dreams about the lessons of life seen all the time on the other side of the sea.

Maybe you will find yourself in my thoughts, maybe you will find yourself in the free spirit of the dialogue between sand and sea, a dialogue that a painting artist has with his Ego, and so maybe you will feel free from the nets of the outside world and the worries of all kinds. They are not thoughts about leadership, as you might want to find in a chest full of business ideas, but about the life on which a certain science bases its entire scaffolding of reasoning. It is the science of being yourself a battlefield for two terrible opponents: the man and the photographer. It is the science of being a good listener of the turmoil of the sea, with the feeling that you have arrived there, in a place where regrets, tears, are full of echoes of the past, repeated like a sad call: "Where are you? Don't leave ! "

And even if you don't reach the sea and you don't touch the sand I'm stepping on right now, and you don't feel the breeze of a memory, the square in the beautiful summer, or the breeze of a whisper that promises you love and self-peace, I'm sure all my thoughts, set forth below with the echo of a centuries-old history, will reach you and caress your soul as Borges did in his "Sand Book".

Far be it from me to approach a subjectivist point of view, and in this way relativism. On the contrary, I believe that thoughts, in general, have a transferable validity: they always start from a grain of sand and reach an increasingly transparent sea as you get to know the breeze, the secrets, the tenderness, or even the pain.

I do not think that a writer like Borges intended to reduce subjectivity to a mere passive mirror of the objective world. Even the sun, when it warms the sand and softens the waves, does not reduce its size whenever a cloud tries to capture its heat, but only when it sets. For me, Borges is the sand mirrored by the sun, seen deep enough in a crystalline sea that finds its solemnity in the view of the sunset.

Leadership: Can you build an admirable vision of everything around you, in nature, and at the same time regain power over your entire life?

It is so easy for me to write about art that writing considers me its outer Self.

The art of writing is a painting made up only of words that do not stop missing you.

The beauty that acquaints you with the deep aspect of art is given by the feeling of an intense experience to which nature worships the sublime peace.

All the meanings of this world are the meanings of lives illuminated by the same sun.

And if you tried to drag your understanding to the light of the sun, you might understand life as a pride of light to creep into everyone's eyes.

The beauty of a rose is rendered by the color that the artist spreads on the canvas with his brush.

The most precious easel on which you can lay the vivid colors of roses is a manifesto of freedom of expression through well-felt words.

The fundamental feature of a work of art is to fully maintain the validity of your depth in your absence.

A portrait painted in the middle of nature is a work of art in which the whole agreement between yourself and the variety in unity is manifested.

I enjoyed a cold Cooler, and I feel trapped between sea and ice cream. Cooler is now in my body, it's part of me.

As it seems to me, the kind of form depends on the kind of content. The object described by me is a way to express myself more easily.

A spacious land boat with a small mast. Looks good. Sometimes a man takes a selfie with her. Maybe he imagines that he has Columbus' miniature ship with him, and that he has discovered a new continent after a long journey.

Of course, this is thought-provoking. The intimacy of any dreamy soul is reflected in the fragments of time dominated and stopped instead by great conquerors.

We need the temptation of time stopped instead to sail further and further, with the spirit, to the glory of greatness.

The actions of the sea can be animated by various waves. They are admirable even when you build sand castles on the shore, insofar as you refer to the criterion of a "Solid Whole"

It doesn't matter how durable or fragile your castle is, it matters what you do to make the waves of the sea part of your story.

It's so easy to read the people who have nothing but white pages in their lives.

Some lives claim the contents of a book that was never written.

The sand is not carried away by the waves of the sea, it always remains close to the shore.

The scientist believes in miracles, but he has nerves of steel.

No matter how strong the closeness between me and the sea, only the distance highlights our common sides.

I'm trying to feel the deck chair I'm lying on. It certainly feels me, and it feels everything inside me, every vibration, every gesture, my breath, my heartbeat.

Creation is a mixture or fusion of the animated object and the artist's satisfaction to relate to the world of thoughts inside a microcosm.

I gather a few small shells from the sand, place them next to the book I enjoy reading, looking at them as missing pages that I have to fill in with my points of view.

A writer is not content only to extract the essentiality of different fragments from a living reality, he tends to assemble them in the space of an imagined objectivity.

The hotel where I am staying is yellow. The sun best reflects yellow.

The sand on the beach is gray. And it doesn't care about its color or the color of the hotel I'm staying at. It only knows this: "The hotel is made of me, and of the sea water."

When you look at something, do not turn your attention to the objective side of beauty. Rather, turn your attention to its subjective interiority.

My sandals were filled with sand. But the wind did not blow at all, nor did the children play with the sand, nor did I throw sand at them. It seems like an enigma worthy of Sherlock Holmes.

It is clear, therefore, in this case I am dealing with the tendency to see everything through the prism of the truth: I seek to detach the sides through which it attaches itself to other phenomena.

An ant climbs on my foot, among the grains of sand that cover me, as if searching for the secret corridor that leads to another world. I think the brave little girl relates to the action in the movie "Prince of Persia (The sands of time)".

Only a fiction artist can capture a given objective and at the same time reflect on subjectivity.

A wealthier old man next to my restaurant table was very excited last night because he was found negative on a repeat of the coronavirus test.

The man who does not relate to science is happy to have gained a few more days of life. The scientist rejoices that he has succeeded in prolonging his life in immortality through science.

Only the painter can enliven the image of the sea with the artistic representation of his legend.

The sea cannot always give the portrait that the artist makes of himself.

But the artist can enliven its image with that loving state updated in every moment by his presence.

If the sand is made of the matter of the celestial bodies, by which all things are described and signified, then its defiance will remove any evidence of the celestial origin.

The perfection of the sea is observed in the fineness that generates the texture of the sand.

And the sand is all the finer as its fineness reminds of the transparency of the sea.

The sea must not be sought in the material nature of the sand, but in the fineness that governs its nature.

To do so many things with the little you have, just as the hours pass in an hourglass filled with so little sand.

While the sand shows us what the sea brings, the sea shows us what the sand lacks.

So is the man who seeks himself. What it lacks is that quality of sand to be one with the sea.

In front of the sea that embraces the sand, and in front of the sand that beautifies the sea, I feel a certain pleasure, not because I relate them to me, but because they are as they are.

And how different I am, than to my liking.

The phone battery discharges exactly when I intend to take my most expressive selfie.

There is an identity relationship here between subjectivity and objectivity. What I hope will turn out wonderful, does not necessarily have to come out wonderful, but maybe, through a miracle. A wonderful miracle.

A lady walks among the sunbeds, constantly repeating: "we have seashells, stars".

It's true, her shells and stars are bigger and more beautiful than the small and chipped ones around me, through the sand.

The essential difference, from which reside the other differences, is the way in which the intrinsic meaning of time is constituted, which modifies them all until it makes them unrecognizable.

I'm reading a book about the "logic of beauty". The wind ruffles my pages.

I have to find a correspondence between thinking and the experience of losing sight of a page. This is the beauty of discerning a lost reality.

Science is always where art is, just as the sea is always where sand is.

I feel at ease. I am not out in the middle of a sea that is only rarely clear, but out in the middle of a sand that has lost its hourglass.

Every approach to myself is the part of a sea that penetrates the land.

I notice a man arranging his airbed in all possible ways, depending on the sun.

The sea looks at it as the sand feels: with the doubt that makes it difficult for us to live on a land that orbits the sun.

Wait until chance smiles upon you.

Wait until the sea recedes its waves.

Long life is like a wave that keeps hitting the shore: it is lived continuously by the force of a nebulous and relentless destiny.

There are people who will never commit sins. The church is their religion, the bible is their creed. God's word is a harsh law.

Like when you put your foot in the sea water. You feel very cold at first, the waves make you shiver. But as you advance under the scorching sun, the sea water gets warmer, even inviting you to bathe. And the adventure continues...

I sometimes thought I was the hot summer sand. I thought I was the sea in the storm at the beginning of winter. I imagined that it is the poetry of the blood that makes the heart beat strongly in the rhythm of romance.

If I think about it, no imagination can be hidden in a chest, and then the chest will be thrown in the middle of the sea, and the sea will bring it to shore, and the sand will keep it intact just for you.

Because it seems to the imagination that someone will pay special attention to them, like a real treasure, not knowing how much they drift or how much they dry themselves inconsolable on land.

If you think you are in control of a situation, try to swim out to sea.

Do you think chance is on your side? Then a dolphin is waiting to save you.

Do you really believe in God? Then say your last prayer.

Last night I saw a ragged, dirty guy, poor man. If, however, you looked at him more closely, with curious eyes that know how to see in the dark, you might have noticed the two big rings on his left hand, and about three more rings on his right hand.

The sea always retreats when it reaches the shore, it does not advance too far, for who knows what treasures more valuable than hers can be found on land. Treasures hidden from view, belonging to such poor beings.

I remember what was written at the entrance of an Asian restaurant, Genghis Khan's quote:

"If you had not committed such great sins, God would not have sent such a punishment upon you."

When you look for something, some divine particles move much faster and farther than your thoughts, in some directions helpful for the discovery of an answer.

They do not find the answer in your stead, but they lead you to an area where you can choose the answer from several possible variants, taken at random.

These divine particles provide you with some keys that you must prove to several padlocks before you can find the right one.

I asked the sea to wash me with the fineness with which the sand caresses me.

Eventually I will still have to use the towel, not to wipe myself with sand or water, but to remember their fine caress.

Beautiful is not the sublime of experiencing the spell of the sea, sublime is the spell of the sea that guarantees a timeless existence.

The sea cannot eliminate the term ‘beauty' to replace it with the term memory, but it can accept itself as a sublime aspiration towards the image of our life through which we pass from one shore to another.

I don't know what VIP was celebrating his birthday last night at a restaurant on the beach. Special guests, special moments, enthusiasm, fireworks, etc.

In the morning I watched the sea touch the sand. And it touched it as if you were touching a velvet flower, there were no waves, there was no wind, but only a mysterious silence, a fragile warmth.

I understood then that the mornings remind me of myself, and the nights remind me of the moments when the sand and the sea failed to extinguish from their hearts the longing for peace.

I've met people everywhere who know all that can be known. I also met a lot of people who know nothing.

The sea looks at the sand without impoverishing the giver, and cannot give him what he has already received.

The sea cannot count the grains of sand, but it can feel its warmth, its deep longings, its impulse to search for the beauty of the story, as if it had always known it.

I have met so many people, and I have always known that I am between the sea and the sand.

He who does not have the audacity to draw with his senses some rational lines from the sky to the depths of the sea, lacks the prudence to think in terms of depth and horizon.

The sea is an exhibition of the idea of beauty, because it contains the image of sand described with artistic finesse.

What you expose through an artistic idea is what you render by amplifying the harmony between the unchanging and the persistent.

Sand is the science of encompassing the depths of the sea, just as aesthetics is a science of beauty.

The sand speaks to me in the voice with which the sea expresses itself: my unsurpassed beauty is natural and artistic at the same time.

Because the artist can experience the harmony between silence and the hot explosion of life, and can include it in the image of a single age.

If you start a book and don't finish it, it's like turning the hourglass before all the sand flows to the end.

You will find the mystery of the book in the last grain of sand that did not flow, and that only your time stopped in its place.

If Borges searched for the sand to reach the sea, I found the sand as an extension of the sea.

Borges finally found the sand as a memory of the sea, wrapped it in sweet words and turned it into a book.

I found the sand as soft as the sea breeze, I wrapped it in the cup of such expressive hands, I made him feel their caress, their delicate smell and their warmth, which flooded him and drove his senses mad.

Borges would envy me for my artful words, I still envy him because he managed to turn the sea into such fine sand.

A warm nature remains warm. A cold nature remains cold.

The sea remains the sea. The sand remains sand.

The nights and days spent on the seaside are like the sea and the sand: it invites you to total delight and relaxation.

Make yourself a watch, but don't show me the time. Or show me the time, but tell me your cogs aren't oiled

Whoever can turn sand into stones can also turn the sea into dew.

As warm as the sea water is, it suits you to swim ahead.

So is the soul. The more it is in a comfort zone, the more it longs for freedom.

If you want to find out something interesting about sand, read Borges.

If you want to understand Borges, first read what I have to say about sand.

I'm looking at a guy's T-shirt. And I say to myself: for a fiction writer the most spectacular thing is to not believe in ghosts. But to be a Phantom.

I'm sitting under a big umbrella. The umbrella sits on endless sand, protecting me from the scorching sun.

I would like my stay at sea to not end. I feel safe from old age.

Ask the sand if it has wisdom. Ask the sea if it has wisdom.

Then you answer in their place.

That is wisdom.

If God changes your plans, it is to learn not to trust yourself more than Him.

Watch the moon make the waves rise at night. But in the morning, the sun calms the waves, because the sun is stronger than the moon.

The result of the will of the sea waves is the stubbornness of the shore to protect its sands.

When you make your plans, do it with all your heart. Otherwise God will change them for you rightly.

Watch the sea swell its waves. But all the waves subside as they hit the shore.

When I look around, I choose anything at random.

I ask the sand if everything around it belongs to it. It tells me that everything belongs to the sea.

I ask the sea, and it says that everything around belongs to the sand.

Understand me, if you can, between the sand and the sea, and look at me as a matter of chance.

In this way you will be able to accept the possibility of the unusual in the experience of a Christian artist.

If I were to write about sand every day, and if the sea would read my writings, then my pen would seem as mysterious and fascinating as a character out of a novel.

When you write about sand you have to imagine that you are the sea.

When you want to make sense of your words, you have to imagine the sea as an accumulation of sand.

"And I will open my voice and my soul before your infinity," replied the sand.

If I were to listen to a shell, I would probably hear the echo of the distance between the sea and its memory.

Memories are shells that always tell you about something that was part of your life.

Sandy words are emotions melted by the sun's rays.

Emotions should not be expressed in words, but in warm touches.

I look at the sea. A boat is moving further and further away from the shore. The sand asks me why I look at the sea in the distance, if it is so close to me.

I replied: Because someone who always wants to be seen is deprived of that starting of the mind to follow the path of self-liberation.

The art of being sand is created from the silence of a mind that has not known the temptation of the waves.

People who do not have the courage are the traitors of tomorrow.

The sea envies the sand because only it is useful in an hourglass, so it stops on the shore for it to get really hot.

I will return to the depths of your thoughts only if you give the sand a chance to walk barefoot in a boundless sea.

Sand and sea are always softened by heat.

If you want to feel the waves of the sea on your skin, don't wait until you dry completely on the sand.

The message of the sea is like that whisper of forgetfulness that the wind addresses to the sand: remain unchanged.

The sand waits for the sea with open arms to cool it, and the sea barely touches it, because it immediately retreats to the open sea.

In the same way, the distance creates new horizons and reunites fragments forgotten by time. Time brings the sand and the sea closer, but more by remembering the desire to support each other.

Infinity is found in a simple grain of sand. Because each grain sits next to the other grains, it forms the sand, which is next to the sea, and from their fusion castles are made.

The castles are imposing, because they remind me of sand and water, because without them they could not have existed either. That is why castles are so rarely built on the shore, precisely because the sea does not turn them back into sand.

Because the sea does not like anyone to abuse its sands.

I notice a man watching the sea from the shore, but not entering it.

Maybe the sea also observes him, but it doesn't observe me as I observe it. And that's why many of us are good observers, but we keep our distance between horizons and landmarks.

Be careful. Watch constantly. Today's joy can stop tomorrow's unhappiness.

Even the sea, when it hits the shore, does not think of the sand castles on the shore. That is why it is said that the sea is cold and the sand is warm. And that's why the sea is often troubled, because it hurts a lot when people prefer warm sand to cold stretches, without limits and without landmarks.

If you do not accept the chance when she smiles at you, then you will have to fight hard to regain it.

The sea will not be as welcoming as the sand, especially if the sand is not satisfied with the blue of the sea, nor with the horizon of dream memories, nor with the sunsets, nor with the castles on the shore.

The power of your words will turn against your courage, just as the sea recedes into the sea and the beaches rise.

Choose your words well before you test your strength of mind, taking into account that the sea rises above the sand, but it cannot fully comprehend it, and that is why it returns to the sea.

The sea does not know the depths of the human soul, but it longs for souls lost in oblivion.

Sincerity and courage are the conditions of God's forgiveness.

The sea never forgets the shore, because the sand shelters the deep silence of the souls lost in it.

Heaven always leads your steps where his will is, and where it is best for you.

Do not try to abandon the heat of the sand for the cold of the sea.

The sand fixes in the knowing spirit the signs of a time that can be understood only by the infinity of small mass particles.

If in spiritual things the sand is made up of the sea, then there is an understanding between silence and storm.

Look with your soul for the traces of time left on the expanse of sand.

Even if the sand forgets the souls that the sea brought to the shore.

The sand knows that the time will never be right to house everything.

It shelters everything without thinking about time.

Try to perceive the power of time according to the ability of an hourglass to encompass an unlimited number of grains of sand.

Man does everything by himself, believing everything will happen according to his will. But forgets that above the earth is the will of Heaven, and any forgetfulness will be rewarded with new life lessons.

So too the steps on the sand. They leave no traces for the next day, just because you want to leave a mark.

And if you don't understand this beforehand, you will only understand when time has passed.

Lucky people attract luck just as bad luck attracts bad luck, just as sand attracts the sea, but it can't keep up.

Happy people go to church and come back happy. Unhappy people go to church, they come back unhappy, but with the hope of a future happiness.

And the desert doesn't change its sand just because you took a trip to the pyramids and saw the Sphinx.

Likewise, people do not change their nature just because they have been to church or visited the pyramids. And heaven knows this better than anyone.

Sand teaches you how to gain the solar power of all things, by dividing matter into particles as small as possible.

If you could gather all the sun's rays into a single grain of sand, and it would turn into excruciating heat, then you would know how to reduce the elements of one order to the elements of another order.

The sand has a quality that is very reminiscent of the soul: it is burning and malleable at the same time.

To make an altar of the soul from the molded forms of sand.

The sand and the sea bring people very close together, or separate them for good.

Be a sea full of story, not a sand full of dust.

Strengthen your spirit with a single glance in the direction of a desert that never ends its sand.

Stick your ear to the sand and you will listen to the silence of the empty desert.

A glance at the brightness of the sea is the connection between a verse full of emotions and the power of values to love the sand.

The sand, the scorching sun, reminds me of the most important lesson of the desert:

"The last mystery is courage."

Any other shortcut won't get you anywhere. The desert doesn't care about words...

The sand teaches you that you know nothing about life. You don't even know how to leave a trail. The wind will cover it the next day.

Only the sand remains forever. And the sea.

The sand denotes a certain peace, a consent of the mind. It listens to everything without retaliating.

Calm your mind before you open your mouth. Be sand before being a tumultuous sea.

Every grain of sand is lifted by the wind, so don't imagine that you have control over events, or over chance.

The desert, look at it as an image of your virtue of being part of a boundless world full of secrets.

The sand cannot ignore the power of the fineness of vulnerable points of the soul hosted by the memory of time.

You cannot comprehend the immensity of the desert, but you can delight your mind and spirit by looking at it as an image of the virtue of enduring everything gently.

He who is inspired by the infinity of the desert will turn himself into sand.

Every night a shooting star goes out and often no one notices.

A single pebble can start an avalanche.

A single flutter of a butterfly's wings can cause a hurricane on the other side of the globe.

One word, said at a time, can decisively change the trajectory of any destiny.

Something completely insignificant can always become decisive. That's how the universe works. Learn to pay attention to small thoughts that can influence big deeds.

A look captured by the brightness of the sea reflected by the sun is the connection between a verse full of emotions and the power of the waves to fall in love with the sand.

The words that express the brightness of my sand are more mysterious and finer than the sand on the seabed.

One day I will write a sand book, calmer than Borges' troubled version.

Strengthen your artist spirit by simply looking at the expanse of a sea that penetrates the interior of the land.

An artist's eyes look at every grain of sand with the eyes they see in the depths of their hearts.

The sand contains a natural life that is given to it by the sun. The change in its texture converges in other types of energies, just as the rays are reflected in thousands of directions.

The sand has a quality that is very reminiscent of the soul: it is burning and malleable at the same time.

Sand teaches you how to prove solar power over all things, by dividing matter into as small of particles as possible.

An artist of the word seeks with his soul the traces of the sand left on the bottom of the sea.

The penetrating gaze of time perceives the expanse of the sea more deeply.

To prove that it is possible to reach an agreement between sand and sun, so that from their union the symbolic moment of igniting a flame emerges.

To pursue the touch of the sand with the voice of a poet and to transform it into a poetry of the time honored by the greatness and freedom of the desert.

The most subtle spirit of dreaming is manifested by simply touching the sand with the tenacity to overcome the harshness of the desert.

The language of the sand sifted through the prime meaning of the word "dreaming" has the great virtue of communicating to you through sublime words the desire for a new knowledge.

I understood why the sand accepts to be trampled, because it wants to be completed by vivid and strong soul sensibilities.

A positive mood is an extension of the hot sand you step on without fear of being burned.

Seek to present yourself before God as imperfect, even if what sustains your power to become a saint is perfection.

God is perfection spread in imperfection, beyond the perfection given by the power to transform man into a saint.

A seagull is constantly looking at me. Does it see me as prey? Does it see me as a fish? A big fish on land? Let's be honest, A magnificent feast !

Of course, any comparison has its own logic. Nothing around us can constitute a completely isolated and independent entity, but it is always linked to a truth that is part of the understanding of each of us.

I look at the sand. I try to visually cover each grain of sand separately. I try to name each of them. I'm trying to assign them a number. I try to differentiate them through an expression of kindness, courage and determination. Why is one more beautiful than the other?

I think that the sand imposes itself as a whole, which means an initial whole and a totalization of fragments full of correspondence between what you observe and what you deduce from your observations. I deduce that I am a grain of sand, only if I separate from it.

The intimacy of a soul is reflected in the fragments of time that spring from places where no one has yet stepped. People have the gift of disturbing the waters they pass, just like an innocent child throwing a stone at the water in the summer just to see how many times the stone is saved before it reaches the depths: a kind of curiosity that leads nowhere.

The best books can be found at the antique shop, for only 1 RON. And even if a few interested people read them, very few would really understand them.

Because a book must not only be read, it must always be reinvented, with a different vision.

The best books are different for each. The best books leave you with some states that you can't otherwise experience, you find yourself in them, you read about people who seem to be just like you that are experiencing events, they are the only ones who teach you without making observations, like true friends. The most beautiful books are chosen by each according to what one wants to read without hierarchizing people into those who understand everything, more or less. The most beautiful ones suit everyone and not everyone equally... so too is the case with the most beautiful people. (Ioana Sarah)

The Book of Sand, written by me, but reminiscent of Borges, is synonymous with the notion of aesthetic value: everything that is beautiful can only be valued over time. And as any time has its course, as God has ordained, it turns out that the price you give to the beauty around you is directly proportional to what you see daily on a sand that never gets wet, always dry by your own strength on nature. And you can be a part of the universe, because you can be a grain of sand that is part of the celestial bodies through which all things are described and meant.

Someone said it well: "To see the world in a grain of sand, heaven in a flower, to hold infinity in your palm, and to live eternity in an hour. This is life ! "

The Borders Of The Estranged From The Sunset's Mysteries

On October 04, 2012

Impose yourself in front of others without getting away from the concrete reality that you share with them.

His name was Carson Wells. He loved his job, because it was bringing good money. He loved his life because money were very good in maintaining it. He loved his own way of being, without violence, though endowed with the creative vision of the artist, who does not manifest than within the limits of his own creations, combined with the compulsory civic attitude of an intellectual. At first glance, you would not have said he was a bounty hunter, a spéculateur, a serious device that perfectly answered the purpose for which it was built, a flame that was extinguishing or illuminating according to the pace in which he got the contracts.

And, suddenly, the deadly steps of a shadow were booking place behind him. The sweating seized him like a suffering terrified by the thought of death. He sensed the scourge. But, it was too late. Uh, if he had guessed it, if he had seized it with one second earlier. The one with the poisoned blood, with the soul embittered, already caught him in the spider web.

Like a dark knight without fear and without sin, he could not remove for the last time the half- broken sword, for hitting deadly the opponent, even with the stump. He had to obey fate.

Leadership: Do you have the ingenuity needed to overcome an impasse from a cause which does not pertain to you, under the conditions of a separation from the factor called "Own Field"?

Two hunters, two torches, two borders separated only by a fine fence of piety: Carson and Chigurh. We are witnessing a paradox: on the one hand, a kind of inner force of support, springing from faith, from a definite sense of righteousness, complemented by its opposite, the reaction force coming from outside, from an inhuman being.

As if they were suddenly smelled the trace of that sinister border, the mysterious sunset that encounters relentlessly every moribund, Carson gathered all his courage and makes a last attempt to save his life:

- You do not have to do that, Chigurh. I'm just a simple speculator. I'll pay you. I give you all the money, and we go our separate ways...

But a cold-blooded creature cannot be persuaded too easily.

- You know what will happen now, Carson, right? You should acknowledge your situation. It would be worthy of you, Chigurh said with the gun pointed at him ... Let me ask you something, Carson. If the rule that you followed brought you here, to what it was good? *

Leadership: Do you neglect the importance of the situation that marks your existence when you think in terms of inherent traits?

The exam of your own possibilities of coping with a situation is given when someone enters the "field" of your own philosophy and involves you in a case that does not necessarily pertain to you so much as it does to the hazard. To separate yourself from your own field means to become someone else's universe, to be at the service of another human being, to be important through what defines him in relation to the world.

The man, a rational being, acts under and in accordance with his thinking, education and his concepts developed over time. The action is based on some logic, and is determined by a rational thinking / or not, which can generate a beneficial force, or a force that will act to its own detriment.

All people who contribute to your transformation through unique experiences are more or less trapped in your area of interest and responsibility by the thinking that they "get" from you that they adopt and impose, in their turn, to others.

Because you, through leadership, dispose of that inner strength, springing from a categorical sense of ability to change things, a flame that is enkindled for all, whose intensity reflects the one you are in reality.

Inherent features such as determination, creativity and flexibility are outlined by the importance of situations that mark your existence. They are comparative benchmarks, always won and judged by others.

However, this force is always amplified or diminished by its opposite, a kind of reaction force coming from outside, from other people, from other causes, from another "constants of "to be"" seeking to impose by force on the border that separates you, trying to preach their own rules, their own way of thinking and action.

Just as it is in the wave's nature to want getting over itself, in the same way it is in the nature of the opposing force to want getting over your force, to penetrate everything, to make itself heard, and listened like a superior being that somehow supervises the choices of all others around.

Understanding what you experience can be granted by the acceptance of engaging with someone in the unknown of a situation, whether direct consequences are significant for the course of your life.

At the border between success and failure in leadership lies the opposite force that can alter your ability to remain faithful to the principles of the scales of values that you have joined.

Do you give to the others the opportunity to appreciate your true value? What is the price that you pay in order to keep alive the interest of others? Do you feel overwhelmed by a sense of helplessness due to the force of reaction coming from outside of your own circle of excellence? Do you assume the risk of being misinterpreted their reality? Do you plead in favor a reality, without knowing what to expect?

The borders of the estranged from the sunset's mysteries bring into focus the consequence of finding out a new reality, of another way of thinking that opposes your aspirations.

Trying to connect to the reality of those people who cannot tolerate very well the idea of an equality, of some principles, and values that would become afterwards moral standards and of quality, trying to harmonize with them mentally and emotionally through an attitude of friendship and cooperation, is most of the times equivalent to failure.

In leadership, it is all about the freedom of others to judge you in comparison with them, and to classify you consequently, justice / the injustice being accomplished through a broad vision and reflection towards their welfare.

In other words, instead of the spectacular meeting process between two opposing forces, with different views, in the formation of a stable area of leadership, it is more prudent to give priority to the criteria of loyalty and solidarity. To be a good leader does not depend only about you, but also about the ability of others to read you, to limit yourself by giving a new meaning to your vision and principles.

Are you trying to connect to the reality of the people who cannot tolerate very well the idea of equality, of some common principles and values? How? Do you know what to expect?

Find the answer to this question before reinventing yourself: "If the philosophy you follow in life will leads you to a dead end, what was it good for?"

Conclusion: Be always one step ahead of others. Develop your ability to predict, within the limits of human reason, the future with all that may bring with it, good or bad. Be vigilant and give ear to the voice of the crowd, and especially of your enemies - because only in this way you can counteract that discouraging force standing in the shadow of every leader.

Impose yourself in front of others without getting away from the concrete reality that you share with them.

The Brain In Which Flickers An Idea

On September 25, 2014

Take advantage of the opportunity that is given to you for coming back to creativity, inspiring the others respect towards your defining authority.

Instead of all his projects, Eisenstein is entrusted with making a movie on which he did not ever think about it. Moreover, he did not dream of it. There was a historical film about the Russians unity, inflamed by patriotic feelings, which under the command of Knyaz Alexander Nevsky, win, in the thirteenth century, the Teutonic armies, turned on conquering their land.

Therefore, the major political purpose of such a movie in 1937, on the eve of the war, it is obvious. The fact that it is entrusted to Eisenstein, proves the appreciation which he still enjoys. Perhaps, not so much as an opportunity which is given to the artist to come back to creation, as well as the lucidity of those who knew him closely, and who actually know that such a major purpose can be best served - and perhaps with the highest international authority – by Sergei Eisenstein.

*For some reason or another, he is entrusted with the historical movie with evident and strong actual resonances, whose hero will declare conclusively, in the end: "Go tell all in foreign lands that Russia lives ! Those who come to us in peace will be welcome as a guest. But those who come to us sword in hand will die by the sword ! On that Russia stands and forever will we stand ! " **

Leadership: Is it your science established by variations in the composition of creation which introduce through themselves new values of reference?

When it comes about leadership, in its possible ascent hanging over those involved in the field, we should not limit ourselves to the notion of information or communication, or to the forms of power, will and wisdom, which subsist in the man through his creative, moral and spiritual dimension. There are different styles of leadership, just as there are different types of reception of the value and rejection of the kitsch. And every style or creation, if it is not canceled by "wrong updates" has a slightly superior function.

We still try to make our way around the particular conception according to which, leadership, the essence of a creation rewarded by recognition, fame and glory, possesses some kind of unity, due to which we can talk about an awareness of the value of work, and of the responsibility in generating new opportunities for affirmation. A kind of definitive intervention, provided by the deep and sincere inner opening before a genuine vision, on the function of the agent of change and trust, which is based on building new and necessary forms of authority.

For a moment, we distance ourselves of this hypothesis, emphasizing the dimension of creation and the appreciation enjoyed by the holder of talents, assuming that leadership is a kind of threshold over which you must pass, gathering all your knowledge and inspiration in order to urge for lucidity. Here, we refer to the lucidity of those who know you closely, and who still know that such a major goal of giving value to leadership through creation can be served best only if you represent by yourself this creation.

The reference value of an artist is the indicator of a positive effect of the entrustment of a project or a service that some entity wants to send, considered indispensable for achieving a higher purpose. This reference value, with the substrate trend towards unity between idea and image, between form and substance, contributing to the completion of any work of art, derives from the value your previous results have.

You cannot be evaluated against a reference value if you do not adjust the relevance of your creative experience to the realism and objectivity with which you estimate yourself.

The people who are at the forefront of innovation in leadership, encouraged by the authority of positive evaluation of public benefit tenderers, will decisively internalize the favorable appreciations on their efforts of self-promotion accepting with conviction the strength of success which they will reproduce in other situations too.

In other words, your science is established by variations in the composition of creation that you transmit and integrate into a new formula profitable for everyone: "We can do great things if we are committed to them." Creation is a search involving effort and uncertainty, but it introduces new benchmarks for reforming leadership by assessing its content by independent "examiners".

How do you ensure the competence for approval of a project which you consider ambitious with an important degree of originality? Through a convincing message full of hope? Through the effect of a subtle finale of an intrigue where the "director's" intervention is felt? Through the effect of general recognition? Through the effect of a new commitment? Through the effect of a later event?

Leadership is to show the world all the power of the talent you possess to the effect of a later event.

The brain in which flickers an idea highlights the authority, based solely on a high consciousness, but also on a knowledge that can be transmitted and that would be able to pass the difficult evaluation to which it is constantly subjected. Moreover, it highlights that ability developed over time through a sustained effort, to create values unanimously recognized, which becoming reference points for ensuring some better approaches in leadership, are adopted and further transmitted.

The Builder's Law

On March 15, 2010

A leader cannot build a better world if he's not determined to constantly aid to its edifice.

Where there is injustice, lie or disagreement, you will find Zorro. This is the message of the movie "The Legend of Zorro (2005)", a film which you might have watched with the same pleasure as I did.

At a given point, at the beginning of the movie, after he fulfills the mission he alone committed to, that of recovering the box with the votes of the citizens in San Mateo from a gang of villains, Zorro returns to his family.

Signora Elena de la Vega, happy that her husband accomplished his mission, his final mission, as he recently promised, proposes to take their son Joaquin on a trip to Spain and then to New York.

Zorro thinks for a while, gives a sigh and, then, he finally says:

- No. The people still need me. It is not yet the time to leave them.

And, as always, as it happens in real life, as well, when the husband makes a promise and doesn't keep it, the disgruntled wife gives him an ultimatum. This time, a very serious one:

- If you go out that door, you won't sleep here for the night. In other words, if Zorro doesn't keep his promise, she will leave him. What eventually happened.

However, at the end of the movie, after both of them go through many endeavors and through many dangers, they get married again, and Elena agrees that every time the people will need Zorro he will go help it. And she is proud of it.

Leadership: Are you characterized by a lively feeling of belonging to a whole of the manifestation of love of the total freedom of belonging to a higher ideal?

Do you have the determination to constantly fulfill a duty? The most important task of a leader is to manifest his love as a distinct part of the total freedom to belong to a higher ideal, such as: "I go in the way of a common-law action."

Once a leader has a vision, he must also have the power to fulfill it. He cannot build a world without moving, without making an effort, nurturing only nice and clear thoughts. No, he must be involved until the end. The main feature of a real leader is the fact that he has the ability to take his mission to an end.

People had absolute trust in Zorro's help, and he, being fully aware of it, refused to limit his own potential. He could have retired from "activity" for good, he could have started looking for some relief for himself and move to California definitively. And because he was a Don, namely a wealthy man, he wouldn't lack anything.

But what would have come of the people, the town, their hopes? Who would have helped them? Who else would have dared, another Zorro, endanger his life for them, fight for justice and truth with such passion?

In leadership, proof of the existence of a common-law action creates a whole whose result means more than the sum of its component parts.

And this whole is incremented with a segment of emancipation of reason, understood as the ability to dominate tension contexts, upon receiving each form of violation of human dignity.

So, instead of withering uselessly like a plant in the shade, he once again gathered all his energy and devoted himself to a great cause. Like any responsible man, who cannot separate from the real world, he fully gained control over what lied in his subconscious and, passioned by his great goal, namely regaining the people their freedom, he accelerated his own potential, mobilizing himself towards accomplishing the things that were truly important.

And his wife was much happier in the end for having a brave and determined husband, who succeeds in accomplishing great things, worthy of being praised.

Leadership: How is your score of importance affected when you move from the moral knowledge of common sense to the conscious development of radical behavior that escapes the two limits?

You can't call yourself a leader if you don't take over whenever it is necessary. He who does nothing but wait and wait, feeling the hours passing by him, dissipates and gets older by the day. On the other hand, he who has an open mind and ambition broils with a childish impatience to fight for an ideal, reason for which he always rushes in the middle of the action.

An important part of the art of leadership requires knowing what you want and constantly dedicating yourself to that.

You can't call yourself a leader if you don't take control with all the strength of your soul and you don't participate in the action whenever you are needed. Or if you are not determined enough to systematically contribute to accomplishing the proposed goal. In order to win other people's acceptance, you must shape the world around you. And if you let everything to fate, especially when people depend on you and rely on your help, you will destroy, you will discard or abandon any relationship you have with them.

The importance of leadership in human life lies in the force of keeping consciousness clean and in supporting a clear idea of how to manage life. These are the two limits that often times alter the mood and the perception of the role you play in the dynamics of personal development, the dynamics of relationships and the dynamics of your own representation on the world stage. Limits that support the shift from the moral knowledge of common sense to that of a radical knowledge.

The Builder is the man driven by the eventual satisfaction that springs from keeping his word and from the specificity of the moral obligation of gratitude he owes to the world continuously, in the gesture of unconditionally sharing his own legendary adventure.

Conclusion: You can't build anything on good intentions and ideas, but only involving personally, as often as possible, acting with even more abnegation. You won't build anything and you won't accomplish anything if you hide in the shadow of convenience, waiting for others to eventually do something in your favor, as well.

The Burning Ecstasy Of The Solitary Man

On March 03, 2013

Constantly reassess your values and beliefs so as to prevent externalizing your predominantly negative inner states.

Everyone knows what diamond is, a piece of coal processed by heat and time – in millions of years. But it might as well be the result of exceeding your own limits or, conversely, a small core of old-fashioned personal vanity, an undeclared attachment of Ego shattered by the bitterness of life, an Ego that evolves to extreme agitation.

"You'd be surprised how long it takes to give 100 million pounds. It took me 40 years to do that. Today I gave the last penny... Except for this jewelry you held in your hand. A diamond, an extraordinary piece, 168 carats, 58 sides, very rare. I stole it from the company where I worked. I've kept it for rainy days... Or maybe... Maybe it's the last bit of vanity I have left."

This passion for experimentation, willingness to suspend any balance – moral and spiritual, draws Laura Quinn near a burning state, a boisterous ecstasy. An unknown, active and purifying emotion, intense during intimate moments, like an aggressive force of attraction that leads to breaking the crystal itself, the great touchstone of one's values into more and more disparate and insignificant fragments.

Although productive and insightful, everything inside it slowly and surely grinds, changes into a sad and introvert person, despite its high aspirations.

Leadership: Are you climbing on the heights of repentance, or descending to the chasms of vanity amid the attempt to surpass yourself that turns experiencing long-lasting suffering into a greater understanding of life experiences?

If Beethoven complained of his deafness, Byron, of his short leg, Rousseau, of his bladder infection, Laura Quinn experiences as if purposely, excitingly and stimulating the very special feelings of her disorder. She does not look hard to heal, like a patient fighting against his illness, but more like a patient who ignores his illness, like a paralytic who comforts with this implausible, yet true idea: acceptance of pain.

As an unmerited gift of destiny, Laura Quinn accepts with endless zeal her illness. A vice that, excessive and silent, haunts and degrades her more and more as human. Vanity ! She does not attempt by repentance to uncover the problem of her own nature, her bold and unyielding passions, such as ambition, avarice, greed, but rather cares for the meaning such a recuperating act has: the exaggerated belief in her own abilities pointed towards what she possesses, not towards what she offers.

What is the result of exceeding your own limits? Between the present and the future of leadership, does it slowly weave that undeclared attachment of an Ego shook by the bitterness of life? Does everything inside you grinds slowly, but surely? Do you comfort yourself with the implausible, yet true idea of self-acceptance in relation to a sense of disappointment? Does an excessive flaw haunts and degrades you more and more as human being?

Leadership: What is the importance of integrating your life experiences into a type of defensive personal attitude that implies that you are very self-satisfied against any practices associated with an increased level of guilt?

To win the big competition with ourselves on the way to performance and fullness, we must be aware of what this mobilizing, but expensive energy represents, often performing a questionable, deceptive, intriguing function, that cannot be defined by chemical formulas and neither directly measured. The presence of an unexplained force becomes increasingly threatening, imprinting or applying leadership, through various forms, another trajectory, curvilinear or descendant.

And how can this energy be obtained and used in a free, but poor and marginal way, but by a totally unexpected reversal of inner poles. By shaking the Ego. By combining inner conflicts, emotions awakened by a custom ring, from which arises a new experience, a false, but well-rounded image of a rather isolated man, distracted by the absurdity of that moment, preceding the thunderbolt of emptiness.

The result is, undoubtedly, poor. Sometimes, in extreme cases, violent or brutal, negatively influencing attitude, the way we look those around us, the way we spend our inner resources, our feelings, emotions and convictions, values. The most common reaction is the loss of one's own personality, sometimes irreparable, the exclusion of those coordinates of human development, specific to leadership.

Only you decide how much you let yourself be driven by this energy. Being aware of this energy, negative in its essence, means being in constant connection with yourself, with the entire range of values, with your entire being, with who you really are. This makes your personality an extension of the capacity to regain your composure and, also, making leadership a legitimacy of the power of "being".

The main point which characterizes the personality of the leader is the "torment" of going through all the extreme stages of life without losing in any one of them.

The Belgian writer Marguerite Yourcenar wrote: "I often think that people are characterized by an extreme position, their heroism consisting in remaining there throughout their life."

What do you chose? To fall, to live and to suffer in the precipice of vanity and despair? Or to get up atop of repentance and betterment?

This moment, the duality between darkness and light, between "to be" and "not to be" an orderly man, is given by the great confrontation: losing or winning your own being. The law of physics are equivalent to human laws. The force exerted by one body to another, a series of feelings to other feelings, is a complex process that leads to the formation of the laws of your existence. As a result, you tend to get stuck, maybe even for a lifetime, in an extreme position, in one point that becomes fixed, a heavy burden, awry distributed in its own existence.

It is the fight against your "disease", on the front of your unmanageable emotions and beliefs, formed in time, giving you the right to place yourself sometimes sideways towards the dominant mainstream in leadership or in your personal and social life, strengthening or destabilizing your feelings and your attachment to the present and the future.

A strong mind, a strong character, a noble soul give just a little lift, a small step forward, but not a decisive one, does not represent something safe, which takes a dramatic and happy turn. It is only a small segment of the complex chain of change. If the road initially selected is no more according to current expectations, then things may take a turn to restriction or, worse, depression.

The higher your aspirations, the more life will make you slip; you will always lead a life in the middle line. If you want to develop your leadership, first give meaning to your life: constantly reassess your values and beliefs so as to prevent externalizing your predominantly negative inner states.

Do not linger in any one of the extreme positions you are going through life. Listen to your heart and remorse, they will show you the path you need to take.

Vanity means not destroying the last thing you have left, that is, the memory of what you once were.

The Burning Ecstasy Of The Solitary Man marks the moment of transition to the final stage of your journey: a free and painful fall in the precipice of vanity and despair, or a climb atop repentance and betterment. What do you chose?

Just as a painter does not see color only as an ornament, but refers to an expression of the model's emotions, so the choice you make towards achieving fullness should not be regarded as a simple act, but as a necessary expense, an investment to face time.

Show who you really are !

The Central Problem Of Audio-visual Editing

On July 15, 2010

Leadership in directing is demonstrated by the ability to use time pressure as a catalyst for creative decisions, adjusting the structure and intensity of scenes according to key moments.

The central problem of audio-visual editing still remains to be solved. The deadline hurries the master Eisenstein. Three times so far he had to bring it back during production (apart from the substantial reduction by shooting the battle in the middle of summer). This fiendish rhythm tires him beyond measure. It was hellish work, he will comment after finishing the film, which exhausted him so much that, months after the premiere, he still cannot concentrate on his usual theoretical work.

How he would now like to be able to experience quietly, with method and control, so many thoughts and desires accumulated during years of meditation on sound cinema! But the film has to be finished by November 7. The deadline cannot be postponed in any way. Hence the painful renunciations: a whole scene, the one on the bridge over the Volchov, painstakingly filmed, is now simply thrown away - to Eisenstein's great regret - because the rush does not allow its completion. He envisions a new tragedy: the abandonment of all his ideas regarding audio-visual editing, impossible to achieve without much respite, without numerous attempts at the editing table. Then, at this moment, he is lucky enough to meet the special qualities of Sergei Prokofiev.

Leadership: Can you demonstrate your ability to adapt initial planning to production realities without sacrificing narrative quality?

The incompatibility or insufficient compatibility of many scenes in audio-visual montage limits their use in cases of high narrative complexity. Under these conditions, it is necessary to resort to complex techniques – for example, experimenting with rhythm, to facilitate narrative coherence. Especially since, in order to achieve a complete narrative, several types of montage are sometimes used, each of which has satisfying effects in sequences where the others would create creative obsessions.

Practice has shown that there is no perfectly inert term of achievement, in the sense that time always influences the creative process. The director's ideas, except for those of structure and non-polar scenes, are more or less influenced by the nature of time pressure, judging by the fact that creative decisions change under pressure. In general, in an emergency situation, scenes corresponding to deep meditations are shifted to less intense moments, and those corresponding to dynamic actions are shifted to more intense moments, compared to the situation in the initial planning (when ideas were free).

Leadership: Can you demonstrate your ability to maintain narrative coherence in situations of high complexity while avoiding creative obsessions?

There are also usually changes in the intensity and duration of scenes in an effort to maximize impact in limited time.

A number of theories have been developed that try to link these changes to the nature of the creative process, more precisely to its macroscopic characteristics – the director's focus and the clarity of his vision, both of which are crucial factors in the creative process. The relationships obtained for changes in scene intensity and duration are very complicated, but we can briefly present them here as equations of creativity under pressure.

Just as solvents influence molecular vibrations, the pressure of time influences the rhythm and structure of the film, which is how unexpected creative solutions are born. Also, the painful abandonment of certain scenes, such as the one on the bridge over Volchov, are similar to the changes in molecular structure caused by solvents, especially since they can lead to a beneficial reconfiguration of the whole. Finally, the meeting with Sergei Prokofiev can be seen as the discovery of a perfect "solvent", capable of harmonizing the audio- visual elements even under limited time conditions, thus allowing the realization of a complex and innovative audio-visual montage.

Leadership in cinematic editing involves the ability to overcome incompatibilities between scenes through a flexible process of "associative editing" to maintain narrative coherence.

The surgical procedure requires meticulous planning and precision, similar to solving the central problem of audio-visual editing. The doctor, like a master, must have full control over every aspect of the intervention. During surgery, the medical team must follow a strict pace to minimize risks, just as the lead time speeds up production. After the intervention, the patient needs time to recover quietly, undisturbed, reflecting the desire to experiment quietly and methodically.

Experimentation and adjustments are crucial to long-term success, just as thoughts and desires accumulated over years of sound cinema meditation are essential. Every decision must be taken very carefully, even if sometimes, despite intense efforts, painful sacrifices are required. These are essential to ensure the best possible result, similarly to the removal of the scene on the bridge over the Volchov, regretted by the master Eisenstein. Thus, in this complex procedure, there are tragedies and regrets, but also the good fortune of meeting the special qualities of a valuable collaborator.

The essence of leadership in cinematography is the ability to adapt creative vision to temporal constraints, restructuring scenes according to the intensity of key moments to maintain emotional and narrative coherence.

The central problem of audio-visual editing is that the perfect synchronization between sound and image takes time and experimentation, following a meticulous process until the moment the film is completely finished. I say this because the rush of production inevitably affects the quality of the editing, which is meant to strengthen the atmosphere and emotion, especially in terms of impact on the audience.

The Charm Of Life

On October 09, 2009

Return to yourself, for the reality to resonate around you as you want.

The lyrics of an old song, elaborated by many writers, sounds like this: "Since the time of Ra, the old days go and new ones come and replace them. Every morning, the sun rises and every night, it hides at dusk. Men conceive, women give birth, and every chest breathes fresh air. But all those who were born, all to the last of them, go to the place bestowed upon man."

We do not know precisely the place we are going to, we do not know it, but maybe we can guess it a little, but there is a great shadow of a doubt – because the future is uncertain and difficult to predict. We cannot know for certain what tomorrow will bring, we cannot know if we will get a pleasant surprise or, on the contrary, if we will be get by luck, as it happens to many. I do not want to sound pessimistic or melancholic, but of the dice of destiny of each one of us were thrown and the games have been made, we cannot change anything. We are straightening like a bullet, directly, unfailingly and precisely to the fated place.

Leadership: Do you resort to the proper exploration and integration of life challenges and requirements in a new empirical template to determine how to represent a personalized route in relation to any time?

In other words, the life of every man is a book with as many pages as the days he has to live; We can read every day the previous pages, from day one, but we cannot read the following pages, which belong to the future. Overall, this book has chapters the titles of which are "preformed", and what we fill those chapters with largely depends to us, to the way we approach the content of that chapter and the circumstances. What do you fill the chapters of your book with?

Is it true that all is vanity in this world, that people's thoughts are changing? Let's briefly analyze the facts. We find out daily news about what happens in the world and what do we see?

Today, some people have fun, enjoy themselves and aspire to distant horizons. The next day, the same people become sad and pessimistic, overly busy with work and, filled with worry and unrest, they can no longer afford the luxury to live high. Today, some people become allies, they form a redoubtable, strong, almost perfect tandem and fight to achieve the same ideal. The next day, the same people break the alliance, slur each other, arguing to tears and invectives. They either reconcile or argue. Friends today, foes tomorrow. Friends again the day after tomorrow. Enemies the next day. And so on.

The cruel and cowardly man, the mother who finds her son's killer, the mistress who plans betrayal while caressing, the thief who gets away with it etc. And so on, as always. Some are honest, others are dishonest. Today, it is sunny for some, tomorrow it becomes cloudy and depressing for others. Today, some are having a rough time, tomorrow, they feel extraordinarily well. The wheel spins dateless, constantly in circles – the same events, sorrows and joys, the same human comedy in which only the actors change, the scenario remains the same. Leadership is a team game, but in the human comedy, many prefer to play individually, as it suits them, without regard to any rules or principles.

Leadership: Can you define a new "LOSSLESS" image module template to serve as an example in the "review content worthy of being remembered"?

This is the world we live in, be it good or bad, just or unjust, convenient or not. The Polish writer Boleslaw Prus said that the world is like rivers and mountains: "A river, as long as it flows in a single direction, seems dead; but when it goes to the left or to the right, it becomes charming. The same with the mountains: if they were all the same height, they would be boring, but this way, their peaks of different heights and their deep valleys delights you."

Try not to let your heart be troubled by bag, ugly and harmful things happening in the world, but try to live as you please and according to the means you have available. Life is our greatest gift. Try to spend each day with joy, chase away your worries and cheer up. Enlighten your face and look with admiration at things around you. Enjoy the moments of happiness that you live and share with the loved ones. Try to taste the charm of life...

The "LOSSLESS" image captures everything that the experience of life has brought to you as a promise to explore emotions and how they can affect you personally or professionally. Not just regrets and notes of hope that remain like old bruises, talking about the decisions taken along the way, but as an effect of what you are able to accomplish in a reality that is both open unity and complex plurality.

Return to yourself, for the reality to resonate around you as you want.

To determine the representation of a personalized route in relation to any time means to develop a form of commitment to what life expects from you even when you cannot offer it the act of acceptance in what it behaves as an aspiration toward expansion or extinction.

The Charming Pulse Of Life

On March 08, 2011

Increase your credibility with those you interact with, building your leadership on a consistent spiritual background.

The 169th issue of Careers magazine briefly reveals the story of the dentist Roland Hermann, in a more than challenging place: that of a man who would travel to the very end of the world, accepting the afferent risks, only to serve a noble cause.

Amazon, Nepal, Chad, Bolivia, and Guyana are some of the places where the tireless Romanian doctor went for a single purpose: to give a helping hand to the people with a very low standard of living. The most important thing that Roland learned in these volunteer projects was to cherish life, respect people and be with them in difficult times. The desire to devote himself to others, to see them healthy and happy is the only joy that will always warm his soul.

After reading about his merits and his work, I can say that Roland Hermann is an admirable person because he adds a lot of meaning to his profession and to his own life, keeping intact his spiritual and moral background, which connects him to other people.

Leadership: Is your belonging to a trend of consolidation of the level of representativeness a condition of its ascension to the highest dignity of the name you bear?

For reasons concerning the specific of society's evolution at this time, the capital factor and its supplementation tend more and more to acquire that "exclusive excellence", which supports the ideals stemming from the heart. Cooperation, mutual aid, volunteering and good example must be the basic resources of your image in the world..

Therefore, the knowledge on understanding the fundamental principles of leadership are increasingly assimilated as rules of regulating people's life, solidarity appearing increasingly frequent in various business or personal development areas.

Freedom to perfect through others, to adopt a kind of thinking and a code of conduct liable to the protection of your brand turns you – not into a spectator or a stranger – but into a special hero, an integrate being, a man of virtue. Unlike the "snow man" trying to impose respect only in cold times, waiting for everyone to admire him without doing absolutely nothing.

Precisely from this evolutionary parallelism, at the interference between responsibility and ease in spirit and action, the human inclination toward leadership clearly emerges, taking note also of the rules by which it develops. From this fundamental specificity, all other features that turn an individual into a unique human being ensue, advancing under the species of the full involvement in the relief campaign at a higher level of understanding of self.

The name you bear has as its first center of gravity that trend of gratitude towards what comes from a direction where it does not matter when and where you are, but how you feel during an examination from the viewpoint of the observers you interact with.

The lack of clearly defined moral principles, ethical neutrality, together with the exacerbated individualism, developed in a manner that does not honor anyone causes the individual to strengthen their inner character structure under "a thick layer of snow", which resists any action directed towards the unique and definitive meaning of excellence.

A trend that can be seen as a burst of will, with inconsistent effects and no clear symptom, but susceptible to adverse reactions. And these effects intersect and conflict with those structures of thought and action that move away from that threshold of absolute recognition, but unfounded on a credible and sufficient factual support.

A snow flake is formed from the combination of many ice crystals, but that does not turn it into a diamond.

Leadership is an amazing adventure in search of new realms of art, whose flavor is tasted only by travelers who accept the responsibility to shape their character – searching through their unique way of being, through their tendency of appreciation, the acceptance of society that does not claim ignorance.

The extent of your leadership is provided by the way you focus on your ideals during a continuous slalom on the border between the events of life and the performance of controlling them?

The preparation to create a positive and healthy relationship starts with your involvement in supporting a noble cause. Trying to see the world through the filter of a special sensitivity concerning people's needs and requirements, listening to that voice in your head that incessantly whispers you not to remain indifferent to their sufferings, you will maintain under control their perception concerning your ability to influence them.

In order to influence people, you must occupy a place in their heart, and you will be able to do so only monopolizing each and every one of them with unique feelings of affection.

"Not everything that counts can be counted, and not everything that can be counted counts", Albert Einstein once said.

In leadership only one thing counts and can be counted, at the same time: credibility. One is credible only if endowed with that feature of the people inspired by a high patriotism, showing a genuine interest in others.

Just like a painter seeks to emphasize through light and shadow the individuality of each object in space, just as well, you, as a leader, must seek to emphasize through your leadership the individuality of your special character, in virtue of that noble feeling that lies stress on your inner beauty.

The performance of controlling an event depends on the way in which you present yourself in a situation in which you can act freely even when you have something to lose.

As someone well said: "If you have something important to lose that you cannot regain, yes, then you have reason to doubt whether or not to make an unexpected step in life."

The charming pulse of life is given by your spiritual background that always keeps you alive, which is always present somewhere deep inside your being and urges you to stand up and not cross your arms when someone needs help.

Your leadership will gain a positive meaning, you will enhance your credibility towards those you interact with and you will always be loved only if the pulse of your life will always harden. Accelerate the pulse of your life, involving yourself in supporting a noble cause that will bring you moral satisfaction and that would be worthy of all people's respect and support.

Conclusion: A quality leadership is not self-imposed by the desire to ascend socially, but it rises from deep inside one's soul, as a result of the desire to help those in difficulty or those unable to have a conjunct and effective way of action. Thus, you increase your credibility in front of those you interact with, being the only way to accelerate your charming pulse of your own life, and therefore acquiring satisfaction in everything you do.

The Chess Game

On June 28, 2010

Increases the strength of your character, by constantly keeping your balance mentally and morally impeccable.

April 2, 1520. No other ship has ever reached such a Southern point as Fernando Magellan's fleet. He, knowing his fleet could only reach fertile tropical regions after several months, takes a decision against the wishes of his crew members on the five ships. He orders that the daily food ratio be significantly reduced, and the food be strongly guarded.

The opening phase. That was a fantastic courage. Right here, at the end of the world, to harden the crew that you've already subjugated so many months under the toughest conditions, in search of a chimera. People didn't seem at all willing to accept such a constraint, aware that at least a quarter of them will have to die for the triumph of this commander tenacious till absurd, suffering from hunger, cold, fatigue and hardship.

Undoubtedly, the guilt of this dangerous situation was entirely Magellan's, who didn't know (never knew) the way to the strait he has promised to find. And he couldn't tell the truth: "I left myself confused by false reports and have guided you on a wrong journey." Consequently, Magellan's captains (Gaspar Quesada, Luis de Mendoza and Antonio de Coca) decided to rebel, because there wasn't only their own lives at stakes, but also that also that of the crew put under their command by the king's order.

Leadership: Near your goal do you neglect the fear of not dirtying your image by recognizing a mistake or asking for forgiveness under the pressure of the need to make a quick and unpopular decision?

A move forbidden by regulation. The three captains knew that they had to have power on their side in order to defeat such a temerarious enemy as Magellan. Therefore, they had to act firmly.

After all the lights were turned off, the five ships deepened in the darkness of that long winter night. Nobody could see a thing in the heavy darkness and could hear a thing because of the angry waves bouncing on the broadsides of ships. At that moment, a boat full of armed sailors, including the three captains, slowly disengaged of one of the ships and imperceptibly approached the ship San Antonio.

Double blow. The plan was very well thought out, executed without fail. No night watchman being on San Antonio, the aggressors could climb on board with rope ladders, taking control of the ship. All the Portuguese on board were put in chains: therefore, Magellan's most faithful disciples were knocked out.

In the morning, a boat with five sailors approached Magellan's ship. They handed Magellan a letter through which Gaspar Quesada, one of the three rebel captains, communicated him that three out of the five boats were now under his command, and if he wants to continue his journey, he must meet all of his demands.

Leadership: Is the power of your authenticity to deny the gravity of the immediate reality subordinated to the desire to fulfill your goals to the end, with the risk of misjudging a rule that has been unanimously accepted and recognized by others?

Chess to the king. Magellan couldn't believe that San Antonio fell overnight into the hands of the rebels. He was taken by surprise. He immediately realized the greatness of the danger. Apart from the insignificant ship Santiago, all the other three had been taken by the rebels: San Antonio, Conception and Victoria. The game seemed to be lost.

Magellan was left with two alternatives: to surrender, that is to reach a deal with the Spanish captains and accept all their proposals, or the second alternative, to create a threat to force the opponent to abandon the game. In both situations, he must take the risk of ignoring the basic rule of a captain: resolving conflicts. However, he resorts to a middle ground. He has to gain the credibility of suggesting the adoption of an alternative approach, always speculating the conflicts of interest that arise in the situation.

Like an experienced chess player, Magellan quickly assesses the new situation, weighting in a relatively short time the two alternatives, and then he chooses the better of the two: he will attempt a counterattack against the enemy, a decisive riposte that would paralyze the rebels. But he doesn't starts to attack impulsively, but undertakes something extremely dangerous. If the rebels attacked in the darkness of the night, he would do everything in the light of day, right under their eyes.

The only accessory that awakens the feeling of pride and decides the nature of your character is the eventual satisfaction that springs from not keeping your word, to gaining the power of effectively organizing yourself.

A professional chess player often uses the pawn in order to destroy the protecting device of the enemy. The pawns, though they have the lowest potential on the chessboard, can create a decisive threat, provided that each of their steps be well balanced.

First, Magellan retains the sailors who brought him the letter and confiscate their boat. Then, he embarks on it six reliable men and sends them not to San Antonio, but to Victoria, in order to deliver a letter to the third rebel commander, Luis de Mendoza. No suspicion arouses in the minds of the rebels who watch as this tiny ship approaches their ship. Because how could five people attack a ship loaded with nearly sixty well-armed soldiers?

Leadership: Do you take into consideration the potential impact of detailed viewing procedures of exiting an impasse, guided by the idea that people act blindly to fulfill an order in the conduct of actions?

Once they board the ship, all the rebels surround them. Nobody cares to mount guard. Luis de Mendoza reads the letter from Magellan, in which he's asked for a meeting. But while he was reading, from the second ship that Magellan sent, which nobody noticed, almost twenty well-armed people climbed on board, behind the rebels. Luis de Mendoza is immediately killed by one of the five messengers, and the rebels are ordered to surrender.

The trick in the chess psychology is simply a surprise. If you know to surprise, the game is won. Magellan's plan succeeded. The score of three to two was back again in his favour, thus restoring his supremacy.

The higher the tension created around the holding of power, the greater the interest shown to represent a perspective of supremacy.

The king is the most important piece; the fate of the entire game depends on his situations. Victoria being captured, Magellan has regained his supremacy. He punished the instigators and continued his road. Eventually, it was found that his measure, that of reducing the food ratio, saved the fleet. And more than that, Magellan fulfilled his promise: he found the strait that communicates between the two oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Sometimes, in order to win, you must be astute and use tricks. But, for that, you must possess knowledge of strategy and tactics. Magellan proved through his "game" that he's innovative, finding unexpected solutions that gave him the opportunity to win "the game" even if he was in disadvantage, even if his opponent didn't play fair.

The style of presenting an argument in front of a victory can be considered the expression of a sui-generis status meant to distinguish between the passing forms of the most important events and the rational fund of the right to uproot and destroy the power that does not work in a spirit of solidarity to you.

A leader must have a complete training and possess a proper mental state. Also, like a chess player, the leader must always maintain his mental and moral perfectly balanced, especially when challenged. And, above all, he must have developed the sense of real danger, which is to anticipate it and be able to find quick solutions to counteract it.

The leader must have developed the sense of real danger. In critical situations, he must quickly find alternative ways and methods to annihilate any harmful elements from the final goal. Like a chess player, he must find appropriate solutions for the situation created by the enemy. Sometimes, in order to win, you must know how to make use of tricks.

Leadership means growing by reinvesting what you earn after you've lost almost everything.

The Chimera Principle

On April 10, 2010

Don't you think you are a leader if you get to lead people.

The people who are wise are always very calculated in thinking and action, take good decisions and are very careful in everything they do. But I, dare I say, didn't prove to be very wise that day.

I was in the mountains with my friends. We had organized a paintball game in the woods. We split up in two teams, teams that had no leaders. So I, with an indescribable joy, driven by an insatiable thirst for adventure and a formidable desire for sensational, self-proclaimed myself leader in the team I was appointed in after the draw. "Follow me", I said in my mind, and my burning heart repeated that I would be able to push my team to victory.

But right from the first moment, after the action started, I made the unforgivable mistake. Without thinking, without having the patience and taking the most advantageous decision, inflamed with a state of exultation beyond compare, as nobody and nothing could have scared me, I burst fiercely the first in the middle of the battle, right when the enemy dispersed. Thus, I completely ignored the most important rule of war: during battle, especially in a moment of danger, the leader of the army must be protected. He must stand behind the front line, not go in the first line of attack, as the battle plan was in his mind.

First target, first hit. Well, because of that feeling of selfish joy, I drove myself to failure. For two minutes, I was shrouded by a rain of paint balls. I was lucky enough not to be hit by all of them. Until my teammates fired back, who were, at that moment, at about ten meters behind me, I was the preferred and perfect target of the opponents.

Not for a second have I thought something like that could happen to me, I had a false sense of security. And because of my failing judgment, my team lost. For nothing have I considered myself suited to be a leader, since the results were very weak, under any expectations. All my teammates, who, first, might have given me their trust, more ore less, were disappointed by my performance in the end.

Leadership: Does the need to create and maintain a decision-making autonomy cause a permanent tension between the maximum dimension of authenticity and the maximum predestination dimension?

My position as a leader wasn't precisely recognized. Vested with my loyalty towards the other team mates and instinct with the firm belief that I would be the man of the day, I only took advice from myself and nobody else in as how to proceed, this was the first wrong step. Then I started the attack with a rebel spirit, just like a kamikaze in a suicide mission who pitches with all his power, all his speed, his entire being and, for everybody's surprise, directly to the strong points of the enemy.

But I didn't make any convention with the members of my team and I didn't present them any plan of action, as I should have normally done and, therefore, my position as a leader wasn't previously, precisely and undeniably, recognized, as it was only tacitly accepted. In eloquent and truly sincere words, nobody on my team ever requested my support and I tried to come to their aid from my own initiative, putting my will at a pretty harsh test.

Two dimensions characterize leadership. The maximum magnitude of the value you give yourself through the condition of authenticity, obtained through a position of wisdom. And it is as dangerous as the maximum magnitude of the predestination value that you attribute to it through the thrill you are relying on in moments of maximum emotional strain.

The first dimension helps you feel and think up deep and complex things before you make a compromise or sacrifice, but does not confer you the possibility of feeling "divine", of feeling at ease, of unleashing your overflowing energy, of unleashing your critical side capable of committing acts of great courage.

The second dimension, which keeps you hooked up to the last letter of the never-before-seen makes you think you're alone, like a hero trying to defeat a system that appears to be stronger than him. In this case your presence is more than enough to face your demons. It enables you to doubt the possibility of making a mistake, the ability to browse and experience the side of a world that belongs to you entirely.

Leadership: Is being a step ahead of other people an investment eligible under the value you give yourself in a "Virtual Word" or a collective attachment?

Being authentic means expressing yourself as a winner by the image you project in the outcome terms of material, cognitive, and emotional attitude type, and not in terms of "Who should I fight to show my courage". It means to connect with what is expressed in the manifesto that we sustain every creation or any action, expressed as such: "I am like you" and not "I am you."

As a leader, you are responsible for your actions and decisions. Being one step ahead of people doesn't make you a leader. You cannot make people to follow you and help you fulfill your vision, by their own will, giving their full trust if, by wanting to be on a dominant position, you are the first to stumble when facing an obstacle.

On the contrary, you will be overshadowed by a deep sorrow because you haven't met the expectations and then they will feel the same for having lost. If you give them right from the start the support and devotion, either you care a lot for them and wish them as many successes as possible, either because you are driven only by your interest, either because a ridiculous, immense pride makes you insist on gaining the victory with any price - you will be able to win their respect, their attachment and, thus, you will be very certain that they will contribute to achieving the goal you have proposed. But they will follow you open-heartedly only if you lead them to victory.

Leadership reflects the attitude of accepting a forerunner position by giving up the quality of unique authority, not by increasing the teaser that "sells" an image.

A team without a leader is alone, powerless. Who will its members get the help they expect with so much impatience, happiness, ardor, if you alone put yourself in danger in the most critical moments and fail?

If you are a manager and because of your wrong, emotion, desire, subjectivism driven and not rational decisions, the company gets to go bankrupt, all the employees will lose their moral and financial support. Instead of being seen as their only protector, their only support, a sure guide, worthy of being followed, you will seem to them as a useless burden, a rushed hero because of whom the entire company will suffer.

So, you have no reason to call yourself a leader. If you don't give people real reasons to trust you, you'll be just a person with good intentions, under no circumstance a giver of hope.

A leader must be recognized by those on his team by his preceding acts. Calling yourself a leader, even if you are one step ahead of the others, proves an absolute trust in your forces, which results from a subjective, superficial overrating, which will inevitably lead you to failure.

P.S. A leader without a team is the same as the team without a leader.

The Chromatic Of Astral Composition

On April 26, 2018

Show your theories of art in the visual projection of a message or idea for a long enough time in front of destiny so that they may be recorded in immortality.

It seems to me that I am living from a reflex of the extension of the context of life, in an illusion of immortality that sees itself untouched by the admiration that embraced me at the height of a state of communion with something outside of me, something immaterial that revolves around the axis of a strange but natural phenomenology.

Suddenly implacable, virtual reality is turning its back, abandoning itself in the ether, the supreme criterion of an interpretation in the mirror of revolting time, to be contemplated in a gentle and quiet wind, making me understand how long it may be that what reinforces, subliming the color of emotion, can suddenly disappear just like an anonymous artist from another era.

The instinctive factor of the unique and total sentiment that overcomes time through multiple angles in which the argument of vibrant color and unlimited matching options can be explored in the context of completing a picture of great refinement in a dementia of disillusionment called "The thirst for infinity" is a predetermined correlation between the ray of light thrown over past things and the perception of the glorification of the historical pattern of artistic currents.

My art has as a rhyme the symbol of color in the universality of a creator of great altitude, not in the way it is perceived as a visual sensation by contemporaries who access its magic, but especially in the way in which the principles and importance of using color in the generation of psychological effects and the values of luminosity reflected in an endless work called history, in the spirituality of some generations that succeeded in a continuous becoming.

The highest, subtle and most representative result of art is the struggle to reconstruct an essentially historical moment from the overwhelming image of fiction that has become reality.

Leadership: Is your effort to reconstitute a certain past found in the art of setting up a fictional universe from a plan of reality where the contrast between two opposing aspects defines the extension of a new sense?

And seeing as how reality must be expressed in artistic terms, without which the most intense experiences, reduced to the state of passing dreams, can in no way translate into action, I am compelled to adopt an attitude of maximizing the gratuitousness and the contemplativeness of art, and the spirit of self-observation, which, as a rule, dominates the space of authentic creation that rules its own world.

The Three Ages of Man is one of the masterpieces of Master Tiziano Vecellio, which inspires great amazement through a vivid color code. I asked him why he preferred to render sensitivity and purity through open colors, and Tiziano, smiling for the first time in his life, replied: "Despite the cold dominance of the most pure and subtle blue-green with green reflexes, the presence of red and yellowish tones, merged in a mellow, lyrical light, creates a calm harmony of intense vitality."

I then understood that the chromatic structure of his work aimed at identifying the world built by a poet, compared to the real world. The past of an artist's life is the prolongation of an idea into eternity. And the contrast between two opposing aspects – persistence and change – that facilitates understanding of concepts and the balance of composition, defines the extension of a new sense called: the road of destiny.

Leadership: Do you try to give a conventional definition of the emotional role you play in the power of destiny for a period when the compensations of your hard work do not keep up with the expansion of small events in the great history?

Despite the limitations imposed upon me by the living art of the overwhelming present, that cannot deny the past that I still idealize as a standard of welfare and inner peace, near the edge of unanswered questions, I managed to take my creation to a level of confrontation with the destiny of long-forgotten heroes, even if their world was quickly headed to an inevitable sunset.

A strange slumber of the drawing represents me at all times, seemingly possible to associate with the journey of a l'esprit de finesse into a virtual reality, as a confrontation of fate broken from films, with the limits of an unconceivable world, losing myself in the embrace of a graphic fabric always supervised by revelations of pure, truly eternal and immutable subjectivity.

Little by little, I am wandering on the path of destiny, to the deep understanding of a whole called "fleeing to another realm" where I can heal the wounds of my soul received from the battles I passed through without, a safe diagnosis, without supervision, without treatment, in the thematic universe of Finnish literature, in which Mika Waltari would have a hard word to say: "My destiny still has many lives to bear before sharing the divine food with the gods."

I would like to tell you more about the Lade Naval Battle, because I cannot even figure out how I have escaped alive from the indescribable chaos from which detached the desperate screams of those who died. Few still remember her history. When Dionysius' skill turned into an impossible victory, just as my passage through the loop of time, he exclaimed with an indescribable joy: "If I had a hundred ships like this, and if they were only manned by men of Phocaea, I could conquer all the seas of the world."

The happiness of a commander, like that of painters, comes from a fine perception of ridiculous that the end always has a new beginning.

I would have liked to recreate the whole course of the battle in only one color, but my time, in the name of I don't know what art principle that eludes my grasp. I signify that I still live in illo tempore, in the illusion of the eternal return to what was at the beginning, in connection with the resumption of the world as a restart of Creation.

The Chromatic Of Astral Composition suggested by me through the raw greens of nature, in contrast to the red brick of the ruins and the inimitable blue that turns to gray, that has the gift of giving the warriors a ghostly air, captures the sense of a world that successively changes its décor, each time according to the style and approach of an artist who puts himself at the service of the art subtly called: rebirth in immortality.

The Cinematic Form Of A Monologue

On January 01, 2009

The visual articulation of thought can expand the limits of human expression.

In his notes, the Russian director, Sergei Eisenstein, writes: "Joyce is a colossus. He considers Joyce, as M. Seton remembers, the only living writer who broke the walls of literary tradition, who created new forms to express the process interior of thought and emotion. At the same time, he believes that Joyce was the one who "developed the figurative line of Japanese hieroglyphics". , a modest, funny man, dedicated exclusively to work.

The two artists talk for a long time, Eisenstein's visits are repeated. Joyce reads him pages from his works that Eisenstein, now, in reading the author, understands better. He talks a lot about "the inner monologue whose example in Ulysses had excited the young director by revealing the unfolding of events simultaneously with the particular way in which these events pass through consciousness and feeling, that is, the associations and emotions of one of the main characters", by Leopold Bloom .

Joyce is very interested in Eisenstein's thoughts and projects regarding the inner monologue. For five years, the director has been preoccupied with the cinematic form of such a monologue, its editing form. He was convinced that only the sound film could reproduce all the phases, all the specifics of the course of thought. That's why the film will continue what Joyce had brought to a climax in literature.

Leadership: Can you perceive and interpret the complexity of a character's thought to create a visual equivalent of inner monologue in a manner that mimics the uninterrupted stream of consciousness?

The visual metaphor in the cinematic form of a monologue can function as a visual equivalent of the inner monologue, staging the particular way in which events pass through a character's consciousness and feeling. The directors, using editing and sound film techniques, bring before the viewers the thoughts, associations and emotions of the characters in a manner that mimics the uninterrupted stream of consciousness, as Joyce did in literature. This process is not limited to a direct representation of ideas, but involves the creation of a dialogue between the viewer and the film, where the complexity of the train of thought is explored in an intuitive and deeply personal manner.

Leadership: Do you allow yourself to explore the otherness of a character through your creation, reflecting on how it renders the uninterrupted flow of your consciousness?

The cinematic editing of a monologue can be seen as the visual equivalent of the inner monologue, orchestrating how events and emotions are experienced through the character's consciousness. In the context of sound film, directors and editors use montage to reconstruct the complexity of the train of thought, as Joyce explored in literature through the narrative structuring of "Ulysses".

This is not just a merging of frames, but an art of story structuring that allows the viewer to navigate through the deep layers of the character's emotions and associations, creating a deep dialogue between the viewer and the film's narrative. Thus, film becomes a medium in which the cinematic form assumes the role of continuing the exploration of human thought, similar to the development of the figurative line of Japanese hieroglyphs mentioned by Joyce.

In cinematography, leadership involves orchestrating the dialogue between you and your creation, highlighting the complexity of thinking of a key character who can play your part in certain circumstances.

The cinematic form of a monologue highlights the idea that when you experience otherness through cinema, you can discover a new form of visual empathy, thus stimulating your ability to play a certain role in certain circumstances.

The Circle That Closes All Paths

On April 02, 2008

It adds immense significance to your leadership, without losing sight of the perfect human ideal that other people carry in their souls.

I want to start this article by talking about a historical moment that has the famous Russian general Alexander Suvorov at the center of the action. The precious victories at Trebia, Novi, and Cassano had extinguished the enthusiasm of his army. The vanguard no longer wanted to go to France. Suvorov addressed his soldiers, but no one listened. Everything seemed lost. Not if he had used any powerful means to bring the rebels back into subjection.

Suvorov took eight sergeants and ordered them to dig a pit. After 10 minutes the pit was ready, much to the amazement of the entire army that gathered in a circle, climbing the two hillsides along the road.

Then Suvorov dismounted, broke his sword, and threw it into the pit; he tore off his epaulets, one by one, and threw them into the pit; then he took the decorations that covered his chest and threw them over his sword and epaulets. At last, undressing to his skin, he lay down in the pit himself, shouting aloud:

- Cover me with earth and leave your general here ! You are no longer my children; I am no longer your parent; there is nothing left for me but to die !

At these words, spoken in such a loud voice that they had been heard by the whole army, the Russian soldiers leaped into the pit weeping, and lifted the general into their arms, begging him to forgive them and lead them into battle against the enemy.

- That's more like it ! Suvorov shouted. "I recognize my children." Against the enemy ! Against the enemy !

Leadership: Is your position based on a persuasive power that reflects your fear of losing something that is important to you, especially if you are unsure of how others around you feel?

A leader never gives up his position. When you want to strengthen your relationships with those you lead, never give up your position. Suvorov did not give up his position. But he persuaded his soldiers to believe in him, convinced them by the power of suggestion, by his will, that his position was the key to success in that difficult time.

A leader who does not rely on his persuasive power, who does not know how to maintain his position, is like a racing driver in the competition of his life, whose car runs out of fuel. Once you have built relationships with people and moved to a higher level of performance, never give up or neglect those relationships.

Leadership is like a circle that closes all the other people's paths – the paths stemming from the center or outskirts, and vice versa. I say this because the only way to win people over to your side is to dispel any confusion about your way of achieving your goals and correct them, by your will, by faith, by the power of persuasion and suggestion, by highlighting their potential – in one direction, the one you want.

The indicator towards a path to be followed is the personal example that best reflects your leadership position. You need to be a role model for people, to give them a better understanding of the essence of your leadership. And I believe that your attitude towards people's opinions, expectations and perspectives determines their attachment to you. If you let people gain ground in front of your leadership, it means that your level of influence is superficial. It adds immense significance to your leadership, without losing sight of the perfect human ideal that other people carry in their souls.

Leadership: Do people react bravely to the dynamics of your own deterministic nature reflected in historical consciousness, or are you like a "wheel that spins alone" on the unpredictable path that opens before you?

How do you guide people in the direction you choose? What steps should you take to positively influence their direction of travel? (How can you influence their development prospects? Remember that the element that has the biggest impact on your performance is the level of leadership you have in relation to each person. That's why I ask you: how do people react to the change imposed by you?

You can't be accepted as a leader if people don't understand you, can you? People cannot give you a minimum of confidence if you do not have some roots in their existence, in their will, in their judgment, in their behavior, if your vision does not correspond to the values that guide them on the path to performance and success. Thus, judge well the values that guide people before you take the step that brings you closer to them.

Give your leadership a chance if you want to keep your position longer. To do this, you need to enter into the inner world of other people, to approach them morally and emotionally, to read their deepest feelings, showing them the significance of the mission, its importance, and the reasons why they need to keep getting involved with increasing momentum. Your attitude and ability to adapt to each situation is the key to the whole process of polishing your leadership.

Leadership is what makes you feel strong and followed by other people, when the time of history feeds on your decision making.

The Circle That Closes All Paths actually reveals the mobilization of other people for action, for good results, for a reality in which life is no longer limited to "surviving", but to contributing to the achievement of a great goal capable of making history. All who follow the leader faithfully (to the end) close the circle of trust on which the leader relies, feeling compelled to act in the name of a cause that often removes the punishable nature of an act.

The Circle

On March 21, 2016

Learn to represent yourself in a context of your concrete shape of self-expression, throughout time, in the relationship between the fundamental identity units "Origins and Consequences."

I did everything in my power to keep away from the eyes of the world this personal side, like a quiet and discreet alchemist, not divulging to anyone the results of my life experiences, between the history of a moment of loneliness and the searing thirst for eternity. Without in fact realizing that the limits of reality (which I called "the realm of thoughts") were what defined me and in their absence, there was but an empty space left, a mystical product of imagination, a place with no escape from the deep coma called life.

Man has only one distinct, circular DNA molecule, a close union of carbon, hydrogen and oxygen, combined with living energy, going in the direction of what is called the soul, an illusion perpetuated only by the faith in something that rises above the earth and up towards infinity. Behold my personal side: a counter-sense in which everything is read backwards, from the ephemeral towards the eternal, depending on the various states of the Ego.

Leadership is the boundary between what is given to you to experience by the power of thoughts and what is given to you to accept as a compromise from the tension of the struggle between the noble character of the facts of life and the awareness of an essential fragility in handling reality.

Faithful to myself, the soul wrestled with destiny, occasioning the meeting between "something different in each one now" and "I will always belong to a different moment". This blind assassin of the passing towards fullness, towards the eternal adventure of seeking the freedom of performing the secret link with life through the power of the Unexplained, allowed me, with true essence, the concomitant measuring of everything the world stands for. With the full belief in something that goes off and turns back on by itself, I walked in the found footsteps of the mysterious and precious matter manifested ever since the Origins up to Consequences.

Sometimes, everything went dark before my eyes and I had to evade the light of day, and then, the unpredictable would happen. Magic, strictly selective, performed its command duties. Fatigue, melancholy, desires, hesitations, all spilled out in my head like a tornado full of memories and bewildering sensations, at the same time seething in a passion of the dream, of euphoria, of love, which, with a little courage, I could master, but in the way in which the alchemist finds matter and prepares it for sacrifice.

After all, what is it you want of me, you who best yield any principle and ended material of all that is known?

Leadership: Do you limit yourself only to the controlling of the attitude that expresses itself in ways more or less significant, or to the part of content that you plan to show to the world?

Doctor Nicholas of Cusa, from the work of the finnish writer Mika Waltari, wanted to demonstrate that the bounded and unbounded world, the finite and infinite meet. He started off with a mathematical example. If within a circle is inscribed a polygon, whose number of sides increases more and more, until it reaches an infinite number of sides, so small that they lack almost any size, then the polygon will touch with the circle in all points and will become a circle.

This is how the idea behind my reason for reformulating the coordinates of thinking about my status as a "creator of thoughts in an endless story" could be expressed. My mad passion for shaping my personal side, through a fifth element, associated between the moment of eternity I was experiencing and the calming of the longing for an uplifting space to which I could belong for a long time, now worthy of "the infinite", was a clear proof that I started to see the world from the perspective of a nonlinear approach of phenomena and processes.

The part of content that I have tried to display in the world by the power to transpose the most abstract thoughts into words, noticing that part of reality that often remains inaccessible to others, captures that obsessive search for the authenticity and completeness of my being that wants to be lucid in every moment of its existence. I have learned to relate to what I do, to what I see in myself, to what I have in my track record, to what I am blessed with, much more than what happens in my life or that can mark me in any way.

Leadership: Do you plan your thoughts well in order to form an authentic vision of your own person so that you gain access to a different perception of the temporality of an elevated consciousness?

I was circumscribed to a circle that revolved endlessly around its own center, repeating for eternity. Without my realizing it, something disputed its supremacy over me. The All-encompassing or the Insignificant?

The authentic vision of my own person, subjected to some test of respect for what motivated me internally, was implicitly confirmed by the experimental madness of a silence that was counted as the response of my mind to the life situations I was facing daily. In fact, I was beginning to think of myself as a character who plays his role in the narrated world of a text meant to convey a subtle message, belonging to the writer Ioan Romoșa: "The greatness of man lies in the despair of his lucidity accepted and exceeded by his very lucidity."

In this case, the sphere of your own functionality is not only limited to controlling the attitude that expresses itself in ways more or less significant to change the reality, usually called personalization the experience of managing the thoughts, but especially to the part of content you plan to show to the world, in the relationship between the fundamental identity units "Origins and Consequences."

The origin represents the point where you look around and don't know where you are, being confused by the lack of experience in representing order in thoughts and actions. And consequences are the result of the attempt to fit the depiction of the man steadfast in his difficult purpose, with the risk of heading towards the reality of a time that little by little empties itself of your future.

The temporality of an elevated consciousness is emphasized by the subjectivity with which man has become accustomed to observing his thoughts.

He tends to share his story, emotions, anytime or with anyone, specifying that what liberates him from any tension and really motivates him is that supreme being who passes through intermediate states towards its perfect, absolute, thinking and manifestation form.

The Circle highlights the repetition of all those obsessive thoughts man runs continuously in the background, this modeling his hidden side, until it becomes the center of all his natural powers.

The function of authenticity, independent of any source of representation of man in a context of his concrete shape throughout time, needs a support platform that can make him be more in control of his own beliefs and, automatically, to guarantee him a certain long-term coverage.

You are the host of your own beliefs, placing yourself on a certain level of consciousness correspondent with that personal side that others cannot see. Leadership emerges from the way in which you perceive life and the world, right in front of you. What is important is the way in which you see yourself depending on the various states of the Ego, between the history of a moment of loneliness and the searing thirst for eternity.

The Clumsy Weaver Does Not Match The Warp Threads Evenly

On December 21, 2012

The more you try to force your will on others, the more you will find that things do NOT go your way.

Finally, I, Samuel Gelb, begin to have bad luck. Nothing works for me anymore. I have never had to deal with things so rebellious and so difficult to submit to the human will. Genius himself is powerless. The three beings I wanted to master escape me simultaneously. At this hour, Olympia is surely on her way, carrying my projects in her luggage. As for Julius, his appearance under a false name in the Carbonari organization, half provoked by myself, is perhaps against my will, definitively condemned, and the Prussian ambassador passes through a real danger of death, long before the time and occasion which my mind had established.

I'm ahead of Julius, I'm behind Frederique. Here comes an intruder to challenge me before I have taken my defensive measures. I didn't want to ask her for a wife before I had the strength and wealth that could make up for what I lack in youth and physical appearance. I toiled for her without telling her, and while I was preparing for her a better and happier fate, a fool who did nothing for her, who was simply born with all that I strive to conquer by intelligence and my bravery, a child, came in and perhaps stole all my hope, all my joy, all my dream. Like a clumsy weaver, I did not match the threads of the warp equally, losing sight of one side to work on another, and behold, the cloth breaks in the most precious place.

Samuel got up full of hostile thoughts, took a few steps across the desk and went to the mirror, staring at himself, eye to eye. Had I really resigned myself? He thought to himself with a kind of fierce anger and hatred. How will you proceed in order to recover the lost time on the one hand and on the other hand to curb the too hasty time? Try to make a quick decision. If not, think about it, here's what threatens you: Julius can die at any moment, struck by the dagger of some Carbonaro, or suddenly fall due to exhaustion. As it stands, all the fortune would go to Lothario. Then, there would be only one way left to have a part of the inheritance: marry Frederique to the heir, and rely, in order to live, on the generosity of the man and the gratitude of the woman.

Leadership: How do you proceed to recover the lost time on the one hand and on the other hand to curb the too hasty time, so that your will is fulfilled by itself?

Death and curse ! he exclaimed, striding across the office. That was all I needed to end up like this: to end up at the mercy of a housekeeper. Therefore, the intelligence, the courage, the bravery, the disregard of human and divine laws, and on the other hand all the care that I gave to this precious being, all the tenderness and all the devotion that I showed to him, let everything come to an end in such an infamous way? Shall I eat the crumbs they would care to throw at me?

No, I'm not going to get bogged down in this vile denouement. I will fight. But perhaps I am exaggerating the danger, and I am anxious as if I had proof that Frederique is in love with this young man. How stupid ! I only saw him for a quarter of an hour. It is too proud a thread to cling to the neck of the first comer. She certainly doesn't love him. If he loves me? He knows me, he sees me every day, he intuits me, maybe.

Does the leadership you use arise in the circumstance where, for one reason or another, you become a kind of scientist of the mind, but also a kind of "stab" in the heart of others?

And so the conclusion that arises from this stage of private life, among people who weave intrigues and create anxiety around themselves, is this: when your will rises above the expectations of others, then the will itself acquires fear and aggression. You will be ready for anything, so that Your will is fulfilled through you and in all your actions, so that you end up wanting nothing more than to experience that unique sensation that only a quality fantasy can offer – the achievement of the impossible "as if through magic"?

In fact, leadership acquires a tinge of gray through the prism of the disappointment that the denouement of the intrigues you weave and the traps you lay along the story called "life", a story that you can dictate, you can influence to your will, but you cannot change its trajectory by falsifying reality.

In this case you will end up like that hero who, through a breach in his "reality", reaches the all-powerful condition of the writer of lives, whose entire knowledge becomes derisive as he denies his qualities, comparing them to those of his characters. This also depends on individuality and psyche.

The Clumsy Weaver Does Not Match The Warp Threads Evenly, and because of this he falls into his own trap: he himself becomes the victim of his own warps, because he turns into a space of complete anxiety, an emotional burden that produces stress, damaging health.

The Collector Of Paintings

On January 04, 2012

Integrate into your leadership a plus of greatness, reinforcing everything that it is essential at you.

Towards the end of the movie "Pretty Woman (1990,)" the multimillionaire, Edward Lewis, whose only "gift" were the impossible relations, proposes to Vivian Ward (the lady companion that he had paid to spend the week with him) to stay one more night. But, why would she accept this proposal? Why to continue making illusions? Anyway, they must separate forever. So, she rejects his proposal:

- Look Edward, you've made to me a very good offer. And, a few months ago I would have accepted it, no problem. But, now everything is different and you have changed that. And you cannot change it back. I want more...

While making her luggage, Vivian seemed to say in her mind: "Yes, I want more ! Because I love you ! Because you are to me more beautiful, better and greater than all human beings ! I would like to share all my life the happiness with you. Only with you. I do not want to lose you, but I know that I have to destroy the supreme moments of happiness that you have offered me, that God gave me in the exchange for my endless prayers."

But, it was just a moment. I must be strong and to make this step. And, to forget about you, your generosity and your good taste - that flooded my whole being; to forget all the anger, to forget myself, to forget all that life has allowed me while I was yours - yes, yours and only yours; do not longer tie my heart of any hope, to forget that for a moment I felt myself as the most beautiful and the most admired woman in the world, to forget that you were everything to me, and to permanently delete yourself from my wish list. And, to turn again to what I was before, a poor prostitute, and to return to a life without emotions, without feelings, without content."

Leadership: Do you allow yourself the time necessary to strengthen your self-image belonging to a total loneliness that incessantly cries out to consciousness to renounce the pride of not owing anything to anyone?

A leader manifests all his interest towards leadership if his achievements and successes reflect the more comprehensively his own competencies. In the light of what he really is and what he will become, he puts all qualities, all resources, all knowledge in the service of a type of leadership that promote his welfare first.

The multimillionaire Edward Lewis was such a leader. He practiced a realistic leadership based on prudent policies, on efficiency, on leadership principles, and on strategies, on pragmatic approaches and forecasts - on the way he actually was, typical to a true businessman. However, for this no one has ever awarded his values !

For, when it comes to values, Lewis was alike an excellent builder, which builds up a lot of buildings, but who never finds time to consolidate his own house. He integrated in his leadership only those values that supported his optimal management performance, but these values did not have the right vibration in order to respond to certain circumstances by emotions. In simple words, he had no sentimental ideal.

The pride of not owing anything to anyone, along with the excessive care of your own image, outlines the outlook of a strong passion for what your duty of loyalty to the career requires, under the power of the need to be at the forefront of public attention. Thus, you are forced to put a lower price on that region of influence that is out of sight and that comes under the power of living in the state of acceptance of the spiritual-moral values that make you an exceptional being.

To feel the subtle taste of spiritual-moral values, such as harmony, devotion, generosity, understanding, patience, is to make life an open lesson full of teachings about what can happen when the precaution or balance principle is overlooked.

Leadership: Can you obtain a positive result from the investigation of your own nature in the content of a "page" you left?

As a leader, Lewis would have to put the foundation to his emotional structure, to reestablish properly his own spiritual experiences, emphasizing his own characteristic feelings. This investigation and gradual evaluation of his nature would have helped him to approach closely the leadership of quality - which incorporates some emotional elements with an especial potential.

Does your values worth getting the prize? Are you capable, through your leadership, to comprise the human intensity and dimension? Can you perceive the other people's inner impulse - just as a doctor perceives, by tactile sensations, the blood or the muscular pressure of the patients?

I do not think you will be able to establish and maintain relations with other people unless you will not gather together all your inner emotional forces that can act positively on them. If you isolate them, if you ignore them, you will not be able to lay bridges between your aspirations and theirs – you will remain only an avaricious collector among his paintings, looking straight at them with an insatiable lust all the time. In this way, it will open in your own destiny that threatening abyss that will separate you from all that is really essential in a leader: strength of mind.

If one day you suffer from boredom, when your good days are no more than an "invention of a mind freed of attachments", or if you are characterized by perpetual dissatisfaction and a constant quest to achieve new dimensions in performance, then make an effort and mimic an hourglass: learn to measure the passage of time with every turn of the page of life. A page that you just left.

The first step towards a radical change is to accept that the "rational" with which you measure all around you is very limited in the face of the possibilities of capitalizing on them.

The collector of paintings highlights your strong points and your weak points. It depends on how much you attach to the "art" that you admire and where you invest your values. Does the art that defines you, reflects more your managerial or emotional qualities?

Are you treating people as if they were paintings with different value? Or, as if they were some very valuable paintings that enchant and warm your soul? Or, you intended to be so avaricious that to treat them as if they were some pictures that do not express anything?

The soul's guiding mark of the "collector" Edward Lewis was Vivian. Do you need a "guiding mark" that would cultivate respect for your moral values, on which is supported the leadership of quality?

Extremely right was the one who said: "The only enemy of reason is you yourself. To be rational, you must win the battle with yourself."

Conclusion: A leader should harmoniously combine "the technical elements" of leadership with elements related to emotional issues that arise as a result of human relationships. A leader who lacks greatness is nothing but a collector of "selves" whose value he does not know and does not put them in value. By thinking purely technically, do not bring any benefit to you, but valuing Human Resources you can continue what you have started, and success will be by your side.

The Collector Of Secrets

Be above and beyond than those you lead, using your most powerful side of your leadership.

I like to perform. Magic. Ever since I was a child, I studied the art of using the scene, I learned the secret of catching the public's attention, as well as the way to enter its graces, with a show unique for its set and costumes, chosen with much inspiration, sometimes terrifying, authentic and very expressive. Especially, by the very good illusions, meant to amplify the mystery and curiosity of every spectator.

This is how I managed to get to the top of the hierarchy in my profession, just by an excellent presentation. When people watch my show, they are simply blinded by what they see, they are astonished by the impressive illusions I perform with such a great skillfulness. The power. It became reality.

I am a mysterious man, and the secrets are an intrinsic part of my activity. Many people want to know them. Even other magicians. However, the secrets are things you must look for and find them out. They are things that you have to twist on all sides, if you want to succeed in copying them.

Leadership: Do you get hindered by the clues that stand in front of you, because you got used to seeing them with the corner of your eye?

You need a great power in order to see beyond the illusions, to a deeper truth, which you may or may not understand. You need a great power of concentration in order to understand the mechanism of illusions, a mechanism which is, actually, one of my best-kept secrets. And like any other talented magician, who respects his trade, I will never reveal my secrets.

Sometimes I feel that I am the holder of a special power - the unlimited resources of magic, of darkness and light, able to convert all to my advantage, anything trivial in pure energy. Maybe because a lot of people struggles to find out how I create my illusions, and only I know the answer.

People start getting hindered by the clues in front of them because they are used to seeing them with the corner of their eye, or, to be exact, they are not even paying attention to the trick behind my image. Obviously, my advantage is that I have always known to keep a certain inaccessibility based on a forced interpretation of a representation of the real and whole type, an absolute that manifests itself through the virtue of being a good wielder of hypnotizing clichés.

Leadership: Does your model of discretion take into account the fact that in order to be identifiable, the phenomenon of "power" needs to be perceived through the evolution of its forms of regularity?

People start making more and more statements about my terrible "powers". However, I will continue concealing everything from everybody, I will be silent. I will continue to play my part as a wizard, hiding my secrets and letting the others die of curiosity. For nothing in the world I will not reveal my vulnerable side. Thus, I will always be above everybody else, and I will impress them with my craftiness.

With my secrets, I will be able to conquer the world. Like a real artist, I will devote myself to the art of illusionism with all my being. I will be able to fascinate people forever, pleasing them with my special gift and, and just like a defiant boy eager to launch into battle, I will ignore all their feelings.

But for that I must always transform myself into another being, to always get another look, to always create other formulas, other situations, to generate constantly other metaphors, to embody always other characters, to create ever new axioms for my power of influence and persuasion to never disappear. I will keep my secrets very well. I will keep them, and then I will abuse them with regularity. I will use them for my personal ideal. I like to feel they have what they lack completely to others: the shine.

Leadership: Can you change what you really think about yourself and the reality you are moving in by following the orderly existence of a rupture of the emotions you promote?

At my last show, I had observed, or I had imagined that I had observed, a vague tension in the attitude of some spectators, as if, in their minds, there was an unwanted, but bothersome, thought. I had the feeling that they wanted to learn what was in my soul, to forcefully rip the secrets I did not want to share with anybody. But it was not that.

How blind and ignorant I had been until then. I was rather paying more attention to obtaining spectacular results and less on how people feel. The reality was different, that not everybody adored my illusions. I cannot escape this truth, I cannot hide from it. My secrets have no value if the world does not adore my show.

Leadership: Do the situations you go traverse through the obligation of not divulging the content of your own creation correspond to the underlying state of the world you're in when you see the reflection of your own imperfection?

Just like a magician, a man who wants control of the situation focuses on two things: first, to hide their secrets so that people do not lose interest in him. Second, to collect as many secrets, so that the power of influence to grow, and so his "representations" to be more successful.

This is the great truth that nobody recognizes that everyone fails to mention: the leaders are, from a certain point of view, magicians. Absolutely all leaders have their secrets well kept. And to know how to make better use of their secrets, the more successful "performance" that they claim. A leader without secrets is like a chicken that does not egg, and "chuckles" of helplessness.

The sole thought which obsesses a leader is for him not to remain alone, not followed by anyone. Can someone say that it is not so? Therefore, his noble intention is for things to be done efficiently and well.

There is a risk that the leader, just like any magician, he fears: that his show be brought to the point imagined by him as the highest point, but the spectators to be unimpressed, clapping their hands with no enthusiasm. And this is an alarm signal. It means that his efficiency started to fade away.

A magician's world is the measuring unit of information that remains hidden.

The underlying state of this world, when he sees the reflection of his own imperfection, is the indicator of a crisis situation that coincides with the difficulty to concentrate, the retreat within one's self, emotionally walling in, avoidance of friendly activities, and social isolation.

Conclusion: Every professional, just like every leader, has his secrets, secrets, which are, actually, the fruit of his work and experience of years on end and, of course, there is no reason for these secrets to be shared to others. However, it can be said that they are the "power" of the leader, and it is desired at any cost to others who will never give up to "take" this power, even on unorthodox ways or means.

The secrets are actually the most effective structure of leadership; it constitutes the most powerful side of a leader. If you want to be more important than all, and to keep your power of influence, transform your leadership in a real show using your knowledge and skills in a constructive way.

P.S. Leaders are genuine collectors of secrets that they should keep fiercely and to use them effectively.

The Collector of Souls

On April 11, 2010

Reinforce the field of your own greatness, so as to connect yourself to the reality of beliefs of those around you.

Spring came quickly. Fram, which reached 83°20' North latitude, was now surrounded by large stretches of ice. Nansen, the captain of the ship, whose desire for years was to try to reach the North Pole on sledges pulled by dogs, called one night the entire crew in order to notify them of the importance of the new mission which he had to accomplish at all costs, by the name of science. They all listened to him tensely. After making his plan known in detail, Nansen announced that only one person can go in that journey with him. Even so, who could that person be?

As, all twelve subordinates who fervently loved and respected him, volunteered.

Nevertheless, having decided long before, Nansen made the following announcement:

- I thought about taking Johansen as a companion in my journey, the man fits in all respects. He's an excellent skier and unequaled in terms of resistance.

Then, Nansen's sharp look, which had the power to convey to anyone an important dose of courage, went towards Johansen, whom he prevented:

- Before you decide to rush into such a mission, you must think well, Johansen ! Weight things a day or two, and only then give me your final answer.

But, Nansen hardly finished his words when Johansen, considering a great honor to be chosen to go on the journey, he replied eagerly:

- No need to think twice, captain, I will follow you anywhere !

Leadership: At your call, are people worthy of the honor of your presence?

A man whose sole preoccupation is to please and serve you is a soul you perfectly master. However, a man who has included you in his generous soul, you owe it to cherish it and directing it toward fulfillment of common desires.

It rarely happens, the writer Alexandre Dumas noticed one day, for a thing ardently desired not be ardently defended by those lingering for it.

The indescribable joy which animated Johansen was more eloquent than any words, and doubled by an exuberant optimism regarding the future, encouraged him to courageously rush into an adventure in which he risked dying at any time, killed by polar bears, frost or starvation. Nansen couldn't find a better companion because in the ski expedition to the North Pole, Johansen proved to be very helpful.

Quickly accepting Nansen's proposal, without taking second thoughts, Johansen wanted to show him that he wanted with all his soul to be his indispensable help, his right hand, his most reliable man, thus expressing his special admiration and respect that he nourished for him. Johansen awaited this moment with great anxiety and pride, the decisive moment when he could prove his loyalty.

Leadership is the call to adventure emanated by the man enlivened by the unique determination to fight to the end for the materialization of an insane idea.

How could he not be seized by strong emotions when, from a very experienced crew, from so many courageous people who were ready to undergo everything for their leader, only one of them, him, Johansen, was chosen to be Nansen's companion in this journey? Only one thing can increase esteem and respect of people for their leader, namely the honor of being beside him in a very important moment.

I wonder what strange influence would bring people in the state of accepting to rush into the unknown, even towards death, with a tremendous passion? As, when you find yourself for nights, days and months in an isolated land, thrown into nothingness, you can get seized by a terrible fear of which you cannot escape once you contemplate the endless surroundings of glaciers and snow. However, a mysterious force pushed Johansen to participate in this unprecedented mission, the one of reaching in two the North Pole on skis.

Leadership: Do you create your chance to be closer to that "plus one" that adapts to what you are and do you feel the terms and conscience possibility of a consciousness based on the experience of years spent in the course of missions?

I found the need for an alternative to the leadership style approached, through which people can realize the strong character of their leader, only on mature and very realistic people, who can make extreme turns in any kind of circumstances.

There is no age, limits or deadlines to jump into the void, into the unknown, but there is only the opening in front of our own greatness, while allowing others to raise to a new consciousness of unconditional, free and pure "to be", to balance out any inequality of status. Consciousness is "the tool" that gives people whom you lead an overview of their own attachment and relationship forces, the only one allowing or forbidding them to position themselves in the same direction of travel with you.

Are people guided by that tool that indicate "forward" or "backward"?

Before moving in a new direction reinforce the field of your own greatness, so as to connect yourself to the reality of beliefs of those around you.

When you try to establish an unforeseen record, you must take into account the guiding potential of the action plans that underlie each and every one of your counter-candidates.

The unmeasured admiration that people feel for their leader determines them to muster up all their courage and follow him all the way through with an unstoppable enthusiasm. Johansen never forgot the sublime courage Nansen proved when he was the first to cross Greenland on skis, a rough country, unexplored until that moment, setting up an unusual record. He never forgot that Nansen won big competitions twelve years in a row, that he was a world champion in speed skating, being covered with glory and honor.

Undoubtedly, Johansen would have been able to die for Nansen, his gratitude felt such an urge to break out, and that's why he accepted without hesitation to follow him in the long and dangerous journey towards the North Pole. For a man, whose worth being well-known by everybody, which acquired such a brilliant reputation can't be only a man gifted with great qualities, a strong man who can overcome any barrier, who can overcome any limits.

The Collector of Souls is the leader who attracts near him only those people interested in the same world as he is, a world of finalities and expected effects.

A leader must carefully choose his "aid" or "aids", which can be achieved only through an extensive knowledge, a permanent collaboration and implicitly through knowing the egos with a strong personality that surrounds him. Therefore, the leader must be a genuine "collector of souls" by carefully selecting and recruiting people and their deep knowledge.

And the more people will be attracted to the leader's personality, his ideas and plans, the more the leader will have a greater influence upon them and the more they will better mobilize in order to achieve common goals.

The Color Of An Exceptional Visual Representation

On March 14, 2022

The artist who gives consistency to his themes of reflection emphasizes that sensitivity projected on the stable self, which does not change regardless of reality.

A color can be dominant in a painting when it is used more as a way to communicate and share something in my field of sensitivity, maybe something in the universe of my madness. But this warm, simple, finely differentiating color is not important to draw attention to detail: the skill, imagination, creativity with which I was endowed to elevate an image to the heights of artistic greatness, but to move away from what the experimenter of ideas calls "errors in indicating the possibility of knowledge".

There was always something missing from my search: contact with myself, with the force of expression, deep contact with that sentimental energy that can release its power by sharing a transfiguration of the soul. And that was because I was just a landscape experimenter working hard in the open air, endowed with the most sensitive part of a poor soul, but I wasn't a thoroughbred explorer who practiced the arts of transparency in an all-encompassing metaphor.

As for color, as it is expressed in the field of my expressionist-abstract compositions, it admirably folds on the sensitivity and receptivity shown to the feelings of others, according to a Shatapsettian Synnem(a first encounter of the intellect with the Great Light). It is enough to reproduce it in the light of the evocation of a moment like "Who would have thought?" to complete an experience of self-individualization.

A man will never be able to call himself an artist without finding his own color that complements his beauty and emphasizes, for example, the strong character traits with which nature has generously rewarded him.

Leadership: Can you highlight the expression of your ideal self in the relative form of a creation experienced in the "hidden" of a world that depicts reality by capturing the non-material essence of a perfect creator?

As a visible reflection of the sun on the earth, the color of amber gives me visibility in the space of reflection of a formula of emancipation in terms of style of expression. It is precisely because of this style that I have tried, so many times, to stand out through subtle brushstrokes and vibrated chromatic games. What Simona Popescu wrote in the novel "Exuvii" comes as a kind of completion of this color, synonymous with the emotion of the expression that my face expresses in the field of the image of an artist who has a special talent and can plastically express what can be done through art:

"I could hear the color, and it sounded like rustling. I was spreading over the green, I was a strand of dark green over the pale green velvet like a caterpillar. I was a thread that was being crocheted by an aunt in a woolen jacket. I was the thread and I was curling up. A lacer, some needles turned me into a thick pattern or a lace foam. And so on..."

Likewise, in the center of the image inscribed in my creation, which I describe in the quietest, most vibrant and bright words, is that sensitivity with which the chromatic values and the dialogue between things and the soul are harmonized. How can I penetrate the deep meaning of my individuality reflected in a stylized image of the reunion with myself, if I do not know how to reproduce the color of a visual representation overflowing with concreteness, of the flow of life from the surface of a troubled soul?

The non-material essence of a perfect creator proceeds from the development of a visual representation in the foreground of which is the embodiment of his soul, captured by the addition of colors that maintain their intensity over time.

And leadership has the same quality as the colors in my creation: it is of great purity, even when mixed with various fragments of my particular life.

The Color Of An Exceptional Visual Representation, designated by the expression of the ideal self, can be characterized by: hue (chromatic ambiance specific to a painting), brightness (intensity) and saturation (purity).

Here I am referring to a tone-on-tone technique that does not take into account the intermediate shading in which one character or another of my creations is located, but rather takes into account the need to facilitate a visual representation where the real is completely exposed by unnecessary ornaments, as is the essence of a single-colored object (for example, a green leaf).

This technique emphasizes the sensitivity that affects the stable self, which does not change regardless of reality.

The Complete Picture Of Reputation

On January 27, 2009

Invest carefully in the engine of your excellence, so that you can guarantee its functioning at the best parameters.

To whom are you appealing first when you get sick? To the doctor, obviously. However, not to any doctor who provides consultations, is not it? But, to a doctor who can really indicate your way of healing. The fame enjoyed by the doctor and the confidence in its specialized knowledge is, in fact, what it makes you appeal at him.

A good doctor should not ever make mistakes, should not ever provide an inappropriate treatment because, by committing an error, loses his reputation and diminishes the trust that people have in him.

What is your favorite chewing gum? Perhaps, Orbit, is not it? But why did you choose Orbit and not another chewing gum? Most likely because Orbit offers you an increased protection against caries compared with other types of chewing gum. The confidence in the quality of the product and the guarantee that you will never have caries determined you to invest money in it.

The respect and care for each customer has made the great company Wrigley to reach a market share of 96% of the chewing gum segment, of which 65% only with the brand Orbit. If, they would not put on first place the human health, Wrigley could not never ever become a truly great company, and could ever be able to create a better reputation than of the other competitors on the market.

Leadership: Does the preference you develop for a sum of attributes and tangible features, gathered in an identifiable form, offer the possibility of maintaining a certain degree of autonomy in your area of affirmation?

The ascension that you impose upon yourself by bringing together all the resources and know-how that allows exploration of a particular market segment harmonizes with what you offer better than others through a 100% continuous service.

I could give you many examples, from various areas, where some products or some services offered by certain people or certain companies are more popular and more preferred than others. Nevertheless, I would not do it because I would probably fill some good pages.

I can only say: to be appreciated you must have an unusual power of attracting many supporters around them, and to be able to build an enviable reputation. You must have a strong power of conviction, an extraordinary capacity to solve problems, to inspire confidence for others to appeal to your help.

Ascension in any field must be seen from the perspective of the construction and use of a machine, beyond the "age" it goes out of warranty: it needs a special type of wheel that never gets replaced. The wheel suggests the perpetual motion that no one can measure and manage at the same time, is an invention that helps you make progress towards changing the world.

Leadership: Do you need to evaluate the usefulness of a certain approach to see if what you are transmitting seems to match the difference between value and attitude?

Moreover, you have to create an enviable reputation if you want to make known on the market your products or services. However, the reputation is not built in a natural way, without moving any finger. You cannot expect to succeed in a field, and to form a sound name if you do not win the people's confidence, if you do not get a greater credibility in the eyes of all.

Attitude is the reaction and position of individuals over what they see in an advertisement. The value of a product is what the ad is trying to sell by suggesting a strong emotion in which the stupor and fragility of the present moment is intertwined with the revelation of a gained time, or with the resizing of privileged moments left only in memory.

My opinion with regard to marketing is that value must be produced as much as possible by the exteriorization of attitude. A sophisticated attitude denotes the certainty of delivering a qualitative product.

In marketing it is a saying: "The customers know you better than you know yourself". Your professional knowledge and the quality of the services that you provide influence in good your reputation. It is a sign of respect and admiration when people appeal to your help/ services, therefore, you should not ever disappoint them. You could say that you are an excellent specialist in the area in which you perform your activity, only when you will win the competition and when you will attain that enviable reputation, especially acknowledged by those from your branch.

Your reputation is like an engine that starts once you get positioned in the relationship with people. Moreover, this engine, designed specifically for your professional development, is a major consumer of reliability and security - and it is not allowed to stop once put in operation.

Invest carefully in the engine of your excellence so that you can guarantee its functioning at the best parameters.

Leadership is what you leave behind after you have assured your customers the guarantee of a quality and affordable product called: "FORWARD".

The Composer's Ability To Penetrate The Essence Of The Cinematic Image

On April 17, 2012

Creative approaches in exploring emotional sensitivity allow the director to create a visual expression that enriches the cinematic experience.

And then, yes, yes, this composer, the most cerebral of contemporary composers, has a heart, and a hot one at that. His wife told how much sensitivity was hidden in this extremely impressionable artist, to what extent reading this book could lead him to identify with her characters, suffering together with them, often with tears in his eyes. And in those difficult years, Ehrenburg remembers, the composer was sad, even gloomy, telling him once: "Now you have to work . Only work ! This is the refuge..."

Eisenstein values him in the highest degree. He sees in his compositions the laconic and precise style of Stendhal, which...can only be compared to Stendhal. He is fascinated by the composer's ability to penetrate the essence of the cinematic image. It is a phenomenon that he is trying to understand, to penetrate its secret, its mechanism. And he is amused by the coincidence of the bewilderment of his driver who declared to him one day: " Now I understand how films are made. That's all I know about . I do n't understand one thing : I don't understand how Sergheevici writes music. I don't understand that."

Leadership: Can you slip the subtle imprint of your vision into every frame of your work, attuning images from visual stimuli to the wavelength of your character?

Although the cinematographic phenomenon has for a long time suggested the idea of obtaining images that can be preserved in the memory of time, although, as technology develops and the "production" of films is perfected, the need to invent a process that it allows the actual recording of the "sensibility" of the director, not just the characters. The innovative procedures in the film offer new possibilities for the transmission of the director's emotions, so that the images of the different scenes in the film, encouraging through the transmitted message, are obtained through less intense colors, with the exclusion of black and white as much as possible.

Together with the strong development of the natural sciences, the science of cinematography also develops. The director selects the elements and gives them a new, harmonized face on the wavelength of his character. Just as every painter leaves a small personal signature in the corner of the painting, but which can only be perceived with the trained eye of an expert, so the director sneaks his subtle imprint in every frame, leaving his signature through fine details and well-thought-out aesthetic decisions .

Leadership: Does your foray into the wonderland of the imaginary allow you to harmonize the images of life with the sensibility of your own personality, to bring out the essence of a profound visual experience?

Thus, in his year of glory, the director Serghei Eisenstein highlights and researches the property of some chemical substances to change their color under the action of light. In the end, he manages to introduce numerous scenic effects into cinematography, with the help of a method of exploring his sensibility, namely through a rich theme anchored in the works of the Russian forefathers, for whom he had a special esteem. Capturing the director's sensibility brings an authentic dimension to the films.

At the same time, he explored the sensibility of his own personality through cinematography, through an analytical foray into the wonderland of the imaginary, making his own imagination a tool for deep and innovative visual storytelling. The director's research and innovations were later taken up by other filmmakers; they focused on color changes under the action of harmonizing illumination and on bringing into contact "light" sensitized character models with the help of chromatic effects, such as color filters or special exposure techniques. The images obtained in these ways seemed to be imbued with a visual sophistication that offered a special cinematic experience.

The visual expression of sensibility substantially enriches the emotional experience, only if the final creation highlights a visual theme that resonates with the audience.

The composer's ability to penetrate the essence of the cinematic image refers to his sensitivity to capture emotional subtleties through music or stage effects that primarily reflect his own personality. Creative approaches to exploring emotions lead to remarkable visual innovations. Obviously, visual expression requires a creative approach to effectively communicate the desired emotions.

The Compositional Effects Of Advanced Science

Identify the composition of all the old and new scientific elements in their organic whole so as to get the desired meaning effects.

Montage reaches its full effect through the composite feeling of all those elements in their organic whole. In order to do this, director Eisenstein intensifies the content of every "harmonic resonator". Actually, the sequence was also the resonance of an impression from his childhood, when he assisted in the sweltering summer of 1914, to the procession of the consecration of the church of Staraya Russa. This vivid impression constituted the basis for his procession in the movie "Old and New."

Or another simpler example: the mowing race scene. The various frames of the montage contain a single motion from one part of the frame to the other. "And I laughed when I saw the most sensitive spectators swaying from side to side, increasingly faster, as frames were shortened. The effect was the same as that of a fanfare running a simple march."

The concept of the great directors filming comes forward from a text of his collaborator's, Tisse, who sums it up like so: *"Our goal is to achieve artistic and technical effects through completely new methods, filming reality with simplicity."***

Leadership: Do you encounter limiting resistance of what you can and can't do during the implementation of a "default" type of approach which produces novelty effects in the setting of a directing exam?

What meaning can a genuine creation have that is itself the result of an association between distinct elements corresponding to one pole of reference? In leadership, uniting elements can lead to something more than its component parts, constituting from the perspective of the necessary conditions of an appropriate montage, the keystone of a phase of transition to a more advanced stage of science finishing.

The effect you want to get from your audience is related to the perception of the reality reflected by the image of the essence of a directing element. Some directing elements can be represented by: exchanges of replicas, scenic movement, compulsory musical element, framing of actors in a certain context, clothing, rapid orientation in a certain direction, etc.

You cannot naturally build, with simplicity, an image of a unity of science, especially at the peak of knowledge, if its old and new elements don't remove the deficiencies and disadvantages of the discontinuity between them. This discontinuity, the passing from one field of application to another, by association, may result in the emergence of limiting resistances of what you can and cannot do, which produces a sort of confusion in defining and using a new "default" type of approach.

A "default" type of approach is a very important step for the evolution of leadership, a representation of a conceptual framework on three levels: principles, strategies and methods that can provide continuously and without variations a clear understanding of what you transmit by means of your vision and experience. Your creation is precisely the equivalent of what you transmit and the attached meaning, relying heavily on feedback from others.

Can your leadership fall into a matrix of meanings which bring into focus a more consistent scientific meaning?

In leadership, the quality term has a broader meaning comprising a technical side, strictly linked to the characteristics of the "product" of development and the impact you promote. And the value of this product is represented by the applied elements of reference, which give essence, influence and a certain meaning to follow in its realization.

Authority in the field, in practicing science, you can get when the ration between old and new elements is appropriate, so when they do not behave as antagonistic and competing. Which means that the most commonly used element has the tendency to reject the weakest.

Montage is an important step in achieving a scientific construction, but also a practice that causes a re-composition of the conceptual landscape, putting in the relationship between ideas and research, in the sphere of using the constituting elements, certain effects of meaning.

Leadership can fit into a matrix of meanings which bring to the fore a more consistent scientific meaning, only if your conceptions vis-à-vis "creation", used in the context of affirmation of a new philosophy, can be considered relevant for the training of others.

A more consistent scientific meaning attributed to personal creation can be replayed by the sum of the meanings of the component elements of a montage that allows sudden shifting from one frame to another, but in such a way as to ensure cohesion between absolute truth and relative truth.

The Compositional Effects Of Advanced Science are the consequences of well-constructed reasoning that is borne by your uniqueness in the field of leadership. They aim to develop leadership from core components established by predecessors, which must be harmoniously combined with modern and current ones, while giving it a personal touch that makes it unique and dazzling, worthy of being appreciated.

The Conditionings Of Leadership

On March 30, 2017

Man's reason to demonstrate his right to existence is fulfilled when he assigns a higher purpose where there is only consequence.

Everything within me asked for a truthful answer, a guiding comparison between a world visible on a wide spectrum of medicine and a world invisible through the unclear spectrum of a biological phenomenon, worthy of science-fiction, called Zombies, with increasingly sophisticated and diverse threats that enormously complicated my life. This, to the extent in which I could not manifest my skepticism for the strange events, superior to the distinction between good and evil.

Death was represented all around me and it was a consequence of the inability to interpret an accumulation of errors and collateral effects.

You could say that the deepest essence that kept me in a constant state of alert, as a mysterious fluid traveling through the effect of alternative pulsations to which I was subjected, born out of pretending to be a geneticist, was a new reality of the relationship of experience-modelling of the contexts of spreading the virus – a condition necessary for the progress of knowledge. All of this cost me an emotional imbalance that still persists.

Here is a valuable clue. My main quality, that of a man surpassing his limits through a victory over the harming potential of reality, was that of closing myself within me, into an immense trunk of loneliness. Surely, my chance of surviving a battle without victory from which the winners have no way of escaping, was an answer to the recommendation of an echo that blurred the state of weakness and helplessness. As if to spite any violent attacks of the virus, maintained by the silence of doubts that prevented any heroic reaction.

In a relatively short time, I have reached a state of force, passing through the troubling questions raised before me by the evolution of medicine and the prodigious development of the virus. This could be achieved only by consecrating myself in a positive role. Something that constantly stirred my interest in manifesting the inability to resist an unknown that was the future itself, akin to Arsène Lupine trying to break free from the grip of an unfavorable fate. Something that kept insisting to convince me of my own value by loaning trinkets.

Leadership: Are you so full of adrenaline that you attack the aesthetic purpose of life in order to assign it a higher purpose?

I have attacked the aesthetic purpose of a life full of joy through a prevalence of the experience of belonging to a world that fails, in order to assign it a higher purpose: that of performing a miracle. Thus, I myself had to serve not as a plausible explanation of the constantly uncertain phenomena, independent of my will, but rather as a logic that fit perfectly in the equation of the necessity of saying "NO" to any previous experience of death.

Especially, I proved a leadership focused on the aspect of experience that resonates simultaneously in both mysteries, life and death, anywhere I would go to and no matter what would happen to me. In this regard, the true measure of leadership was the strength of facing a higher force that everyone neglected, and one which only I have used in order to amplify my ability to adapt to new situations: survival.

Only a master of unexpected twists, only a single winning number through so many fatalistic consequences of an alleged apocalypse, only a unique global project could impose itself decisively. Only a unique system of information, given by the difference between the determinant dynamic of the conditions of viral spreading and the baseline of the conditions of outbreak containment, could somehow appease the insistencies of evil to rule the chaos of the world.

The work of a true artist of navigation through the ocean of emotions and unknown falls, beyond the abstract, into the structures of the final state of accepting a positive role in the gigantic mutation of experiences brought forth by the life-death connection.

French metaphysician Dom Deschamps refused the idea of a qualifiable God, to whom he had substituted the void as an immanence pf the Universal Whole. In my reality, the model of neutralizing the virus as a unique means of incubation could not be seen. And this especially since everything was subjected to a force whose effect was identical with that of the void: an infectious form of manifestation around a dimension that could not be detected endoscopically or radiologically.

I believe life and death are not expressions of belonging to a divine order, but rather expressions of a mysterious and immeasurable energy that governs the entire food chain of a new power. And maybe this power must be accepted, respected, recognized as a unique approach to the pathology called hate, antipathy, aversion to ignorance and mediocrity.

The Conditionings Of Leadership are given by the degree of man's perfection in the atmosphere of times that stretch his patience to the limits of experimental knowledge, and by the reason of man to demonstrate his right to existence in the face of the contrast between the uncertainty of passing life and the active, stimulating element.

The degree of man's perfection belongs only to an existence that proves itself to be full of uncertainties, lurked by terrible dangers, but adventurous. And the reason of man to demonstrate his right to existence is fulfilled when he assigns himself a higher purpose where there is only consequence.

The Confession Of A Feeling That Leaves You Speechless

On January 03, 2021

Develop your soul's ability to perceive immaterial things, so as to broaden the horizons of a creation that impresses through the reality of an existence beyond being.

There are moments when I feel that I am in full harmony with nature, more precisely with the expression of a rich range of feelings that the Double Delight rose infuses in me, so naturally united with me through everything imaginable, but legitimate in an artistic creation.

I can't hide my astonishment at the sight of this image of beauty, it never fails to go out of style, but I face the impatience to be patient, which rather turns into obsession, possessiveness, compulsion. This form of life to which I have bound myself with divine grace, fragrant with the perfume of the spheres of natural extracts that guarantee a strong effect of delight of the senses and the mind, a kind of characteristic feature of affective phenomenality, develops and strengthens by the artist working together with that awareness of the spiritual charge which often, with a shade of discreet light, faces me with the great mysteries of the experience of ideation.

The rose is only the instrument of an approach to faith, perceived as a miracle of spontaneous creation, free, of remarkable originality, used for the transcendence of my own nature, or as a transcendence of man to God and a descent of God in matter. So, I have to look inside the rose for the answer to the question: "who am I and what do I want from art", being mastered by the potential of a prospective gaze directed towards the soul phenomena of divine revelation, nourished by the soul substance of the earth.

A "must see" quickly becomes a "must have", but with the blessed reference to Frank Herbert's novel "Dune", where it is written in black and white: "The person who experiences greatness must have a feeling for the myth he is in."

Leadership: Can you consider your creation as a phenomenality of the spirit contemplating an image of divine revelation, while situating yourself on a level from which the object of contemplation can be projected only into the abstract?

As the artist's admiration for nature turns into an obsession, for that means denying his interest in the great struggles of life, the true value of wisdom beyond the Ego, he becomes another person, less sociable, but able to discover a number of precious secrets. The symbol of the rose is such a secret, which I knowingly assume as a duty to the work of God.

After all, it is a feeling of one's own being in the affirmation of the will to shape an image of the divine nature, by correspondence with the image of a person embodied in a delicate flower, but also imposing, blooming to the desert of a thousand and one nights and reaching the sublime in a semiotic perspective of Umberto Eco. She disappeared on a mission to save the holy word from the biblical corpus, but returned to the attention of the painter Jean-Baptiste Robie even before he rediscovered his spirituality and faith.

The wilderness will rejoice and blossom like a rose. Hence the faculty of the soul that perceives aspects of the immaterial world outside the plastic experience acquired in art activities.

For, I constantly feel the presence of something different from me, more imposing and refined, abstract from any causal relationship corresponding to reality, something to which I know how to react only through the predominance of an external phenomenon that acts from an inner necessity. A rose can be so amazing that no photograph knows how to do it justice as long as it does not forget its care to be deified.

Leadership: Does your creation process that level of art at which the "object of contemplation" includes the awareness of a higher world, since you could project it as a subject of a composition that embodies the idea of immortality?

I did well to surround myself with the universe of flowers through an interpretation of the symbols that precede the playful dimension of the drawing. At the sublime moment of admiring the rose, in the context of the metaphysics with which, in intimacy, I delight my soul, senses, gaze, mind, contributes the quality of the painter to try to imagine reality differently than it seems at first sight, in an exercise of combining the composition of still life with the portrait of a conversion to Divinity.

Here I must consider the memorable saying of an extraordinary story, as said by John Fowles in the novel "The Caterpillar":

"I had accidentally bought the pencil and watercolor portrait of a young woman. It did not have the painter's signature, but in one corner was an ink sketch which, it seems, said in Italian – July 16, 1683. The precise dating satisfied me at first as much as the drawing itself, which is, in fact, nothing out of the ordinary.

However, something in the long face of the long-lost young woman, something in her eyes, an inexplicable living presence, a refusal of death, had slowly become to obsess me. It is quite possible that this very refusal of death has linked the real woman to another whom I have admired for a long time and who appears later in the story."

Rightly so. If in everything around me there is a voice that does not use words to express its hidden feelings, if in everything that drives me exists the possibility of uniting beauty with the truth beyond words, and if there are at least a few words to control my thoughts and feelings when unexpected circumstances come upon me, these words will be heard only by the vibrations of an inner voice: "The history of art is seasoned with the unexpected, with the belief in immortality."

This is how strong the rose symbol is...

A composition that embodies the idea of immortality must complete the understanding of reality imagined as a passage between two worlds that are essentially opposite, but this union gives rise to a gigantic universe.

The Confession Of A Look That Listens To Its Eyes

On January 07, 2024

My eyes, already quite sensitive to light, decided to play a little with their skills as a passionate photographer and with the beauty of nature, just to get something special, an Inthaeilodhis Amaliess Ompusisthe , a kind of form of recognition of details for fulfillment a spectacular view. With their power to focus on the present moment, the eyes dared to capture the dynamics of life, the horizon of a painting in which the flow of waves is captured in an infinite ebb and flow of color and form, so that the brilliant artist, myself, succeeds to clothe my ideas with new means of expression, with style and plastic argument.

I'm walking on the Turkish coast. Next, my gaze follows things as in a mirror, the retina absorbing only their light parts against the open background of my perception, so that I can create the illusion of a third dimension that I reveal. Perhaps it is given to me to try to discern meanings outside of material existence, so that things, beyond the sphere of direct vision, are treated as a symbol of mystery, that subtle veil that covers ordinary understanding and encourages exploration beyond what is possible observe and measure directly.

It is the call of the artist to search for hidden meanings, unseen connections and depths that the ordinary mind can only glimpse along the line of a philosophical path that, among the worries, disappointments and vanities of the world, seeks a safe refuge inside the soul. Thus, mystery, an imaginary simultaneity that manifests itself in the form of the space on which art paints, can dwell in the simple details of life, transforming them into symbols of a deeper and more complex reality.

Leadership: Can your perception of things become a source of soul salvation, exploring the sublime in the cause of an all-encompassing vision by establishing the distinction between reality and interpretation?

Nor should we fall into the trap of thinking that the eyes can explain the beautiful by means of comparisons or by means of some empirical psychology treated in an Enlightenment manner as in the time of Heidegger or Kant. The eyes will never need any clarification regarding the aesthetic configuration of the surrounding things, for it is enough for them to see in their absolute ideality the pure imitation of nature. I say this because the eyes themselves are particular ideas intuited in real form, receiving within themselves the "Totality", the entire divine character.

The implication of philosophy in art is obvious. Precisely for this reason, the idea of the artistic gaze of the eyes refers to the novel "The Name of the Rose" written by Umberto Eco:

It can be said, then, that the art of looking is the ability to place things in a subjective manner, along the lines of an ephemeral request to decode an eternal reality (or a reality created by something that is eternal), by means of metaphor and comparison. Often an eternal Universe is confused with a Creator of worlds if the writing about the spirit that accompanies things (impermanent in the memory it leaves behind) becomes more than a reflection of the heart, but a reflection of the divinity.

Leadership: Can your creation, which the understanding of reality shapes, instill in the surrounding things an effect of perpetuity so as to give them "a life without death"?

But to create the illusion of a third dimension in visual art and to reveal it, myself a lover of contrasts, I often use techniques such as perspective, tonal contrast, overlapping objects and effects of size and scale to guide the viewer's eye by using directional lines. And by creating the right frame, using colors and details to highlight foreground subjects, I especially contribute to the perception of depth and volume in my work related to the reality of things.

For example. The general view of things on a seashell beach is that they are natural and fixed entities determined by natural factors. However, artists who have better visual-spatial skills, as well as mathematical skills, feel very differently captivated by the things around them because, as models for painting, they have a distinct shape and size, each with a different story to tell. .

Therefore things, being in pure light, in the open air, undisturbed by any reflection, are not inside a closed space, and the colors influence each other, destroying the volumes. This is probably what Leonardo da Vinci meant when he said: "every body sends its image into the surrounding air".

In the end, I can say that I, as a viewer thirsty for the wonders of things, feel honored to witness these beauties and can experience a deep feeling as a participant in the artistic picture of nature. Like any artist, I look at this landscape with gratitude and admiration, Etielvie Athlessirin Larumor , as an invitation to introspection, meditation and self-knowledge, letting myself be carried away by the magic of art and its power to transform ephemeral moments into eternal memories. By some accident, I understood that what makes things the expression of art is my very (divine) power to animate them.

Regarding the wonders of the things we focus our attention on, the leader can experience that deep feeling that the Creator, looking around with gratitude and admiration, is reflected in a great artistic picture of nature.

As for me, if I am to add one last detail, in a way I feel connected to things by a shared secret, as an accomplice to them, that they become the authentic expression of my inner being and the ability to transpose emotions in tangible forms.

The Confession

Look towards the past and towards the logic of the happened, so that you can be successful in your jump over the gulf that separates the world of appearances of loyalty from the world of the role assumed with lucidity.

- No, I do not blame you, Edmond, nu, I do not hate you, my friend ! I blame and hate myself ! So wicked I am ! Mercedes cried closing her hands and raising towards the sky. I was punished. I had faith, love, innocence, all three angelic graces and, worthless me, I doubted God. I left you to die... Was I not to save my husband, no matter how guilty he was? And yet, Lord, I helped give death to him through my cowardly lack of feeling, through my contempt, needing to reminded myself that it was because of me he became a perjurer and a traitor !

Monte Cristo stepped forward and held out his hand silently.

- No, said Mercedes, withdrawing her hand gently, don't touch me. I was the guiltiest of all. All the others were impelled by hatred, greed, selfishness, only I behaved with such cowardice. They wanted to, I was afraid. Don't touch me Edmond. You're thinking of comforting me with words, I feel it. Don't say it to me: keep for another. I am not worthy of it. Behold... (she fully uncovered her face). Behold, suffering has bleached my hair, my eyes shed so many tears that they are surrounded by dark circles and my forehead is furrowed.

You, on the contrary, Edmond, you're still young, still beautiful, still proud. And that is because you have kept your faith, because you had strength, because you trusted God and God supported and defended you. I was a coward, I disowned my love and God abandoned me, and here I am ! *

Leadership: Do you judge the facts according to an outlook in which you can emerge as an achievement after which you can put a point, in the conditions of a duality between your natural nature and your forced nature, which is a consequence of your fall in an outdated sentimentality?

It is always necessary for a rupture to intervene, a tearing from the bottom for people to show their true face. The value of man can reside from overcoming a difficulty situation, but behind, the memory will always remain, that unseen but palpable emptiness, that only a new self-consciousness in agreement with a new life perspective can fill up.

And the perspective that puts life in the foreground resembles a return to old love: you represent the pain of your heart by stimulating the interest in the dialogue between what has raised you up to a point and what can make you stronger by overcoming that point. From this angle, leadership obtains a reference value for the evaluation of a life lesson: you cannot remain trapped in a nostalgic past without assuming the risk of compromising yourself through a behavior that agrees with the fatigue of "living by virtue of inertia."

A certain integrity of the act, of the consequences and motives that can determine new decisions, beyond what convention between a personality with the role of a "Trojan Horse" and another personality with a "Flamenco" (delusion) effect can signify, is the key in the great confrontation between what attracts you (but tears you apart), and what drives you away (but redeems you).

There in the corner of the convention between these two personalities, a perfect merger between causality and fact exists, that tolerance and temperance cannot shake the precariousness left standing.

Leadership: Do you begin to put yourself in the forefront of your life without realizing the impact of the remembrance of a special experience that tasted the moral defeat of consciousness?

He who wants to be successful in the jump over the gulf that separates the two worlds, one of appearances of loyalty and the other of the role assumed with lucidity and responsibility, must look towards the past and towards the logic of the happened that cannot be turned back.

The happened is the context in which the rupture occurs, in which a fatigue on an emotional or mental order can be felt, characterized by low expectations regarding human evolution – as long as the truth that leads to the so-called proof of his weakness isn't considered relative, but rather continually dwells in the soul of the betrayed and the disowned. The incriminating act against which there is no suspicion, gives the truth, even if it hurts and even if it stirs the soul, the strength to work in consciousness.

Regarding leadership, the significance of the gesture of involvement that induces unique added value is taken into account, but also requires a wider reflection, which can be painful, for the materialization of the need of finding yourself, of knowing your strong points and your weaknesses, making things move around you once again.

If you understood leadership, then you know that it isn't really possible to be present in two places at once: in a time in which you'd done something to someone's liking, in an attempt to shape them, without getting any result, so a time where you don't belong. And a time in which you nicely set within this man's heart baggage a shining crystal that reflects your own reality.

Paraphrasing what Scottish evangelist Oswald Chambers said, it should be noted: "Learn to distinguish between what isolates you – protecting you from others, and what keeps you elevated – separating you from them."

Consciousness is manifested as a superior will when you have to decide with the power of remembering what happiness means for you and live in tune with your inner voice without turning the "finding yourself again" mark into the reflection of a dirty mirror.

The Confession highlights the facts when you become conscious of the highest truth, one you can accept and remain steadfast in its presence. Or you can mask it a bit, so it will not play your cards in one hand, or even hide it completely, risking to end up a victim.

If you want leadership to not tend towards decline, always remain what you were before the deed, before urging your reasoning to find the arguments through which you can favour its prescription. Do not delay the trial of a cause until the prescription of the deed, you risk becoming the victim of your own benevolence or of your own faulty vision.

The Confessions Of A Colorful Look

On August 04, 2020

The eyes that widen their gaze towards the sphere of the divine are the object of inspiration of an artist who expands his field of creation in all directions.

I write to calm my soul in a conversation with the enchanted landscapes of nature, with the flowers, with the grass, with the gentle sun, with the gentle wind, with the clear sky, with the spring stones. All this proves fragile at the meeting of art with science, in the presence of a carefully outlined strong concept of freedom, expressed by the term Pritemisunyach(the most wonderful bliss that man can feel). The personification of every splendor of nature, the analysis of creation itself, the desire to find myself in a realistic composition available in a diverse range of colors, made the creative spontaneity of my life a reference point for the landmarks of a fascinating existence.

At other times, I wanted to know myself differently than I am, to feel different than fantastic, to recognize myself in a double-faced mirror, being next to the silence that composes (in honor of nature) the most beautiful poems, thus leaving art my possibility to be felt on a spiritual level, in a wonderful work of Creation. In other words, I wanted to change the ordinary from the extraordinary into a landscape full of lyricism, shaped by sweet dreams, that would carry my imagination to unsuspected heights, beyond the limits of the power to understand life.

I saw from afar what I had to see up close, because I saw with different eyes than I did in the past, with my eyes fixed on the painter's work and the image made up of the pictorial layer. This special painter seemed to want to embody the captivating power of high feeling in a natural immortality of the soul. I do not yet know whether my gaze is so keen as to perceive the difference between the foray into the world of art and the foray into the mysteries of nature, since the difference is so small between a convincing victory of beauty in the world haunted by artificial intelligence and the miracle of a divine message which needs to be protected.

Leadership: Can you assume the destiny of a creation that remains unaltered in the context of a manifestation of the immutable self, so as to make your art the expression of an adventure of the soul passed through a mysterious memory of nature?

The rose to my right looks at me as a witness to my feelings of appreciation for the whole of another life. It gives voice to my thoughts and emotions. Something in me conforms to its artistic and spiritual side. It always tests the other side of me, as if it wanted to establish man's eternal identity with himself in the kingdom of a universe that transcends anyone's imagination. Somehow, it has a great prestige in front of the artistic work, of the listener, of the spectator, of the creator who smooths with the thought and with the soul, then with each movement of the brush, the human meaning of the sacred.

And my interaction with the rose is reciprocal between two bodies. The human body is transformed into the body of Christ, while the artistic is combined with the "White Property of the Blood of Atonement." Perhaps I myself am a divine body, because my soul is divine, and because nature combines with my art in a divine plan: Elestoracthiss (the spiritual communion of man with God).

The transformation of the body of Christ on an artistic plane, through a poetic perception of nature, hence the communion between Self and Other, makes the purpose of my life take on the meaning of a creation that appears sublime in the statement of expression of aesthetics that provides that mystical effect of renewal, rebirth, that state of inner revelation in which we discover that we can be someone else.

Long ago, a part of the rose's soul was reflected in me, that part being meant to soothe my body, my pains, to temper my lust for greatness, luxury and power. Something in the light of my eyes was assimilated by the rays of its spiritual power to transcend and transfigure reality.

The artist is a saint because he takes his creation to the level of timeless art, both physically and spiritually. He lives in two close worlds, resonating on a soul level, as if he were living a moment of absolute freedom in an unlimited space.

The man touched by divine grace is an artist, a creator to whom the merits of our Savior Jesus Christ are attributed or imputed, who through symbolism acquire the meaning of "nobility", "exaltation", "superiority", "eminence", "elevation", "power". The rose gives the artist the power to express himself with enthusiasm, with talent, with a pronounced refinement, comparable to the power of Jesus to perform miracles in the name of a science that takes over the properties of the science of nature.

Only through art can I feel the call of the rose, and at the same time feel absolute, divine. It is an endless journey in search of another world, in which a prayer containing the word "resemblance" seems to be brewing. Surely, right was the man who said: "Authentic art transposes us almost instantly into a divine plane, producing in our consciousness a state of universalization and unification, thus discovering full of delight the divine splendors."

I learned that it is difficult to understand art, especially since it translates through symbol, through the incarnation of human nature into a red rose, the color of blood. And if what I have learned has helped me transform into someone else with divine powers, it is because I have listened carefully to the voice of spiritual art that often whispers to me: "Build an admirable vision of all that is in nature, while regaining control of your entire life."

The starting point of a demonstration of extraordinary artistic skills is what you feel you are at the level of a consciousness that is revealed by revealing the specific horizon of the divine spirit.

The Confessions Of A Colorful Gaze bring together all your ideas and knowledge of art passed through the filter of a symbolism that begins with the wonderful world of nature and continues with the bringing of Christ and His teaching in the midst of a unique perspective of understanding and dualistic reinterpretation of Creation.

The Confidence Of A Master

On April 15, 2009

Imprint your leadership a particularly expressive character through your power to coordinate the factors contributing to your own development.

When building the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées in Paris, the great sculptor Bourdelle was not just the sculptor-decorator, but he was also responsible for the general idea of the facade and the interior design. Only for the facade of the theater, Bourdelle made 17 designs and finally found the clearest solution, organically combining smooth, calm surfaces, in regular rhythm, with carved reliefs.

The marble tiles, which portray Apollo and the muses as eternal poetic allusions, were carved in large, composed plans, in perfect accord with the spirit of modern architecture. Bourdelle said: *"The wall itself must appear animated in some places, in a determined order, by taking human form."***

Leadership: Is your creation evolving towards a model based on a comprehensive approach, in the event of obtaining a visual performance that will hardly be surpassed?

Your true value, as a leader, is given by your role in creating and promoting your own leadership style, your own approach to "the façade and the interior" of your own personality, without impurities, which increase your level of performance and influence. You again are responsible for building your own model for strengthening your control position, and for examining ways to strengthen your own ability to form skills necessary for performing tasks in a more efficient manner.

Just as a painter creates valuable work by the depth of observation based on reality, so you can stand above others, giving your leadership a form through which to emphasize your experience. On great sculptors, especially Bourdelle, everything had to be translated into a form through which they hallmarked their own style. It's the same story with leadership, which evolves through the form it receives after you, in advance, have shaped and polished your character.

You can stand above others if you successfully combine "shape" and "functionality", meaning if you combine character with skills.

Understanding the priorities and processes that improve your performance are critical elements of success in leadership. The strength of concentrating your energy towards the dimension of Artistic Creation is manifested mainly during the act of creating your own value, intelligent and comprehensive, when you take a step closer to perfection. In order to get closer to excellence, focus your thinking and actions explicitly to the elements (related to the influence of values and your own character) that don't work at optimum parameters.

A visual performance that can hardly be surpassed is actually aimed at that part of your creation that is under the sign of passion for excellence, through the interest shown in establishing the causal links of design ideas accumulated over time.

What leads to the proliferation of explored ideas? What leads to the avoidance of overly specific ideas and harms the creative process? What triggers the process of updating innate ideas? What leads to the crystallization of ideas and facilitates decision-making? What leads to the concentration of ideas and the achievement of results?

The Safety Of A Master is what guides you and helps you to get to the point where you can say: "I am excellent." But, for that, just as a painter, you must create harmony among all your strengths and weaknesses, between all the elements constituting your leadership, until you get a flawless final form.

Have you discovered the true benefits of the effects your leadership has? What are the limits that define your style? What do the characteristics of your leadership have in common? Is "form" a vital necessity your leadership depends on? Have you clearly defined those areas of risk, those concepts that do not work?

Imprint your leadership a particularly expressive character through your power to coordinate the factors contributing to your own development.

Conclusion: In leadership, as well, the harmonious mix between form and content leads to the success wanted by the leader. In leadership, lack of safety, oscillations, babble merely reduce the leader's value, role and power of coordination. Any dissonance and oscillation will be charged.

The Consistent Foam Of The Colored Sea

On September 29, 2014

Learn to "see" and "feel" what you think about, expressing in the elements of creation all that these forces include throughout the process of individualization.

At Eisenstein, the passion for color in the movie remains for all his life. "Color: pure sonority, bright, loud. When did I fall in love with it? Where? I become glum when I don't see shining on my table, one next to the other, the blue pencil and the yellow one, or when green striped, red pillow is not on the blue couch. When my variegated robe is not here to blindly shine... And how happy I am when the Filipino striped ribbon twists across the Uzbek bed cover. Or when the Mongolian embroidered drawing stretches across the purple background of the wall so precisely painted by the Mexican emblem, of white paper, of the Day of the Dead and by the other dark mask with its wounds bleeding, wandering here, unexpectedly from far away, from the semi-ritualistic world of the Mexican Indians."

From all this foam of the color sea and of the ocean of bloody cruelty will be born, superbly, the character from the movie "Ivan the Terrible."

*The great director, Serghei Eisenstein said at one point: "You must see and feel what you think. To feel and control your thoughts. You have to be consistent and secure them within memory and senses. And you must do all this at the same time." *****

Leadership: What value can a creation attain that is itself the result of an agreement coordinated by a reforming reality?

Sense is a restorer of pure vision, while thoughts are an important part of your inner wisdom. As a factor of progress for the establishment of the optimum application of creation in leadership, your individuality can be completed by improving the quality and standards of "color" to a high level of approach of your condition as creator. Provided you investigate the possible combinations that can be made from this deep material called "The Self" in relation to surrounding objects. For a creator, color is the reflection of the self that helps with the establishing of personal identity.

In leadership, the term "creation" can be assigned a TRUE value when the means of expressing a message, concept, or artistic idea presents a certain visual attraction or openness to novelty. It is the case of rendering a reality that has come out of the amorphous and fully experiences the experience of maximum diversity in an exemplary unity.

When we associate the two terms, leadership and creation, we can refer to an intuitive navigation in a real bringer of satisfaction, referral of new ways of thinking through the senses and thought, through direct reflection. A form of recognition and appreciation to inspiration, by communicating with what can be seen, felt and heard – or with what lies beyond the material, with what is superior within you and around you. A way of converting a pattern of thought, different and customized, in a form in which the duality of subject and object is central, can turn you into a consistent tester of science and reason, such as "I am a different person than when I am in my comfort zone."

Leadership: Do you facilitate the understanding of the assumption of intelligence to extend to the highest levels of creation, to find a more concise expression in the added value you have to bring in the depth area that amazes through its simplicity?

Well, as a means of domination and manipulation of science that precedes vision, entry into this state of expansion of reason, by connecting to new systems of reference, merely makes it unilateral or reduces the response of outsiders, to the great challenges of reality that is hidden in different structures of consciousness. In perception, sensorial, in a more comprehensive understanding.

Leaders who have reached a level of intellectual maturity necessary for acceding to a higher form of knowledge can this phenomenon of evolution: "a dissolution of meaning into a real that is beyond signification."

In the absence of a reference point as a source of inspiration from which true knowledge stems from, without an "objective" interpretation of the perception vis-à-vis that which you are trying to create, these "intuitive illuminations" will not be part of the potential of leadership, but rather part of its routine. Leadership develops only when you try to find something a bit different, in your incursions into a horizon of interpreting a reality that exceeds, let's say, rational knowledge.

Your creation can take on an immense value depending on how you utilize thoughts and senses in a special context of relevancy of what you seek to understand, to discover and render.

To facilitate the understanding of the assumption of intelligence to expand to the highest levels of creation means to realize that your entire ability to achieve the desired result is due to the fixation in the memory of the spectator of that feeling of belonging to a space that seems immutable. Like making a reality-inspired movie: you perform the whole action and you know you cannot change the script and the character from who's perspective you see the movie.

A more concise expression in the added value that you have to bring in the depth area that amazes through its simplicity can be achieved by maximizing the creative experience that eliminates "maximum sophistication" with surprise elements.

The Consistent Foam Of The Colored Sea is an indirect form of expression that places its stamp on all your creation as a leader. It is the consequence of a whirlwind of thoughts, sensations and emotions, well targeted, integrated and balanced into a type of art that, requiring a lot of patience, shows things differently from what they appear in reality. This can turn you into the subject and object of your own work.

The Consuming Fire In The Creation Workshop

On July 14, 2013

Schedule your activities to capitalize leadership so that you avoid the effects of the knowledge addiction which can modify the engine of your entire development.

I had reached a stage where everything had become foreign, estranged from me. Including knowledge. As if my spirit of observation together with logical thinking had been fixed on some immovable pillars for a long time and forever forgotten. I was trying really hard to recover my capacity to fully use my faculties, my eternal vice, finding novelty in a delicately divided manner, but which had a high rigidity.

The disoriented man is a creation of the universe that does not reach its purpose for which it was conceived, like a small natural satellite that offers nothing to the evolution of the earth. Every time I managed to motivate myself, every time I persistently sniffed a new idea under the action of a concentrated force, using the method of the finite, appropriate element which triggered creation, another reaction product would come into play. A formation of abnormal clichés and false reasons. And thus, a new crisis would set.

The model which generated new conclusions and innovative ideas that had to allow a more accurate processing of the highest volume of information would "break" just like an overheated steam pipe after a long operation period. Maybe because I always exaggerated the meaning of the discoveries science threw my way? What logic did these Herculean efforts have for me to reinstate everything that seemed destroyed?

Leadership: Do you take into consideration the essential tendency of an artist who reveals himself within you as a way to interact with a concept synonymous with "everything that exists", independent of your will to be part of an endless universe?

Only if I could relive everything, could I transcribe exactly the stages I went through. My "getting better" was a roulette game with 50% chances to win, and my situation looked more likely with a small novel that could have been effortlessly turned into a spectacular drama. I felt vulnerable, impatient and clumsy, naked, without any shield of my personality. A severe disconnection from the savory addiction to search, to replenish knowledge and crystallize a particular science.

My wish to be once again a shaper of the matter, my significantly increasing the values of the research parameters, seemed to have deep roots. And it was undoubtedly self-imposed. My requests to find new ways of making science more efficient were defined through a lower frequency and a higher amplitude, or by a higher frequency and lower amplitude. Unable to do anything to fight mental overload, I was caught in an unstable relation: at one end there was deep thought, at the other dilemma and chaos.

I limped for a long while without having any visible wound. This austerity period was part of another initiation stage in the perfect art of narrative, the most complex, in need of more support. It forced me to rehabilitate, to overcome a certain weakness, which I considered to be at its peak. And it forced me to commence an inner work.

I refueled the fire of the deep. And I learned to reap the benefits of temporary inner defeat and failure. The endless universe I related myself to was tightly bound to the active and continuous exploration of surrounding things that fed my imagination, as a parable of self-exploration, of finding one's self, and of the meaning of life.

Leadership: Into what kind of a person does science turn you when you try to take control over it, in terms of what shapes you exclusively as an artist meant to offer openness to the idea of an "unlimited universe"?

Are you at a stage when everything becomes foreign to you? Are you trying hard to acquire the ability to fully use your creative faculties? Do you exaggerate the meaning of the discoveries science throws your way? Do you feel vulnerable, clumsy, naked, without any shield of your personality?

Every time you get to the point of admitting who you truly are and what you can do with your knowledge, a crisis is triggered. It consists of a series of reproaches, tormenting thoughts that weigh incessantly over your way of being, bringing to light relatively forced reactions. A painful confrontation with your own negativity that modifies the engine of your whole development. You get into that tunnel of uncertainty, when it seems to you that everything you've discovered can not be true.

In these moment, accusations of being untruthful to your initiative spirit and to your openness towards everything new, will float over your messy professional scene without getting a final solution. Reducing from the very beginning your chances of success in what you set to accomplish.

When you try to take control of science you turn into a literary character who confesses in a sometimes graceful and sometimes traumatized exercise, but always problematic to the sincerity to himself, admitting that the end of the world he shares is in God's hands.

An artist meant to provide openness to the idea of an "unlimited universe" the prisoner of an impregnable labyrinth that can only be explored in solitary silence, without any guides other than those you succeed in getting closer from an unseen plane.

Defending leadership and its functional principles based on excellence in a certain field, against any intervention which limits your abilities and faculties to create new exceptional results, we think we could eliminate a blatant contradiction between your evolution and your being.

With only one condition: to project a new mobility structure, a new way of answering in front of your own disappointments. Science is not just a main gain; it can also be a great threat for your own functionality. Because for achieving efficient results, it is necessary to have a good coordination of all your efforts in a certain direction in relation with understanding and developing your science.

So, not necessarily "the decisive attack" against great knowledge, with the purpose of efficiently exerting your control over leadership will end with a gain for your identity. Moreover, positional accomplishment by favorable simplifications of the dimensioning efforts of science which would ensure an appropriate protection against any regression or stagnation of your progress.

Leadership: Do you let yourself trapped by an overdoses of knowledge, especially in the situation where the universe you are reporting suggests even the suppression of your attempt to become someone else?

"Define your personal success", the international leadership expert John Maxwell once advised. But first of all, or at the same time, wouldn't it be appropriate to define your failure on more plans? Wouldn't it be more appropriate to develop a particular style to approach tense situations that you are exposed to due to a hunger for research, and accept the inevitable?

Unfulfilling objectives and the lack of performance could be due precisely to overload, the severe connection to the savory addiction of searching new formulae, new profitable possibilities to use and promote personal science. Trying to become someone else through the excess of knowledge, by referring to an infinite universe, often resembles the attempt to move a mountain that shakes and risks collapsing over you because you are not yet ready to support its extent.

Your aspirations and abilities must not force you to adopt a way of life different from a normal person, or to relate to a reality that others cannot swallow and even deny. Science must not make you accept the chains of other people - helpless to rise above the condition called "banality", but neither to make you a prisoner of unbearable behavior.

The creation workshop is part of every man's nature as a manifestation of the wish to explore new knowledge horizons. To successfully support the transformation towards what you want to become, a man whose accomplished science can offer all the aces he needs in order to achieve excellence in leadership, means to reply to the requests of finding new ways of making development and training activities more efficient. Without letting yourself caught in that subtle trap of knowledge "overdose".

The exact and necessary quantity of information should be processed in the creation workshop so that the balance between risks and benefits would be constant.

Leadership is the creation of the universe which includes the scientist, the aspirer for divinity, the one who understands Victor Yugo's words: "an additional condition in a being alters the being in its entirety."

The Consuming Fire In The Creation Workshop describes that crisis which can arise as a result of personal development stimuli which instead of being motivating, lead to stagnation. And as any other fire, they transform everything into ashes.

Just as a Phoenix bird you can be reborn from your own ashes, but it's more cautious to avoid crisis situation by an appropriate dosage of the thirst for knowledge.

The Content Of Leadership

On April 13, 2008

Live the role you take on, without detaching yourself from your own Self.

Everything Paracelsus said was true, I could see it all with my own eyes. But I must confess that this new way of healing was completely foreign to me. I remember a young prince of our Court, Viscount de Gaunt, the brother of the Prince of Episuoy, from a very tall noble house, he was so sick with gout that he sat on one side only, tormented and deformed by pain.

Butler then took my hand and asked me:

- Do you want me to heal that young man? I will heal him for your sake.

I then explained that the situation is a little more complicated, because the young nobleman is very stubborn and would rather die before taking any cure.

- Be it his will, he replied, I want nothing more than for him to touch this little stone with his tongue every morning. After three weeks he has to wash his painful wounds with his own urine, after which he will be healed and will be able to walk healthily. Go to him and tell him all this.

Then, gladly, I returned to Brussels and told the prince everything, and he replied:

- Go and tell Butler that if he heals me, I'll give him everything he wants. Ask him what his price is and I will pay.

When I told Butler the next day, he was very angry and said:

*- Your prince is crazy or mindless, which is why I will never help him – I do not need his money and I am not inferior to him. **

Leadership: Can you overcome the need to position yourself above others, to compare yourself to them, and to wait for them or certain outside events to satisfy your pride in being accomplished in something?

Your way of feeling superior or inferior depends on the level of other people's life experience and how they show a willingness to share it with you, taking into account that form of their consciousness needed to truly know and practice modesty and the nobility of heart. And the only external entity that influences you positively or negatively, which we can categorize as "restricted access to both realms of thought", is given by the attempts of others to change you by force.

Let's take a doctor as an example. He who heals a man does so not only because he has some specialized knowledge in a difficult field to master, but because he sees things quite differently from other people, from the level of life experience – to the level of thoughts. Whoever wants to change people's perception of his deeds must first consider the decision to approach the source of a long-lasting achievement, such as "healings or miracles".

Every decision you make is a contribution to the development of the world, affecting the course of events, so in the middle of any situation is a decision that surprises by what you do, feelings, emotions, deep states, but also by what you imagine, discover and highlight (a completely new living reality).

When a doctor heals a patient, first of all he esteems himself and appreciates himself to the true value, because he who serves a heavy profession also serves himself as a spiritual-soul being, as one who is infinite in himself, as a triumph of an order of things, a world in which the components flow from each other in a fabric of interdependencies.

From this point of view, the pride of having perfected yourself in something is distinguished by the operation of knowledge that you carry out in the process of exercising influence, so that what you have as a potential to have quality information to reach everyone's knowledge through a variety of actions, perspectives and manifestations of will.

The role of a leader is to coexist as an attitude and as a willingness to change things within the same picture, leading to a unification of different elements (feeling, knowledge and effort, time, costs and quality), through a subtle chain of events.

The Content of Leadership is given by these elements different in nature, position or role, but which together form a whole called "HORIZON", thanks to which one can reach, by force of circumstances, a superior and deep understanding of the world, especially the perception of the notion of "Value of one's own Self".

The Continuity Between "knowing" And "feeling"

On October 17, 2011

Discover the essence of your own being, by passing your feelings through the spiritual filter of the other people.

Once again, I will make reference to the new movie "Meet Joe Black (1998)" in order to prove up to the hilt something important.

Susan Parrish, daughter of the billionaire William Parrish, looking at Joe Black with that disarming innocence of a person that does not know his fellow, confesses him with a deep insecurity:

- I love a man whom I do not know who is he, or where he goes, or ... You're someone else... I'm afraid, Joe.

- Are you afraid of what you could find? You should not be ... It does not matter who I am.

However, deep down in her soul she knew that Joe is not telling the truth. Because he felt a wave of bitterness in his voice, as an endless pain, void of any energy, of any spiritual charge.

Looking at her with pain in his eyes, feeling her inner unrest, Joe replied to her with a mournful voice, as if it were his last words:

- I promise ... I promise you, Susan, that you will always have what you have found in that cafe.

At the end of the movie, the Prince of Darkness, in the person of Joe Black, leaves this world, but not before fulfilling his promise: brings back to life the real Joe, the one that Susan had met at the café, and of whom she had fallen in love enormously.

Leadership: Is the value of personal image given by the aesthetics of building an authentic attachment to the answer to your quest for something other than what you deserve?

Without doubt the truth about you is reflected in your own attitude, which in its turn is dictated by your own conscience. The realization that you are not sure of your skills and that you are worried about the consequences that you might attract upon you if you do not prove yourself to please others, or if the decisions that you take contradict your own beliefs – are externalizing through the uncertainty that is perceived by those around you.

A person that always penetrates in the lives of others under a different appearance, in the end loses his quality, disowns his essence. His feelings, even if they are intense, are becoming contradictory in the light of other people. It is like continually chasing through life, without really living it, without reaping the rewards of maturity, without acquiring the best virtues, thus losing your coordinates by which can be understood your own existence. The fruits of your "wandering" will prove to be sorrowful.

Your true personality is like a nappe of water that is getting thinner as time goes on, as people get to know you better, until it disappears. If you want your leadership to be in harmony with their values and desires, try to get closer to the reason why they accept you in their circle - otherwise you risk that your connection with them to evaporate.

The aesthetics of building an attachment to someone without being able to neglect a previous moment of recovering something that was lost at some point is subordinated to the willingness to engage in a sublime duet between meaning and acceptance that is spectacularly announced through the setting in which you place your "story".

Leadership: Is there a concordance between your attitude and your true spiritual background from the point of view of reality which is nothing else but a conformity of fiction?

Just as between the heartbeats and breathing, there is a clearly defined concordance, so there must be concordance between your attitude and your real spiritual background upon which is based your conscience.

We are all carriers of individual features. A character that goes through - the same way, but always in another aspect – he risks losing credibility for the whole life. If your features do not coincide with the values of those around you, or if your nature contradicts your thinking and beliefs, then you are attempting to lose your trust capital that they give to you.

Just as the body supports and mobilizes by itself in order to "fight off" with its disease, so and you, as to accelerate your personal evolution you need to know to "fight off" with your existing susceptible system, with the unhealthy values and negative personality traits that can affect your relationships with others.

Explore your whole being, and meditate well upon it. Firstly, strive to find in you what you are looking in the others. Discover the essence of your own being, by passing your feelings through the spiritual filter of the other people.

The essence of your being is the difficult part of the merit of being accepted by others as a totally different version of reality instead of the one you want to keep for yourself.

The continuity between "knowing" and "feeling" highlights people's ability to evolve through the prism of their own perceptions, both from the mental and emotional point of view. There always will be continuity between what you know about the other people, and what you feel for them. On the report that is established between these two entities depends the way in which they will connect to you.

Conclusion: Knowledge of people is a process based on an algorithm established and implemented voluntary or involuntary by each of us. For a leader, is very important to know the people with whom he works, and must have special abilities in this regard. Of course, this "work" it is easier if the process of knowledge has started with himself, reaching "to feel" and then "to know" with certainty what goes wrong, or what does not match.

The development of this 7th sense will contribute in improving the knowledge and ameliorating interpersonal relations.

The Continuity Formula Of Leadership

On January 17, 2016

Learn to become an authentic force of progress in the space of staging a great role, ennobling you with the magic of a unique experience.

I was full of desire of moving forward at my own pace, in the singularity of a voice often turned into whisper, coming from somewhere, I don't know where from, but I was about to clear it up eventually. As one of those who embrace from the very first moment the path offered before them, known only by God, because everything has an ambiguous meaning, suspecting along it a fascinating and at the same time strange world.

Categorically. I was heading to a meeting with myself seen from the perspective of a test of consciousness to allow the fine distinction between what I was experiencing through life experience and what I was experiencing through the feeling of communion with another being, full of contradictions, full of mysteries, full of ghostly energies. In samples of short duration, as is the sprint on the distances started from a failure and ended with great joy, I could fill my void full of doubt that I carried within me, that void so necessary for victory, a completely new defiance in the darkness of the moment tumbling at my feet.

The world is constantly changing its batteries, dynamism becomes the touchstone of true characters, demanding endless divisions between winners and losers. When everything seems like a calling, you suddenly find yourself trapped in a vortex of surprising situations, explosions of contradictory feelings, from a conscience of fear to one of victory. God is near you, cradles you in a state of intense debasement, He is there in those hours of non sai più cosa credere, being heard only by a soft, quiet voice, not through the physical senses, but through the touch of the heart and of the mind: "One day you will understand everything."

Leadership: How do you experience that reality of your being that you want to emphasize in a context of uncertainty that has never been experienced before, depending on being in contact with someone else who is on the ground of the true observation of life?

At all times I was clinging to something insignificant so that I could follow the steps that a strange destiny seemed to lead me through with a strong and constant voice, neglecting the sight of a full twinning of all things and phenomena around. It was as if I had to recognize myself as a stranger to myself in a known territory, only because it seemed to me that I did not quite master the essence of reality (to accept a spiritual and prophetic vision of things), that I could not rely on it, that I cannot get along with anyone, unable to reconcile with what is happening on the stage of life.

In my deep sincerity, taken to the limit of the unassailable obsession of being different – it's driving me crazy, in the understanding and worry that stemmed from the strict momentum of a warlike attitude, I often introduced the idea of equivalence of the various types of assessing a broad spectrum of options and strategies of moving forward to a reality that does not get stuck within its own limits. The motivation to continue to experience a changed state of mind, excessive concern for various things or aspects of life, for day to day, ordinary or minor issues, was in fact an effort to think about how to get deeper into what it means to be myself in a world that is constantly trying to shape me into something else.

From everything that adds up and is subtracted from a guidance of seeing the whole picture, from the unspoken words of a rebellion of the pride that governs as it wishes the "reinvent yourself" impulses, equal to the sum of heat exchanges given off by feelings and passions, revolutionizing the very concept of vital force, a new being is born.

A being more miraculous in its existence than the first. The fair solution to an outfitting with certain limits, it seems to be that it has to be sought in the meaning of an alternative: to sit in a corner of the world and wait for someone else to surpass me. Which is, useless to say, something that is simply not my style.

Leadership: Do you continue to move forward in the direction of undetermined results, through a series of converging representations of yourself which determines the development of a reason such as: "the value you attach to assuming a strong role is favorable to the creation of a story that is written by itself" ?

To be able to turn leadership into a pedestal on which you can assume a change of your way of thinking, a lesson necessary for development, you must try to rebuild the road that every man of great character has walked when they felt a powerful impulse to explore their inner world, in order to bring to light the mysteries that lie locked away within its depths, serving them faithfully.

Firdtjof Nansen has won his glory of being first in great contests, skiing and speed skating, where he had won for 12 years in a row. The sport however did not overshadow his other, fairly broad aspirations. But when he was about to pick the road he would follow in life, he felt somewhat disoriented. He wanted a military career, he wanted to study medicine, and later decided on zoology. Eventually, he became a great scholar, and not just a great explorer. He mange to make history and put himself in the service of mankind, like no other, thanks to his own motto: "Keep moving forward ! "

Developing a reason through which you can recognize the worth of others, trying to assimilate those inner forces that are oriented towards magnificent results from the outer world, is necessary to determine the tendency of assuming a powerful role and interpreting it in a "story" of success. A story that you would say writes itself, because it starts from something seemingly accidental, without too much significance, and turns into something completely unexpected, grandiose, innovative.

Inspiration stemming from the study of a role-model, taking on all the pains, torments, hopes, and joys during his attempts of winning the title of champion, transform into a space of expansion, turning your mind and soul into a compass of reinvention and becoming.

A convergent representation of yourself during the development of an existence often based on constraints, rather than joys, is obtained through the idea of exiting the limiting patterns.

This idea can be presented in the following way: "You can only gain the measure of your value by confronting feared situations or the most prosaic of deeds."

People aspiring to be conquerors manage to put into perfect agreement with their models those experiences, attitudes, aspirations, feelings, horizons, by treating them as they would, as sources of income, as long term investments. They not only master their hearts with the magic of electrifying stories, they do not let themselves lured by the magic of a plunge into a realism that is but a simple frame of the Story, they also try to ennoble themselves with the magic of a unique experience.

To continue to move forward in the direction of undetermined results, through a series of converging representations of yourself, means to never say "I do not act in this great role", whatever that role may be in the production of your life. But rather to make use of all qualities extracted from the steps and teachings drawn from the lives of others, in order to reach your own greatness, to build your own legend.

Have you assigned yourself a name in the space of a bestseller field?

The leader assumes a strong role as a contributor to changing the world through the motto of the writer Ioan Romoșan: "You can only have dignity in the face of death by knowing that the life you've lived served a purpose."

The Continuity Formula Of Leadership can be extracted from the equation "Me + The rest of the world", where the "Me" represents, regardless of the assumed role, that deterministic instance available only in its uniqueness, constantly present in the evolution of the world.

And "Them" representing a veritable adventure, a journey into the past or present, through the multitude of knowledge, intentions, actions, and consequences, made after much hesitation and swinging between contradictory feelings, in which is reflected the theme of durable development and competitiveness.

Competitiveness is the engine of evolution. Without competition, performance cannot be obtained. And nothing can be more appropriate for the image of the leader than to be ranked first.

The Continuity Of The Work Of Art

On October 09, 2021

The message that an artist emphasizes in his personal work is the ideal hypostasis of a vast expanse that includes the space between himself and the components of the surrounding world.

I'm at the seaside. I have at hand all the reasons that push me to transform a dream image into a message of the soul, where the image is given by an unlimited number of longitudinally arranged points, projected on a pictorial plane, barely wanting to be caught by the artist's gaze. who knows how to complete the fragmentary character of the moment. In this image, which the artist calls Ritrovhanyn, the matter contained in the nature of things, we recognize the sand that I am going to color in a different style from how I usually color.

Every grain of sand, like every star in the sky, is a memory of a hope, or a winding road unfolding in a court represented by the conscious self, all unfolding in the space of a delightful island. In fact, the sand lazily introduces me into the space of complete freedom, as can be seen, into the space of a modern metaphysical vision. And it is precisely in these arguments that a version of transgressive art is presented, ignoring or despising the truth that it can never be ruled out.

Right now, I am thinking of the image of an Odysseus who would have the chance to return to Ithaca provided he believes that the island is in one's self and he can discover it. This is exactly what the sand reminds me of in its commitment to art, immaginando ciò che non possiamo copiare, in search of abstract wisdom or pursuing spiritual ideals: it reminds me that I must look for myself in a close but seemingly unreal place to remove, in a drawing with many different shades, but still so similar.

Leadership: Does your creation consist of the overlapping of two worlds represented in different ways, but leaving the possibility of either their simultaneous reception or their relationship with your self?

I gaze into the distance, without blinking, looking for that peace that I do not always find in myself, towards those who privilege written expression. I try to build an elegant totality from disparate elements. The sand goes well with the shells, one without the other could not imagine the beach in Mamaia. Two inseparable but distinct worlds. Thus, matter and form are in the highest degree inseparable under the influence of their representation in the sphere of the reality that I observe.

It is a merit to know this. The shape must be equally affected by the side of the contents contained in an isolated phenomenon, such as the algae that the waves bring to shore just from the sea, after a storm. So, what do we need to highlight in order to succeed in an artistic construction?

First of all, we must consider the sea as the "First Cause", because it contains matter: sand, shells and algae. Then we have to pass the sand, the shells and the algae on a human level, on the level of "thinkers" coming from different ages of history. We must also consider the present moment of an inner life's experience, and not the past of the connection with Causality.

Therefore, I am urged to believe that he who has not known this delirium of the search for the connection between spirit and matter, will always lack something of the understanding of art. Because being an artist means seeing the sand in relation to the shells, so that the sea encompasses both of them in a given time whose romantic scent runs smoothly through the century to me with that continuity of feelings and reception of a work of art.

Leadership is close to art, in the sense that everything you see around it means, in fact, focusing on a single aspect and generalizing it through metonymy.

And if metonymy is a figure of speech that consists in replacing one term with another with which it is in a relationship of continuity, then the idea of art can relate more to the opposite unity, that of the embodiment of the particular in the universal. Thus, my creation becomes the symbol of a world that is fulfilled by relating to another type of existence, one based on the two defining elements of art: duality and the continuous present.

The Continuity Of The Work Of Art is observed in any element of nature that completes another, then another, and another, through a complementarity that particularizes the identity profile of mentality in which lives the artist within me. Therefore, the artist lives through what he particularizes as an identity projection in the process of observing the complementary elements that complete that material creation based on the use of the most flexible forces of the spirit: imagination and incorporation of imagination in the composition of living matter.

Don't forget to fill your mind with artistic sense.

The Continuous Oscillation Of Pendulums

On February 10, 2013

Perfect your evolution, without giving a false interpretation to self-knowledge.

Once, I used to suddenly wake up at night, almost panicked, and troubled by the thought of finding someone or something. Space. Silence. Stillness. Even I did not know too well what was this overwhelming and vague memento of engaging in a reality that can only be conquered by imagination, which does not cease to amaze. A thought, illuminating like lighting for a moment, without hesitation in shape, then extinguishing in a strange way, finding a living echo in my mind disturbed by the illusion of a dream.

And this ambivalent thought, the summarization of my ever increasing demands, the connector adapted to be attached around a battery charged with neutral stimuli, was preparing its big hit: pushing my limits to the point agony. Any attempt to find out the meaning of life in a moment of wandering, the weakness of one's own will, is doomed to a retreat into exile, to an inner turmoil that would drive anyone mad.

There was a deep change in my mind. I was entering the gray area of ambiguity. At which point, it was as if nothing was happening, but something was increasing in intensity. A paralysis, seconded by an intense tension at the point of encounter with the unknown. Who did I measure my forces with?

I had no target, I wasn't pursuing any result, but I was launching like an arrow from atoo tightly bow, away from myself. I was blinded by a mysterious call, a vibration of something or someone that darkened my logic.

I cannot argue with the truth once expressed by an anonymous writer: "Some people get on a fast train, but even they do not know very well where they are going. They grope back and forth, until they wake up; then, they start over, until they lose themselves for good."

Leadership: Are you able to oppose a particular experience that marks you through its realism, where the feelings embrace unpredictable forms and manifestations of your attachment to the beliefs you consciously respect?

I also had climbed on that fast train al paso del momento, not knowing what I was looking for, not being able to cause a change or separating myself from my perceptions of "void". My reason was strangled by a strange paradox: I was letting myself be dominated by other coordinates, not knowing what laybeneath them. A contradiction had born in me between the "area" of my conscience and the variety of other consciences, a contradiction between what I wanted and what I could do.

I no longer knew what is true and what is illusion. The superior conviction I consciously respected was that that I couldn't simultaneously experience two different worlds, that of the dream and of reality. Just like Kant, I came to have the passion of tireless searches. I continually questioned the inherent causes which make phenomena possible. But if Kant continually exceeded the limits he thought entitled to set in a determined time of his research, the analysis of these thoughts directed towards my essence inhibited me.

The prototype of a genuine and compulsory experience that interfered or interacted with a private space of lucid thought, of hidden self-knowledge. Finding answers in an unlimited complexity was the source of my anxiety.

I was seeing a diffuse light through some gray curtains. I reached out and tried to push them away. A sort of new conscience anchored inside me, with lots of wheels and springs compelled me, pushed "back" my present conscience. And it wanted to evolve to the maximum possible limit, inoculating me some values, but also a huge sense of guilt.

When are two pendulums going to return to their original position? When are two consciences, two intellects going to get along? How much longer will they collate in my mind? Until when will they put pressure on my personality?

Leadership: What interpretation can you attribute to self-knowledge attached to a psychological state whose representation is no longer concerned with factual details, events, but rather their forging in a grave ambiance?

Do you get on a train without knowing where you're headed? Do you let yourself be blinded by a mysterious call, a vibration of something or someone that is clouding your logic? Do you give priority or exaggerate the value of a single element participating in the alchemy of your own being? Do you turn into an avid seeker of certainty and uncertainty? Do you get away from yourself?

Much of your evolution is the result of exploring new vital knowledge that does not seduce you with much color, but gives you the certainty of an "awakening" from the numbness of a perpetual state of expectation, dissatisfaction, due to uncertainty in being able to distinguish the "real" from the "imaginary".

Self-knowledge is the result of overcoming your limits in fighting demons when you are facing pressing imperatives of reality that change the significance you give to life.

Personally, I give a single interpretation of self-knowledge attached to a psychological state in whose representation I am no longer interested in factual details, events, but in their shaping in a grave ambiance: that that the threatening experience of the sentiment of the uncontrollable and that of helplessness decides the true capacity of my character to change radically.

The power of being different is expressly aimed at the ability of character to change under the influence of a situation radically changed by the image that your reason creates in a bounded reality.

This is when your understanding breaks away and you enter the gray area of ambiguity – the amplification factor of self-instability. This is the critical time in your development as future leader that I call "neglect of vital-stimulatory function", the critical lucidity in relation to acceptance.

Thus, your horizons, instead of clarifying and expanding, they get ever closer to the zero-point, to that inner void,where no matter how much you spread new meanings, interpretations, lights and feelings, they do not reach a common denominator, they cannot touch. You come to find yourself in the position of the traveler who gets on a fast train,even he not knowing too well where he is going. You grope back and forth, until you wake up; then, you start over, until you lose yourself for good.

There is always place for ineffable, for mystery, for an unknown quantity hard to solve in the equation thoroughly built: self-knowledge-harmonization-evolution. For that, you must separate yourself from your perceptions of "void". Do not let you reason be strangled by coordinates required, but establish yourself other coordinates in accordance with the present requirements and those of your ability.

Letting reality overcome you is the testimony of a particular experience of the "fantastic" type, which has become a source of concern for all those who are trying to reconcile with the burden of a living without worries and without challenges.

The Continuous Oscilation Of Pendulums designates the revolt of the two consciences you must separate for your leadership to increase – that knowledge of light, wchich unceassantly guides you like a star, and that knowledge of darkness, which takes over your horizons, giving the impression that there is no escape, that you are somehow alone with yourself, with your anxieties and fears.

Adopt a new vision of yourself and your conscience, a new, bright vision, ridding yourself of negative emotions generated by fear of change. The world, as Darwin said, will belong to those adaptable, but also receptive to present and future requirements.

Perfect your evolution, without giving a false interpretation to self-knowledge.

The Continuous Rebirth In The Ultimate Work of Living

On May 15, 2024

What you perceive as "real" may be the mere surface of an illusory world designed to prepare you for higher knowledge.

The experience I had recently was truly astonishing, a kind of Erisyoacyk Amoselion, a bridge between mind, body and soul, through which an external world flowed unimpeded into me. I am still searching for its deeper meaning.

When I woke up this morning, the objects I found next to me, a mask, a clock and a rose, were clues that reality and dream are more closely connected than it seems at first glance. The theater mask on the bedside table made me think of the roles I played in life, against my will, Prospero, Hamlet, Timon or Macbeth, and the fleeting desire to hide my true face under various masks. Could the dream, my living in another reality, be a call to open my eyes to the hidden possibilities and unexplored experiences of this life?

The story of my dream is the story of the secrets I lived through. It was as if I tried to escape from a memory without the present or, on the contrary, to join a process of seeing a half of me, conditioned by art to illuminate my soul through an obvious tendency to intensify the dialogue between real and unreal. The better a magician protects his secrets, the more mundane they turn out to be. The scene, of course, had developed around me, thanks to my alleged ability to be in two places at the same time.

But the most intriguing object in the dream, referring to the objects discovered near me, was an abstract painting, whose vibrant colors and nebulous forms seemed to lead me to an increasingly acute perception of the infinite. That moving blue expanse, stagnant in its movement, valid only through the free expressiveness that the painting offered me, was in an unstable balance, somewhere between the informal and the figurative, between the abstract and the concrete.

Leadership: The discovery that "what you see is not what it really is" invites you to ask how much of what you know is actually filtered through illusions?

As a result, faced with the ultimate demonstration of the impossible, I oscillate between the two identities of the painting, both strikingly appealing to me. One that truly belonged to me, the other that pushes to madness, that permanent state of somnambulism, through which life, with its forms of manifestation, registers its suite of endless variations. The unstable balance in a work of art can mirror the inner tensions of the observer.

I closed my eyes again. Not a word. Nothing explicit. I felt like I was in an empty, silent room where God, wearing a black hooded Halloween cape, revealed his mysterious presence in a moving, fluid painting that flowed like the time in the works of Salvador Dali. It was like some kind of profound spiritual revelation, a connection to the divine beyond ordinary forms, as something made me step out of ordinary patterns of perception and experience an altered state of consciousness, a mysterious fusion with reality beyond appearances.

Abandoning limited consciousness is the path to enlightenment.

When I opened my eyes, the sensation had remained so strong that I thought I myself had melted into a landscape as fluid as time, from Dali's paintings. Unsettling and unsettling, I felt as if objective reality had dissolved, the boundaries between me and the outside world becoming blurred, and my perception completely distorted and surreal. However, a feeling of loneliness had overwhelmed me, as if I had separated from this world, just to know God, and once I found him, it immediately disappeared. Abstract art challenges you to find meaning and order in apparent chaos.

Leadership: Could you perceive an image that leads to a subjective estimation of reality, borrowing symbolic elements capable of building an organic creative being with an infinite diversity of embodiments?

The magician in Christopher Priest's novel confessed part of the secret of illusionism:

"At the base of the mystery are three , possibly four of the six fundamental categories of illusions: the Russian disappears , then the Russian disappears in another part , somehow it seemed to have been an element of transfer, and all had been done in apparent defiance of the laws of nature. A disappearance on the stage is relatively easy to prepare , by placing mirrors or half - mirrors , the use of light, the use of canvases or the black flocks, and so on . The appearance in another place is usually a matter of pre-placing an object or a faithful copy of it. Or, if it is a person , the placement a convincing double of the person concerned. The combination of these two effects produces the third; in its disorder, the audience believes that it has witnessed the defiance of the laws of nature."

Just a dream artist. God gave me the dream to fulfill my reality. I'm still thinking, if my dream was not the exquisite presentation of a stage illusion, good enough to make me know myself better under the aspect of a Delirium, a Synaesthesia, which unites the past and the present in a special way .

Father and son both learn the disturbing truth: "what we see is not what it really is". One merges with the other, until both become one - a single merged consciousness, where the boundaries between identities blur completely. They pass unconsciously from one to the other, without even knowing whether this transfer is made in one direction or the other.

The moment when God intervenes in the dream suggests the transition from creation to revelation.

The painting caught the life of the dream and became a reality. Suddenly, and without any threshold, she introduced me into this infinity of illusions generated by the creative force of the mind itself, at a moment when God said: "Enough". And, wiping the sweat from his brow, He invited me to step further on the path to the infinite, on the condition that I abandon myself to his vision, and I soon began to appreciate, at its true value, the quality involved in this loss - or regaining - of consciousness.

In the end, I was able to deeply understand the meaning of this inexplicable experience. Here it is: "The uniting of identities into a single consciousness can symbolize the integration of divergent aspects of the self."

In leadership you will always run into this harsh law: "Be prepared to temporarily lose your usual benchmarks in order to gain a higher knowledge."

This higher knowledge is achieved by integrating and reconciling the divergent aspects of the self into a unified consciousness so as to gain a deeper and more comprehensive insight into reality and one's own being.

The Continuous Rebirth In The Ultimate Work of Living symbolizes the transcendence of limitations and the constant evolution of the being towards higher levels of understanding and awareness. Dreams can function as a theater of the mind, staging complex illusions that reveal deep truths. So here is the one truth that inspired me to write this article:

"The more you want to know about yourself and the world, the more you must dream, for dreams are portals to the unexplored depths of being and the universe ."

The Convulsion Of A Supreme Conscience

On September 30, 2013

Always reason and live in the spirit of dialogue with yourself, so as to ensure the development of positive moral values that do not turn a Self into a unity of Multiplicity.

Everything gets a whole new meaning in a somber parallel universe where paradox lingers as a replacement of the unacceptable, which has become a referential parameter in the case of a heartless being, with a sober conscience. Compromising, the resultant of two concurrent forces, good and evil, irreparably transform into one sole dominant force contrary to the pure science that doesn't accept the demotion to an inferior step.

Machiavellic, this force that opposes every humanitarian feeling, any moral principle, any noble reflection, supports the quick update of reaction elements in the process of distorting reality and mental support. Without struggle, it stimulates the apparition of a total, extreme dynamism. It increases the body temperature to a certain value, then it oscillates around this value, tensing the muscles and speeding up blood pressure.

The thoughts of Hannibal Lecter don't emit warning signals; they create the appearance of a normalcy, a stable state. He finds his escape in the camp of his army, in his subtle, but lethal stinging scorpion senses, qualities, imagination, reason and reflexes. He would mercilessly kill any being standing in front of his liberty or who tries to enter his diabolical mind.

Leadership: Can you discover all the facets of your personality around a vision drawn from the effects of trying to find out new truths about yourself so that you can completely change the image you see of yourself?

Weird enough, Hannibal seems to live in a convulsion of intense concentration over himself, frequently re-projecting the complex structure of his mind's intelligence supported by connection cables to a continuous high energy source. We could say of him that he suffers from multiple personality, a kind of experience of approaching a dehumanized Alter Ego, because his mind consumes three kinds of images: an image of a fragile man, an image of a continuous reconstruction of the self, an image of a sick person and an image of a gifted personality.

At times, he seems trapped in the power of an adverse state, an uncontrollable thought, emerging from the grip of conscience like a loose torpedo. You'd say he reacts and lives in the spirit of the dialogue with himself, with the defining entity of his character. Which cancels the whole effort and power of the spirit to be aware of the positive values. Just like an automobile that rushes illegally on the road, this somber entity focuses its range on an inappropriate axis for the moral infrastructure's complete rehabilitation.

But even the monster can be overcome by the fear of that terrible feeling, sharp as a guillotine blade. It somehow seems dominated by the warm flicker of light that still persists in his conscience, by the living thoughts, which connect him to everything human within him. The exterior blends with the interior, where everything seems to evolve in a continuous agony.

When will I leave in complete peace with myself, with the peaceful conscience of a virtuous and clean man, beloved by God?

Leadership: Are you in contrast to an Ego subjected to external pressures, in correspondence with a life perspective that takes into account the need to define an identity that blends with another identity?

A complex configuration of human personality, compared to quality leadership that benefits from the advantage to be closer to a deeper area, which hasn't yet been fully exploited and maturely directed, can be seen in the future from the point of view of self-experiences. Man, subject to his own reason, more likely matured based on a production of strong stimuli and some relentless challenges, plays his part as lever for a sustainable personal development. Or on the contrary, for an involution of the self.

The leader doesn't have to be a man in opposition to his self, taken by the flux and reflux of a world that comes and a world that goes. This thing reflects the lack of belonging to a solid conscience, to a healthy Ego, thus the lack of inner conflicts. If man doesn't know which way to go in order to safely and efficiently pass to a better perspective, not to a territory haunted by the ghost of nothingness, of emptiness and of non-value, then the results gathered by developing leadership, performed simultaneously with the real application of measures for preserving identity, will change into something worse and will remain below the profitability limit imposed by leadership.

An identity that blends with another identity is the extended nature of a thought that revolves around one, moving away from the self and at the same time approaching it, is the fruit of the experience of being the same man, but under another aspect, under another behavior or privileged position. Opening or closing the self in a different reality, in a somber parallel universe where paradox lingers, as a replacement of the unacceptable, which has become a referential parameter, becomes more of a problem than a solution, an expectation full of uncertainties, a viable option for change. But not for personal benefit.

Leadership: How do you position yourself in a context like "If you go deep into yourself, you will reach your nothingness ! ", in relation to a vision that goes beyond the feeling of an acute intellectual extremity?

Not letting yourself get carried away by the wave of self-oblivion, analyzing the absolutely important consequences of drafting a new agreement with yourself which grants you the capacity of becoming the major shareholder of a invigorating intellectual becoming, which creates and doesn't destroy the meaning of life and responsible freedom, you will avoid to be caught under the power of an adverse state. Of the uncontrollable thoughts, negatively loaded, emerging from the grip of a conscience altered by various limiting factors.

To always reason and live in the spirit of the dialogue with yourself, namely to try and overcome the blockages (between you and people or experiences) following the moral implications of your acts, you will be able, to a certain extent, to ensure an increase in your positive moral values. Which in turn contribute to a peace with yourself, helping you to leave with the pacified conscience of a virtuous man who knows to correctly regulate "the temperature" of his mind in those negative circumstances that don't really serve his spiritual needs.

Someone used to say: "If you venture deep within yourself, you will reach your nothingness." This indicates man's inflexibility and stagnation in a critical point. Subject to a routine of thinking, which continuously searches for the confrontation with a bothersome and unwanted reality, he is forced to redefine more accurately and nuanced the relationship with himself.

Have you reached the stage in which you feel that you can't reconcile with yourself? Do you have the courage to venture deep within yourself, to follow the revolutionary and evolutionary implications of your own nature, to avoid that fall in the emptiness of your being?

A vision that goes beyond the feeling of an acute intellectual extremity is a mental image between the formation of a very high self-esteem and the need to represent, at will, an authority and a strong sense of superiority.

The Convulsion Of A Supreme Conscience designates that power that streams from within ourselves, generated by a positive thinking which knows the exact limits of the unanimously accepted normalcy. It means a regrouping of "armed forces" in view of a decisive attack over the chaos that has emerged in us or outside of us.

The Convulsions Of A World In A State of Eternal Change

On April 10, 2018

Dare to be what truly defines you when you are not someone else.

The world I was experiencing, thanks to Camil, seemed suspicious, strident, immoral. The women in the midst of which he lived at times wore honorable labels, and yet they were for sale. And there were buyers. At what price? That was the only question and what made them different. Prices varied not according to the woman's beauty, but according to their possibilities to resist the needs of life. I did not understand his scruples, this writer so seductive through the spell of his artistic use of words, through the spell of his own being that caused an abrupt rhythm in my daily life.

Camil was not surprised by the passion I put in everything I was saying, the big words and the conviction that I was always right. I wanted to impress him, but I had to recognize all the indifference he showed to his inferiors, to me who wanted to be like him, in the depths of my heart, for I almost idolized and copied much of his thoughts. I wanted to be like him, like a god who speaks words of silver, which no one can fight against by any use of reason borrowed from experience.

My life became more and more exciting. Hard to believe, but I was getting deeper into a reality that rises above any shortcomings, above any concepts of good and evil, above any examinations of consciousness, thereby demonstrating that the sum of my values was fraught with the poor powder of extreme vanity, hypocrisy and vain instincts, benefiting from that privilege discretion as sweet as a luminous and seductive scent with a persistent odor that lasts. *

Leadership: Are you prepared to assimilate the idea of "a painful weakness" with the uppermost floor of an image that triggers the feeling of an invincible power?

It is exactly Camil's case. Convinced that he carries within him the energy of an atom, and that once this energy is released, the world will turn 180 degrees, he was too lucid to take on obligations that he could not cope with and leave me stranded. Too selfish to give up on me, too jealous to leave the path free for someone else.

Yes, I also wanted a life seen from above with the most intense concerns, but I was rather living it from the depths, from the deepest abyss. Something forcing me to go further, but without knowing where. Certainly, I was overcome by the same sense of discomfort and anxiety that Tolstoy described in his Journal. "I almost physically felt the mad immorality of the luxury of the powerful and the rich, the poverty and the oppression of the poor. I suffer almost because of the consciousness of participating in this madness and this evil."

And I think the same thing that Jean Garnier was saying about his former student and friend fits me just as good: "Albert Camus was not mistaken on the values of his own powers; he was by way of a very rare exception the exact judge of his value. Instead, he had to make himself be recognized by others. And his starting position was so humble that he had to affirm himself with the risk of being crushed."

Leadership: Is the only way to keep a position of authority that of gaining control over what it means to be a messenger of an inexorable destiny without God?

Keeping your authority in the face of life's trials is a way to maintain yourself or find your place in an extremely tough world. It means to deal with a life that shows its back to you, resembling a form of attachment to the effect of a psychological operation to keep your calm in any situation, with patience of steel. And if you feel abandoned by God when your destiny tests you and you do not know what to do, you can leave the misleading impression that you have a vision that goes beyond life, like driving a car in a clear direction, but you do not know where to park it.

Camil, Cella Serghi's character, is not only guilty of the inability to detach himself from his attachment to the pleasures of life. Not only did the unique writer's talent blur all horizons, but his true unhappiness lies in the splendor of which no one found a cure in the midst of all events that assaulted him tumultuously. He knows perfectly how to conceal his spiritual pain, he can convince everyone that the meaning of life is the power to be fulfilled by unmeasured desires, but fails to annihilate his pride to act as a high-ranking man, a personality far above his tag.

In turn, Cella Serghi turns her personality into a statement of uniqueness on the basis of the link between being above everyone and the psychosocial impact of the pain of not being understood by anyone. In fact, its uniqueness resembles the image of God that permits unjust things and deeds, forgiving any sin that would favor a person to the detriment of another, which is revealed in the harmony of everything that exists. But this God expects more from her than she can endure. HE expects her to give up that Alter Ego that almost replaces her entire being standing at the edge of the universe.

Leadership: Are you aware of the true measure of your soul before taking the fulfillment of others as a model, by reference to the trajectory of a destiny that prematurely outlines its finality?

Being a messenger of an inexorable destiny without God means to think of yourself as a winner in a race with the world, but in which you cannot test your limits because you are under the challenge of facing your own fears and regrets. This would be equivalent to your reporting to the trajectory of a destiny that prematurely outlines its purpose, that is, you are no longer able to justify the essence of your own manifestation, but you are the prisoner of anxieties and doubts that grind you to exhaustion, to erosion, to indifference, to disgust.

Never be more than you can handle at an elite level, otherwise you risk getting lost in the whirlwind of worldly vanity, and in this vortex remains no room for any high feeling. This finding comes from the intention of keeping the word "humanism" untouched by the effects of the peak experiences and the conditioning imposed on you by the example of others' fulfillment.

The thinking of the leader is the thinking of the being that allocates time to balance itself in its personal life, always ready to maintain itself in the authenticity of a confession, ambitious to better discourse what can make entry into a reality that stumbles in its own limits, or in one that grasps increasingly bolder wings concerning the will of the Lord.

To be educated in the spirit of greater responsibility to the voice of consciousness is to answer the challenge of thinking who you really are when you feel that you are someone else.

The Convulsions Of A World In A State Of Eternal Change affirm the importance of a feeling motivated by the ephemeralness of a life that brings you both up and down, "goading you", with the conviction that you can be God, but at the same time you can be one of His judgements that culminates with the birth of the tragedy of life.

The Core Of Leadership

On April 14, 2020

What you think and believe about yourself is what separates knowledge from information.

The famous alchemist Van Helmont was talking at one point about a stone he saw and had, which cured all diseases, including the plague. Here is what he said about it when he had to save the lives of important people. Especially since the same stone ended up in the hands of a skilled man named Butler, and it saved many people from death.

There was once a certain Irishman, whose name was Butler, who lived in the time of James, King of England. Butler was a prisoner of Vilvoorde Castle, and there he took pity on a certain Baillius, a Franciscan monk and well-known preacher in those lands, who was also imprisoned there. The latter had a very strong infection on one of his arms.

One afternoon, when the monk could no longer bear the pain and despair, Butler touched with a small stone, light and soft, with a very low hardness, a tablespoon of almond milk. He then sent someone to take the medicine to the monk, giving precise instructions for the liquor to be taken within an hour at most. After that time had passed, to the great surprise of the patient, his infection healed. The next morning, after hearing this, I set out for Vilvoorde to witness Butler's great deeds, with whom I became close friends. Shortly afterwards, I saw a poor old woman who had been working with an unbearable headache since she was sixteen. She was healed in my presence.

Butler soaked the same small stone in a tablespoon of olive oil, then wiped it with his own tongue. He then poured the small spoonful of oil into a bottle of oil. He then told the woman to rub her head with just a drop of that oil. In this way, she was immediately healed. Witnessing this incident, I was stunned, and he, smiling, said to me:

*- My dear friend, if you do not come to this part, where you will be able to cure all diseases with a single cure, you will always remain in your young beginnings, no matter how old you become.

Leadership: Do you have the ability to open the horizons of unlimited progress in knowledge from the perspective of metaphysics, so that you will always remain in your young beginnings, no matter how old you become?

There are two kinds of knowledgeable people. Those who understood the underbelly of the Great Knowledge, managing to express its essence in a purely metaphysical language, meaning that it is perceived only by those initiated in the field (a small number of individuals). And those who understood how to emphasize the essence of the Great Knowledge through simple formulations that emanate a kind of warmth of soul, with a scent of inspiration, as when you constantly listen to a rhythmic song, cheerful or sensual, without memorizing its lyrics. Their work touches your soul.

Whereas the true connoisseur is the one who combines elegantly, simply, spiritually, both ways of approaching the Great Knowledge – making it not only accessible, but truly noble. And then there are the "smart ones", those who understood everything, but who all their lives did not create anything in the name of Science (waiting for others to do everything for them). These are the most useless people for the world and for progress. And you meet an old man who all his life did not understand what Creation is, but who identifies with wisdom. It's really hilarious, isn't it?

Usually, the horizons of a progress in knowledge, related to metaphysics, sets the expectation that one sees the reality beyond the world that one believes to be singular in nature. We realize that there is also a world of stones, born of the desire to rediscover nature, to know closely some effects and causes rarely observed by anyone. He who finds a cure for a disease with help of a rare stone is a man who constantly seeks, through each action taken, the miracle of a work of God in its midst.

To always remain in your young beginnings, no matter how old you become, means to take as a model of spiritual value the dynamic aspect of a continuous evolution. It means to obtain the desired results by reinventing yourself as a model of your own infinite possibility of reconstructing reality and manifesting thought into matter.

If we refer to knowledge, through an identification with the world of things, then the stone suggests (according to an internet user) strength and safety, elegance and classic, rustic or modern refinement. In addition to its unique appearance, natural stone (especially decorative stone) is a durable and extremely resistant material to many external factors, including temperature changes.

So, knowledge is a real pillar of stability in terms of man's ability to understand the meaning and connection of phenomena, so that he knows how to use any element of nature, any law of nature to strengthen his ability to experience certain close-call situations and give them a certain meaning.

Knowledge is desirable only if it prolongs youth, not old age, ensuring man's ability to analyze the elements of nature and to transform reality. By making thinking more flexible, knowledge creates a predisposition for a certain field of activity. In this regard, to be a witness to the great deeds of another means to be an observer who measures his knowledge from the perspective of the relationship between youth and old age, on the horizon of a cold objectivity, which belongs only to him.

If we consider the naiveté of human nature, which imagines that it can exceed its limits, reaching the impossible, we agree with those acts of glory, with those acts of creation, with those colossal discoveries that have influenced the evolution of mankind, not totally but partially, yet certainly decisively. Evolution certainly achieves results in the "salvation" of mankind, with those facts of great practical importance, influenced by the glory of a generation of people who would transcend their age through assumed freedom and openness to the new, studying and penetrating the mysterious depths of nature and its regeneration.

What separates knowledge from information is a better order of truths that transcend the limits of human reason, which we can know only through the revelation of God.

Leadership means broadening a person's horizons in his or her eternity so that what surrounds nature surrounds the transcendence of a new birth, that is, the desire to escape from a mechanized daily time, to be consistent with the certainty of making the spiritual, timeless world triumph in front of the material world.

The Core Of Leadership in accordance with the general picture of the world, of the place and role of man in this world, is the way in which knowledge can be applied to change the state of things, or to influence the course of events on the world stage.

A leader is a deep connoisseur of the mystical mysteries concerning the constraint to which the revealing state of fact of the being that can become the object of knowledge is subjected.

The Cornerstone Of Magic

On April 04, 2017

Align yourself with what you can control, not with what you avoid doing.

I am Gerry Lane, a scientist, and I need to find out the origin of the virus that has filled the world with a new species of predator, one called Zombies. Something more real and much more terrifying than in the movies. How was I so unlucky that I myself would turn out to be the Joker in an attempt to win the thrilling game with life on death's terms? And yet, as in the hope of an extraordinary moment, I feel as if I have discovered in a mysterious ancient tomb a well-preserved mosaic that, provoking the mind to an endless duel between research and imagination, is a measure to combat the ruthless questions that do not find their answers.

Where the eye captures the essential, a sad and shadowy picture depicts the seemingly limited condition of a new turn of thought and a return to an earlier stage of localization and manifestation of the virus – one that reveals its "symbolic" and "secret" weakness of immuno-compromised individuals or those who go through an acute traumatic episode.

I cannot figure out exactly how the virus carries its presence in the blood, but I have noticed that it is bypassing the sick as the river is bypassing a rock. A painting in the existence of which I did not want to believe, but in which I integrated myself abundantly.

In no case do I want to turn myself into a creature that goes beyond the limits of reason, even if reason drives me into making a grand act within the limits of an acceptable probability of survival. But as a painter, a synthetic spirit seeks the essence, form and volume in space – through a visual reflection, so too my consciousness and my spirit of an evaluator of nature phenomena feel obliged to standardize or reject everything that is "different" in compiling a reaction pattern of the virus.

Leadership: Do you have the ability to open yourself to an exciting experience, without getting lost in its background conditions, taking into account the "enigma" factor that makes reality fantastic in a world full of unanswered questions?

The real cornerstone of magic is in fact the cornerstone of the evolution of the world, of knowledge, of all things, which make a troubled existence of contradictions and tensions, unable to be maintained only at the normal level, to be marked by an "imperfect work of nature" which must be accepted as a challenge to resume the game of the world in another way.

Here we must take into account the power of man to distinguish between good and evil, but especially, we can refer to the book written by Alice Roberts, "The great chance of existence", which highlights that ability of man to probe his past and his life in general by the very careful observation of the processes present in his own being, and, succeeding in discovering himself, he also discovers the myriads of his connections with the non-human world to which he is deeply connected like his ancestors.

Undoubtedly, the quality of the man aspiring to a net supremacy status is distinguished by the maturity of the interpretation of the experience that recommends him for a role of action in the shadow of a perfect enigma – one that incites you to discover it as only yours, to reach the objectivity of a knowledge that goes beyond the limits of one's own belief. And magic persists stubbornly: is man what he seems to be, or is he what he can become by eliminating what he is able to endure?

How does a magician manage to levitate? There are seven headlights. An invisible rope. Two side-by-side marine mirrors. A well-defined chapter of chemical pathology. A treasure chest. A cup full of God's wrath and one filled with the miracle of life. And a hypothesis about the beginning of rebirth in the form of a beautiful and captivating storyline of scientific rediscovery.

Gather all this in such a way that their result really gives you One, the kinetic momentum of a whole causal chain. If the painting made by you is true, it will be understood without logical reasoning. Find the secret behind the magic before you master it and use it according to its purpose.

Magic is an experience of the struggle with death, from which life springs in an inexhaustible manner. It aligns itself with what you can control, not with what you avoid doing. It means to dare to throw yourself into the unknown, in the gaps of a mysterious power, and there, floating over the abysses, to get caught tightly by the hand of God. Magic is close to faith, but above it. It is not psychologically localizable, but a way to look and go beyond the limits of reason, pushing yourself to a grand act.

Trusting in the miracle of going beyond the limits of existence is an attempt to grasp the ungraspable within the boundaries of your own form of authority. It is to surprise the essence of a sad and shadowy painting that mirrors the condition of a new twist in thought, making it a provocative revelation of the type: "Everything that happens to me is part of the chain of illusion created by the mind."

Leadership is the world in which you live with the fear of losing your power, that power that is exercised under the dependence of being present in a problematic situation in which the solution can only come through the empirical methods of science.

The Cornerstone Of Magic that turns the science of man into a reality of an unusual power is the ability to open yourself to an exciting experience without getting lost under its basic conditions. These conditions result from what happens when you begin to experience the pain of your own inability to overcome the limits and prejudices specific to the adverse consequences of this unique experience.

The Correct Measuring Of Excellence

On April 06, 2009

It is unjust for your excellence to be questioned, as long as you are not put in a position to prove what you are able to give.

The narrow academic routine, which prevailed at that time in official education, pressed heavily on the shoulders of young sculptor Antoine Bourdelle, whose personality was formed and who was learned to work independently. As he himself noticed, most of those who obtained the coveted awards, ensuring their promotion, didn't know how to shape correctly a nose, a mouth or an ear.

Bourdelle left the institute of fine arts, where he was the second admitted at the admittance examination, looking forward for his way in life. He said: "I don't have the time. At 30, I will have proven myself. My work is in the street, in life."

How do you inflame your excellence? I noted earlier that understanding the priorities and processes that cause your decisions are critical elements of your success. The strength of your focus is the thinking concentrated in form, not only on content, which needs to focus on the present, on the things that you can control, on speeding your own training.

Bourdelle would have wanted to carve huge cathedrals, just as medieval artisans, not only to model human faces, as art teachers would had required him. He also mentioned: "Art is the entire universe recreated into one man."

Leadership: Can you recreate your entire universe without changing its content, so that the art you are trying to highlight does not limit your potential to accomplish what can be truly virtuous?

The sound starting point in this respect is the disposal of "garbage", of absolutely any element, any kind of thinking – imposed by others, which restricts your potential and that have no relevance to the development of your abilities. To generate change in you from a lower to a higher level, you must increase your efficiency and your productivity.

Productivity is like a remote control toy, which you can handle just as long as you power it with batteries. The difference between an independent craftsman (just as Bourdelle dreamed to become) and one who works by the pattern of others is that that first is always self-powering his own potential and value, while the second is powered by others up to a point in his own evolution. The first provides alone the basis of his own evolution, while the second must first strive to match the value that others confer to him, even if their ideas and vision differs significantly from his.

Just as business innovators must ensure that the benefits specific to the brand that they develop are not inconsistent, peripheral or relevant for only a small portion of customers – so you must section on your own the true knowledge, differentiate what is important of what is not, truth from fake. Clarify your ideas and validate your assumptions regarding the beneficial or harmful effects of your evolution through the influence of other "masters", before following them.

To accomplish what can be truly virtuous is to turn your thinking into an art whose main direction is to establish a universe whose meaning is attached to the measure of the things you can accomplish on your own.

The Correct Measuring Of Excellence can be performed by one reference system: yourself. To create a solid foundation for your performance, you must first prove responsibility for the choices you make: to follow others and let yourself influenced by their own style models (so to follow the path suggested by them) or to follow the path that fulfills you and which is proposed by your instinct – the way of personal self-development. In order to achieve the highest levels of craftsmanship, you alone must create your own art.

It is unjust for your excellence to be questioned, as long as you are not put in a position to prove what you are able to give.

Conclusion: In any field, excellence is achieved in time. It is very difficult to obtain that unanimous recognition of a leader's "artistic" abilities. Obviously, that external evaluation is based on actual facts that must be proved. It depends on the leader's tenacity and power to demonstrate his excellence, on the evaluators to "correctly measure excellence" and on the general concept of society at a given time. In leadership, as well, "separating the wheat from the chaff" will be made at a certain time and will prove who deserves to be awarded excellence.

The Countdown

On September 02, 2010

Check out how develops your area of responsibility, by detecting the emotional, mental and behavioral condition of people in decisive moments.

They surpassed so many dangers, they crossed the seas and oceans, yet they had not found a trace of Captain Grant. Their courage was put to sore trials, they had passed through all the emotions of waiting, but they were all now filled with hopelessness, especially Mary and Robert, the Captain's children.

Lord Glenarvan himself was leading the expedition, who was aware they came again to a deadlock in their search. Once again, the map that guided them in their journey, led them on a wrong route, which he himself had recommended. Once again, they had failed. However, having a great enthusiasm, of which only the true adventurers give proof, being confident in the success of the mission that he had prepared by himself, and which he promised to fulfill, he addressed to his small crew:

- We must have confidence, my friends ! Let's have confidence ! Captain Grant is not here, with us, but we are sure we will find him.

Those words were enough to restore hope and good humor to the passengers on the ship Duncan.

Leadership: Do you maintain with dignity the ability to foresee the prospect of success through the eyes of the leader?

During that long journey, all the crew members on Duncan continued to see everything from the perspective of success, through the eyes of Lord Glenarvan, going where he wanted, stopping only where he wanted to, and admitting all that he said. And that is because Lord Glenarvan was clever enough to always give them a drop of confidence and energy, especially in difficult times, causing them to take an active and constructive behavior. His entire attitude shows that he was a strong man, both physically and mentally.

In leadership, there is no victory by resignation !

The only way to reach your goals is to urge people to participate in their achievement, and your first priority in this regard must be improving their work efficiency and enhancing their development potential. Nevertheless, when they reach a new situation or when they are in a great difficulty, or when they seem to beat time, people start having doubts and reservations about your effectiveness as a leader and your leadership ability, and you become a mediocre and weak person in their eyes, whom they no longer have respect for.

People can't courageously follow the will of the man who is not capable of leading them effectively in a direction favorable to them. And in this case, it can even happen that their entire kindness and interest fall so dramatically, that they may begin to have a hostile attitude towards him. In leadership, you either assume your role as a leader and you fulfill your mission, or you are discredited.

Leaders understand the moral of the Scottish proverb: "You can never be bound by a promise made recklessly." Lord Glenarvan's promise was rooted so deeply in the mind and soul of his crew that everything they made issued from it. They many times rushed into the unknown, putting their lives in danger – in the spirit, of course, of finding Captain Grant. And every time, his promise with the value of commitment represented a reason strong enough to follow him.

Ten, nine, eight, seven...

When the signs of a possible crisis, with everything it implies, are increasingly visible, people's state of mind becomes more and more unpredictable, reaching indignation and revolt. The patience of everyone on the ship Duncan was put into pressure when, after months of travel, they had reached exactly the coast of South America, without finding any trace which would indicate the place where Captain Grant could be found.

In that moment, desperate and frustrating, Lord Glenarvan could hardly appease the spirits. He still succeeded through his words full of hope and his tone full of courage and ardor, but it was probably for the last time. Because from that moment on, all his crew members has "started" the countdown. If they failed to track the captain as soon as possible, the last bit of confidence they granted him would totally disappear. And, therefore, the relationship between them would be altered forever.

You can't let people stay too much in stand-by !

People can't encourage themselves all alone. As a leader, you can't expect them to fill with courage and propel themselves forward. Your task is to encourage and help them reach their potential, by giving them the energy to move forward when they stop because of an error. However, you can't let people stay too much in "stand-by", because they are big consumers of hope. You can't be either overly optimistic and say: "We will wait as long as it is needed."

People, with all their beliefs, fall into your mission up to a point. Because, absolutely, there is a limit till where they are willing to follow you, the point where the countdown reaches 0. Then, they decide whether it is worth to confide in you and follow you further or leave you for good. They will ask themselves questions like: Where does this guy lead us to? Is it worth to follow him? Will we be safe with him? Then, they will firmly choose the most convenient option.

Conclusion: From the moment you became a leader, the countdown starts. It is up to you when it reaches 0, this point meaning victory or failure.

Throughout the "road", especially in critical situations, you are the mobilizing factor that maintains the enthusiasm, hope and the proactive attitude of the team. Even in the moments when you have lost your hope, do not externalize yourself in front of the team, but inspire them trust, and, at the same time, strive to find solutions in order to overstep the crisis.

Check out how develops your area of responsibility, by detecting the emotional, mental and behavioral condition of people in decisive moments.

The Creation Of An Uncompromising Revolutionary Art

On June 15, 2014

Propose yourself to insert a systemic thinking and perfected in leadership, through finding and applying the unique process for approaching the revolutionary themes.

Therefore, Eisenstein intends, at a first vision, some precise targets. Among these is included the attempt of a frontal attack against the bourgeois film and its influences for creating an "uncompromising revolutionary art" in the film area. Then the artist intends to introduce the materialist-dialectical thinking in the film, to find a cinematic equivalent to it, to "bring in relation the mutual indissoluble" the dialectic and the cinematography means of expression.

The attempt is definitely audacious, it foreshadows, in fact, his future clearer ideas about the intellectual film. Eisenstein intends, in fact, finding the unique formal process for approaching the revolutionary themes. "The strike", as the other films in the series, was to explain the revolutionary "technique of the fight". Eisenstein pursues the cinematic exposure of an idea. The theme does not have to acquire a highlighted expression in the form of a story that would transfer the idea in the field of the fable, to make it understandable. The theme followed to be communicated directly. **

Leadership: Can you realize a distribution of knowledge and innovation within the territory of a science that dares to put across the trends of the moment?

The greatest achievement of an artist and the step forward made by him, without considering the subjectivity of a certain age, we see in the fact that always the things and the charm of his form are revealed with a spiritual independence that allows reference to the phenomena of the outer world. The artist does not depend on the element he strives with so much energy to develop in the exposure of his work by placing the sound, light and darkness at its center, but by creating the immediate ability to receive the impressions of reality and to reproduce them through fantasy in artistic images.

Leadership is based on the elements and the laws of a vast science, focusing on the appropriate knowledge of the preliminary observations which require some modifications of thinking depending on how you manage your creative resources for overcoming and dominance the "impossible". That is why the great artists of the change focuses on finding new forms of expression of the ideals, daring in terms of the vision which cut in the plane of the world a single perspective of the future world and its configuration, in the context of the current complexity.

The perfect expression of a new art is a long history of finding the unprecedented formal process to tackle a revolutionary theme !

Art is a mix of combinations, means of analysis and creation, most often established individually, ie coming from a single creator who mediates the transition from a new formula of finding research topics that meet the needs of the progress, to a formula of quality assurance and improvement of a "proper good" of the finished product.

That is why the exposure of an idea it is an absolute condition of the tabulation of a new construction of thought. A condition of approaching, providing and popularizing a revolutionary theme of compounding art.

The tendencies of the moment are the emphasis on everything that is natural, according to the emotional factor of keeping up with the feeling of immediate satisfaction that is given up in exchange for a future hope for a new variant of reality. If your science dares to get past these trends of the moment, then your theme probably will not take the form of a story, not the form of a confrontation between freedom of conscience and the need for social cohesion.

Leadership: Do you contribute to the development of your art by definition by defining a superior form of autonomy specific to the area of creation?

The most interesting side of leadership that allows to submit, in the own concept, the empire of a science rich in content (given by the character of the vision productions, where more matching puzzles of the means of expression are resolved), are focused exclusively on the accumulation of ideals, rules and principles generally accepted, on the definition of a new form of autonomy specific to the creative space.

This space facilitates your catalyzed access to a higher level of knowledge; it creates the tools with which to encapsulate the sum of qualities and skills acquired through learning and by applying what you have learned, through the assimilation of new intellectual skills, but especially through continuing trials to assign value to your discoveries.

And their own creative products must be endowed with a number of exemplary qualities in order to be considered adaptive or innovative. Expression of certain themes of thinking through the experiences, forms and principles of building the means of expression, are used to render the valuable content of a discovery. Of a "work of art".

Do you concern yourself permanently on developing those themes of fundamental nature that show a good potential to provide original results?

Autonomy in art is the means to give life to a theme that does not suffer from any constraints or boundaries, having the possibility of being above any moral.

The creation of an uncompromising revolutionary art take into account the appearance of some new artists and some forces of change specific to any type of leadership, in the stage when science is gaining momentum. And the responsibility to "personalize" it becomes a blessing, because the effort that it involves brings with it the joy to connect you to the energy of a creative act sprung up from the passion for learning. For exploring new frontiers of using the knowledge.

The Creation Of Man In His Complexity

On May 14, 2014

Direct your thinking towards superior development goals, departing yourself from that uniformity in thought that limits your visionary status.

Something unknown moved silently in the shadows, like a current flowing in one direction and then in another. Whose intensity increased and decreased, producing visible effects. Then it reversed, it rose and decreased again, so that the cycle can repeat itself for quite a while. It was the soul of a man caught between existence and non-existence, a unification between subjectivity and objectivity that went beyond my understanding, gravely prejudicing my status.

Was this startling vision only one thing, the effect of uneven distribution of a current that crossed the massive conductor, isolated in the enclosed space: consciousness? This inconvenient witness in me seemed to warn me of an illogical fact, devoid of usual bases, revealing something from the mystical world of fantasy, exerting a sense of great subtlety.

I myself was the creation of this unusual occurrence, of the total being, animated by the living voice of expression through images. The obscure origin of good and evil, of the ineffable and of the depth that avoids being mistaken with interiority. A little more than the endless cycle of interactions with the unusual I was experiencing by knowing the usual. An exaggerated pride that if were it not to find an expression in reality, surged in the imaginary side.

This representation, both real and unreal, was brought close to consciousness by the unconscious, establishing and causing a sort of hallucinatory fascination that justified the vision of a high revelation – belonging exclusively to that part of the mind that allowed the possibility of penetrating and understanding my complexity.

Leadership: Do you ensure the usefulness of your revealing thinking for the development of your own identity, as if from a scenario whose director subjectively experiences a reality that can at any point get tangled within its own limits?

The usefulness of revealing thinking to the development of one's own identity can be manifested by the way in which reality is determined as a sharing of a genius creation that has evolved from the realistic bill of expression of inspirational themes to the gradual decipherment of the meanings of a mysterious parable.

This creation can only be exploited by people authorized by you through the craving of the story that you sneak into their souls.

I think, without committing an exaggeration, considering the evolution of the process of renewal of your engagement in the way of constructing reality, that if you don't foresee an escape from the normal, if you are not animated by an emergence from the humane usual, then you will not be able to ensure yourself the utility of thinking for the use of developing your own identity. This thinking is mainly based on revelations concerning the hidden aspects of your personality, on the experience of your own feelings, on various forms of self-knowledge experimentally verified.

A reality that can get tangled within its own limits at any time corresponds to the representation of a world of which, when you try to describe it differently, you feel that you are not part of.

Your position within the sphere of the normal, marked essentially by a pale intellectual glow or by an aging force of processing the real that can no longer ensure the stimulation of the activity of creation, breaks that ingenuity that enables you to integrate in a broader and more advanced world to explore.

It is the world of the Self that gathers its waters, climbing towards new springs, of a self that experiences itself subjectively. The power of the mental to enter the game of a new form of expression of what you experience with such intensity, through which you improve your capacity of innovation in the field of science, in an attempt to gain access to new fundamental truths about life.

A visionary is a man who creates his reality by taking into account the "conclusion" of a reflection on one's own life, missions and becoming, in a wider and more interesting storytelling context that announces a new way of seeing the world.

Leadership: Do you make room for the unusual to slip in and install itself in the perimeter of your own interiority, considering the vision of a high revelation as a way of being of the outside world?

Leadership shouldn't make room for the unusual to slip in and install itself in the perimeter of your own interiority, swallowing with indifference the steps of your transformation towards a higher status, consistent with the level of aspirations. More strikingly, leadership becomes the manifestation of a force of penetrating the complexity of man, which determines the end of a cycle of interactions with the unusual, experienced by knowing the usual. In the future, leadership will transpose into reality the mixture of past and present, banal and unique.

The unusual can be considered a figment of the mind that has all chances to become reality, and when it is set in the perimeter of your own interiority, you become part of a story that is fascinating from one end to the other. The new man should be "filled" with that self-value that best folds to a more complex reality, made up of the exciting variants of the usual and the unusual that can support the passage to a higher level of consciousness. And subsequently, to a higher level of innovation in science.

As someone very well specified on a web page, "The man of the Third Millennium must have the necessary knowledge that can ensure him that mobility, flexibility of thought and ingenuity that ultimately lead to the creation of indisputable values, sustainable in any field of activity."

The vision of a high revelation can be seen as a way of being part of the outside world when the reality you have imagined becomes a copy of an image that is capable of excitement by its power of attraction and motivating action.

The Creation Of Man In His Complexity aims at that ability of the leader, subjected to a strict self-assessment, of creating something new, but supported by objective realities. Something that implies primarily a mobility of thinking in the sense of adopting and rapidly applying the "unknown", by individual intellectual work, with the purpose of shaping an identity that can transmit the idea of new.

The Creative Act Of Reinventing

On January 05, 2015

Strive to turn leadership into a space of creative reinventing, by soliciting the madness of believing in something higher than the limits of reason.

Seconded by the light thread of critical consciousness, my mind headed towards the great questions of time, through the rigorous processing of an inexact value of the likelihood of Deja-Vu effects. Especially through the method of observations of "transfer of reflections". That same naive madness to which I hitched on during the time I tried to work out the optimal routes of certain energy portals from the future, existed through creative impulses that triggered the sequences of images of an inescapable reality, in an explosive game of complementary contrasts.

It could be said that we opted between the revelation of new evidence and the revelation of a new concealment, trying to introduce a class of algorithms for approximating the time in a scripting language with a syntax simplified to the maximum. So as to decrease the unpredictability and nonsense of any attempt of understanding what knowledge considered to be inexplicable, to not leave any trace of doubt. Time became the representation of a system of reference that possessed the property of opposing the variations of transit factors of the impulse called "life".

I read somewhere that in 1572, Danish astronomer Tycho Brahe discovered a supernova over one of the small stars of the W. shaped constellation, Cassiopeia. This nova, called Tyco's star, rapidly acquired more and more light that it started shining brighter than all the other stars and planets at night and then it became visible during the day too, until it began to fade.

If I wanted to touch the untouchable of reinventing the way of producing knowledge, I had to be the ray of thought of a unitary ideal that connects thoughts and knowledge with respect to the shaping of existence. But without becoming a prisoner of my own creation.

Leadership: Do you enter the game of self-reinventing through the courage to fight something that seems almost impossible to understand and conceive?

Romanian philosopher, C. Rădulescu Motru once said: "The scientist stands out from the ignorant through the activity he carries out in the systematization of experience. The ignorant receives this experience in a passive way, but the scientist transforms it deliberately. In other words, in the consciousness of the methods employed, and not in the results, does the regenerative power that knowledge has upon man lay."
